publiquely read and set vp in sundrie places of your Dominions; and commandement giuen, that they may with due obedience and reuerence be obserued and kept. Which we likewise haue now before promised faithfully and assuredly to performe: and your Embassador whom a few moneths agone you sent vnto vs, in your name requested the same of vs, and hath with earnest prayers mooued vs, by Imperiall oath and these Letters of credence to witnesse, that we did ratifie and confirme the same; as if wee our selues should speake to you in presence. Wherefore we haue giuen to him these our letters of Pacification to you directed, that your Generals, souldiers, and subiects, may be bound also to obserue and keepe all these things: wherefore, so long as nothing contrarie to this league shall be done on your part; so long in like manner all these articles of peace shall be of me accepted and assured. For witnesse and confirmation whereof I sweare this oath; By the true and liuing Creator of heauen and earth, by the true signes of our great and reuerend Prophet, by my Imperiall power, and by my true faith; that nothing contrary or repugning vnto the aforesaid articles, conditions, and promises of the eight yeares league agreed vpon betwixt vs, shall be attempted or done by any our Gouernours, Generals, or Vaynods, &c. Commanding moreouer, all our sworne Gouernors of our most mightie Empire in Walachia and Moldauia, and king Stephen himselfe, and others which haue the gouernment of our Empire confining vpon you, That they all and euery of them as well as our selues, shall iustly, faithfully, and religiously accept, reuerence, and keepe these conditions of peace, towards your subiects, cities, castles, townes, and other things appertaining to you; and in the least thing not to hurt, iniurie, or wrong any your subiects. In briefe, we shall as far as our part concerneth vs, giue vnto this most mightie and great new made loue and friendship, so great honour, reuerence, and authoritie, that that which may euen in the least things be had, shall not on our part be wanting. In token whereof, we haue suffered certaine Christian captiues, whom by your Embassador you requested to haue set at libertie, franckly to returne vnto you without ransom; out of which captiuitie they could neuer haue been redeemed, if in regard of this our amitie and friendship we had not granted them libertie: trusting that you will in like sort set at libertie such of ours as you haue captiues. Giuen at our Imperiall Palace and seat in the most mightie citie of Constantinople, the first day of September, in the yeare of our great and reuerend Prophet 969.

Presents from Solyman to the Emperor Ferdinand.

The same Embassador after he had deliuered these letters, presented vnto the Emperor the gifts he had brought from his great Master: which was two great cups of naturall Crystall curiously wrought and set with stones of great price; a couragious Turkie horse with a saddle and trappings wrought with gold, and set with pretious stones, and garnished with chaines of pure gold; and foure of the fairest camels that were to be got in all Constantinople. In deliuering of which Presents the Bassa made his excuse, that the horse and camels had lost their beautie, being with foure moneths trauel from Constantinople, growne somewhat leane and wearie.

1564 This peace thus concluded betwixt the Emperour Ferdinand and Solyman, held firme vntill the death of Ferdinand, who about two yeres after in the yere 1564 vpon S. Iames his day died, being sixtie yeres old: whereof he raigned as Emperor not full seuen yeares. In whose place succeeded Maximilian his son, before chosen King of the Romans. But immediatly after the death of Ferdinand, the Captaines on the frontiers of that part of Hungarie which was holden for the Emperour on the one side, and the Turkes Captaines with the Vayuod of Transyluania on the other side, wearie of their ease, began contrarie to the forme of the League, to surprise strong holds and townes one in anothers confines, whereof ensued much trouble: The authour whereof was Melchior Balas the Emperours lieutenant in that part of Hungarie which bordereth vpon Transyluania, who first surprised certaine townes vpon the frontiers thereabouts: in reuenge whereof, the Vayuod suddenly set vpon Sackmar a towne in the Emperors Territorie, which he tooke, and therein Balas his wife and children. In despight whereof Balas ransacked and burnt Debrezin a great Towne of the Vayuods. But not long after, the Vayuod Solymans Vassall, and aided by him with foure thousand Turkes and three thousand Moldauians, did much harme vpon the frontiers of that part of Hungarie which belonged vnto the Emperour; and first tooke Hadad, and afterwards besieged Vngar. In requitall whereof, Maximilian the Emperour sent Lazarus Suendi a valiant Captaine; who with an Army of eight thousand besieged the strong Castle of Tokay, which he tooke the fift of Februarie, in the yeare 1565; and after that tooke the rich Towne of Erden. In the meane time Solyman, who had in himself fully purposed to be reuenged of all these iniuries (as well appeared by by that he did the yeare following) to ſtay the Emperour from proceeding farther, vntil ſome time as he were at better leiſure to be reuenged, (for as then he was making great preparation for Malta) ſent Marcus Lilineſius a renegat Tranſiluanian of Cibinum, his Embaſſador to Maximilian, to put him in remembrance of the league made with his father, and to wiſh him to haue regard how he further proceeded to the breach thereof. Whereupon the Emperour, becauſe he would not ſeeme vnwilling to hearken to peace, commanded his lieutenants and captaines no more to inuade Tranſyluania or that part of Hungarie which the Turkes held. Howbeit that whileſt this Embaſſadour was thus entreating of peace at Vienna, the Baſſa of Temeſware in the borders of Tranſyluania, made diuers incurſions into the borders of Hungarie, and with ſix thouſand ſouldiers beſieged the ſtrong caſtle of Iula, and the Turks in great number came daily into Tranſ[illegible]nia. At which time alſo Suendi Generall of Maximilian his Forces vpon the frontier[illegible] meſſengers ſent for that purpoſe, wiſhed him not to giue any credit vnto the Turks Em[illegible]ſadour, who meaning nothing but warre, vnder the colour of peace ſought nothing els but to take him vpon the ſudden vnprouided. Neither ceaſ[illegible] theſe troubles thus, but dayly grew from euill to worſe: for in Iune the Tranſyluanians [illegible]ged Eaden, before taken by the Imperials, and after two moneths ſiege had it yeelded vnto them. In the meane time Chernouich the Emperours Embaſſador to Solyman, returned from Conſtantinople, aſſuring him, that the great Turke for all his faire ſhewes of peace, meant indeed nothing but warres, for which he was (as he ſaid) making great preparation both by ſea and land. Whereupon the Emperour began to raiſe new forces: which thing diuers Noblemen both of Germanie and other places hearing of, came vnto him with their followers: and amongſt other Romerus one of the Knights of Malta, and diuers others of his brethren, with fiue companies of ſouldiers well appointed, ſent thither by George Hochenheime grand Prior of that Order in Germanie, and then confirmed one of the Princes of the Empire. At the ſame time alſo, the Turkes being buſie vpon the borders of Styria, and the places thereabouts, were many times cut off by Charles the Archduke: who taking them at an aduantage, ſlew at one time three thouſand of them. Yet for all this, the Turkes Embaſſadour was ſtill at Vienna treating for peace, and ſo cunningly handled the matter, that whereas Eccius Salma a valiant Captaine, had corrupted the chiefe Iudge with certaine others of Alba Regalis, to haue betraied the Citie vnto him; for performance whereof they had deliuered their wiues and children as hoſtages, and he was now vpon his way from Rab, which is but eight miles off, in an aſſured hope to haue ſurpriſed the Citie; he was ſuddenly by letters in poſt from the Emperour, called backe againe, for corrupting the hope conceiued of peace: and ſo was that notable deſignement vnfortunately diſappoined: of which practiſe the Turkes hauing knowledge, afterwards moſt cruelly executed fortie of the conſpiratours, impaling ſome of them vpon ſharpe ſtakes, and hanging others vpon yron hookes by the jawes vntill they were dead. Shortly after the Turkes tooke Neoſtat, which was not long after againe recouered by the Emperour.

The Turk purpoſing warre, craftily ſueth for peace.

At the ſame time one of the Turks ſpies was taken at Zigeth, who but thirteen daies before was ſent from Conſtantinople, of purpoſe to view the ſtrength and ſcituation of that place: he being brought before Charles the Archduke, and examined, ſaid, That Solyman would aſſuredly the next Spring come in perſon himſelfe into Hungarie, to beſiege the ſtrong caſtles of Zigeth and Iula. At which time alſo Countie Serinus tooke certaine other of the Turks Spies, by whome he was certainly aduertiſed of Solymans comming the next yeare; and amongſt others, Scaphir Vayda the Baſſa of Buda his chiefe Counſellor. Beſide this, the countrey men contributors both to the Imperials and the Turkes, were now ſtraightly commanded by the Turks, to pay no more contribution money vnto the Imperials: whereupon it was eaſily gathered, that all that talke of peace was as Suendi had oftentimes written, nothing els but to delay the time, and to put them in ſecuritie. Beſide that, the Turks made incurſions daily into one place or other of the Emperors territories, ſhewing their antient hate, and ſowing by thoſe light skirmiſhes, as it were the ſeed of a greater war againſt the next Spring: which the Emperour now out of doubt of (being alſo warned thereof by many letters from his friends) put ſtrong garriſons into his frontier towns, eſpecially into Rab and Zigeth. But knowing that to be but a poore helpe againſt ſo puiſſant an enemie, he reſolued as his father and vncle had done before, to reſt vpon the ſtrength of the Empire, and againſt the next yeare to call a generall aſſembly aſſemblie of the Princes of the Empire at Auguſta, for the better withſtanding of the common enemie. The wars thus beginning againe in Hungarie, Solyman at the ſame time in reuenge of the manifold harmes done vnto his ſubiects by the Knights of Malta, (whoſe hand he found euer againſt him in all his dealings with the other Chriſtian Princes) made great preparation both by ſea and land; purpoſing, as ſeemed by the manner thereof, to haue raſed the memorie of all of thoſe worthie men from off the earth. Whereunto, beſide the naturall hatred which he bare againſt all Chriſtians in generall, and them aboue the reſt in particular, he was much incited by Caſſanes, Barbaruſſa his ſonne King of Algiers, and Dragut gouernor of Tripolis: by whoſe perſuaſions he cauſed a ſtrong fleet to be rigged vp, commanding the Lieutenants and Gouernors of his ports and hauens all alongſt the ſea coaſt, to put to their helping hands, and to be readie againſt the next Spring. And not long after, vnderſtanding partly of his own certaine knowledge, and partly by the relation of others, in what good forwardneſſe things were; he calling together a great aſſemblie of his chiefe Princes and men of warre, deliuered vnto them his minde as followeth:

What thing I haue this fortie yeares alwaies wiſhed, which was to haue ſo much leiſure from other warres, as to plucke out of their neſts, and vtterly to root out theſe croſſed Pyrats, which vaunt themſelues to be the Bulwarke of Chriſtendome: that ſame me-thinks I haue by the fauour of God and Muhamed his Prophet, at this time obtained. For wee haue ſo repreſſed the attempts of the Perſians, that they cannot let vs: and in Hungarie, from whence certaine dreadfull motions were reported, we our ſelues will ſhortly do thoſe things which ſhall inforce our enemies to hide their heads in the heart of Germanie, and to ſue to vs for peace. You your ſelues daily heare the pitifull complaints of our ſubiects and merchants, whome theſe Maltaſes, I ſay not ſouldiers, but pyrats, if they but looke into thoſe ſeas, ſpoyle and make prize of: whoſe iniuries to reuenge, all lawes both of God and man require. Neither can any thing happen vnto me more pleaſing or more honorable, than if I may before I die accompliſh thoſe things, that is, to win Malta, and to leaue all things in order in Hungarie and Polonia: except perhaps ſome man thinke it a harder matter for vs to thruſt theſe Croſſed companions from the rockes of Malta, than for our Anceſtors to haue driuen them from Ieruſalem, and ſo quite out of Syria: and for our ſelues to haue forced them out of the ſtrong Iſland of the Rhodes. But this ſome will ſay is neerer vnto Italy, from whence aid may eaſily be ſent, and the place defended by a Fleet. Beleeue me, they will neuer aduenture to fight with vs at ſea, who remember themſelues to haue been there by vs ſo often ouerthrowne: beſide that, ſo little a place cannot containe any great garriſon; neither if it could, could it long feed them. Wherefore vnto this expedition we haue determined with the firſt of the Spring to ſend a moſt ſtrong Fleet: and euen now we haue alreadie commanded all our ſea Captaines and Aduenturers which acknowledge our commaund, to be there preſent with their Ships. The King of Algiers will be there, the garriſons of Alexandria are in readineſſe, ſo alſo is Dragut with his appointed Fleet: as for our owne it is by mine owne appointment rigged vp: vnto which Fleet I doubt not but that all the ſtrength of the Weſt will giue place. Which thing (worthie Captaines) we ſpeake, truſting vpon the helpe of Almightie God and Muhamed his great Prophet, with your knowne and approued valour: Now remaineth onely, that euerie one of you thinke with vs, how this warre may beſt be managed, and ſo to referre your deuiſes vnto vs: which that you may the better doe, Lo, I here deliuer vnto you the ſcituation of the whole Iſland, and proiect of all their Fortifications, which we haue receiued of moſt expert and skilfull men.

Solymans purpoſe thus made knowne, and the matter well conſidered, after that they which beſt knew the ſtrong places and maners of the Maltæſes, had declared their opinions what they thought to be moſt expedient; it was decreed, That they ſhould with all ſpeed ſet forward: wherefore victuall and other things neceſſarie for ſuch an expedition being with wonderfull celeritie prepared, they expected but winde. Of theſe things Io. Valetta a Frenchman, Grand maſter of Malta and of the Knights of the Order, being both by letters and meſſengers aduertiſed (for he had alwaies fit men his intelligencers at Conſtantinople, who warily noted the purpoſes and actions of Solyman) was not affraid, but knowing that of God depended the victorie, and that men were to watch, labour, and foreſee; he aſſembled a Councell of his Knights, and in few words ſpake vnto them in this ſort:

Solyman his Oration vnto his Knights.

What Solyman prepareth (most Noble and valiant Knights) and what a great warre he prouideth against vs, you with me of late right well vnderstand, wherefore it is needlesse for me to vse any long speech with you concerning that matter. The enemie is knowne, his insatiable ambition is knowne, his strength is knowne, and his mortall hate against vs and the Christian name is sufficiently knowne. Wherefore let vs all as one first reconcile our selues to God, and then prouide all such things as shall be needfull for the warre. In briefe, noble Knights, to reconcile our selues vnto God, and to appease his displeasure two things are of vs to be performed: whereof the one consisteth in amendment of life, with a holy conuersation: the other in the religious worshipping of him, with a firme and constant trust in his helpe, with prayer, which is called godlinesse. By these meanes our Auncestors obtained many victories against the Infidels in the East. Neither is it to be doubted, but if we shall in these things ioyne together, we shall also frustrat all the force and fury of this proud Tyrant. But forasmuch God vsually helpes them which labour and take pa[ins] and not the negligent and sloathfull, we must of necessitie ioyne vnto them those helpes, which both our profession and the course of warre requireth: which partly consist[s] in our selues and partly in the other Christian Princes. For victuall, armour, money, and other s[uch] things as in warres are requisite, we will so prouide, that no man shall iustly complaine, that wee spare either cost or paines. I will poure out all my store, neither will I for desire of life refuse any danger. As for the Christian Princes, I cannot persuade my selfe that they will lie still in so fit an opportunitie, and in so great a danger, not of our estate onely, but much more of their owne. Verely I will not spare to exhort euery one of them both by Letters and by Messengers, which in part we haue alreadie done: and I doubt not but we shall haue aid enough from the Pope, the Emperour, and the King of Spaine (such is their Christian zeale) and they I hope shall moone the rest. As for you, the Princes and verie light of this sacred Order, and the rest of our brethren, most valiant Knights, I am well assured you will so fight for the most holy Christian Religion, for your liues and goods, and for the glorie of the Latine Name, against a most cruell Tyrant, the rooter out of all true Religion, of all ciuilitie and good learning, the plague of the world, hated of God and man; as that he shall feele the sting of the Crosse which he so much contemneth, euen in the citie of Constantinople, yea in his houses of pleasure. For we shall not haue now to do with him in the Island of the Rhodes, far from the helpe of our friends, (from Asia, from Europe, from Ægypt inclosed with our enemees both by sea and land) but in the eyes of Italy and Spaine, in place strongly fortified, from whence the enemie may easily be circumuented: which that it may so fal out, let vs not cease to pray vnto Almightie God, and to craue his readie helpe.

The Knights make preparation for the Turks coming.

When the Grand master had thus said, all that were present promised with one assent rather to lose their liues, than in any part to faile the Common cause, or to come into the power of Solyman. After that, publique prayer and supplication was made in euerie Church thorough the Isle, and three Colonells chosen out of all the Knights: one an Italian syrnamed Imperator, another Borneas a French man, and Quatrius a Spaniard the third, all aduised men, and most expert Souldiours, who should with all diligence prouide all things necessarie for the Warre. By whose appointment the suburbs and trees which might any way be hurtfull to the fortified places, were ouerthrowne, the fortifications were thoroughly viewed, the Garrisons strengthened, and all manner of prouision most plentifully distributed: and Letters from the Great Master sent vnto the Great Bishop and other Christian Princes, requesting their aid against the Common Enemie. Messengers were also dismissed into diuers places, to certifie both the Knights of the Order and others, of the Turkes great preparation.

Solymans fleet departeth from Constantinople.

Solymans fleet departing from Constantinople the two and twentieth day of March, in the yeare 1565, kept a direct course towards Peloponesus, and so came to Methone: where Mustapha Bassa one of the Turks greatest captaines, a man of 75 yeares, and Generall of the land forces, mustered the armie, wherein were numbred seuen thousand horsemen of them which are of the Turks called Spahi: out of the lesser Asia, conducted by the gouernor of that countrey, and two Lieutenants of Cilicia, fiue hundred: and of the Island of Lesbos, now called Metylene, foure hundred: hee had of the Ianizaries foure thousand fiue hundred led by two Colonels appointed by Solyman; for that the chiefe Captaine of the Ianizaries, which they call the Aga, neuer departeth from the citie but when the Sultan goeth himselfe. Besides these was a certaine kind of men amongst the Turks, who [li]ue of the reuenues of the Church; of them there was in the Armie thirteene thousand, [w]ho had at Constantinople vowed their

A their liues for their superstition. Out of Thracia and Peloponesus were come two Colonels and one Lieutenant, with twelue hundred horsemen and three thousand fiue hundred voluntaries out of diuers countries. There also Piall Bassa Solymans Admirall tooke view of the fleet, wherein were found a hundred and thirtie gallies, two and twentie ships for burthen, some greater, some lesser; besides one that was cast away neere vnto Methone, where was lox six thousand barrels of pouder, thirteene thousand great shot, and foure hundred Spahi: besides these, there were ten gallies from the Rhodes commanded by Halyport a man of 70 yeres; two gallies from Mitylene, and about seuenteene galliots and other small pyrats ships. With this strong fleet the Turks departing from Methone the thirteenth of May, arriued at Malta the eighteenth of the same moneth, and put into a hauen in the Northeast part of the Isle, which the inhabitants call Marzasiroc: but perceiuing themselues not to be there in safetie, they remoued to another port called Maior.

The Iland of Malta lying betwixt Affrica and Sicilia, might be doubted whether it were to be accounted in Affricke or Europe, but that the antient Cosmographers, and the Moores language, which the Maltæses haue alwaies vsed, claime it for Affricke: it is in length from the Northeast to the Southwest twentie miles; and in the broadest place twelue. It regardeth Affricke Southward, ouer against Leptis Parua; and Sicilia towards the North, but more towards Pachinum than Lilybeum; and is in circuit about threescore miles. It seemeth to haue taken the name of Melita, of Mel or Honey, whereof it yeeldeth plentie. The trees there beare fruit twice a yeare, and they haue oftentimes twice haruest, especially of barley and cot-C ten wooll; yet is the Isle in some places stonie, grauellie, and bare of wood: neuertheless it beareth figs, apples, almonds, grapes, and other fruit trees planted by the industrie of man, date trees also, but not fruitfull: it beareth thistles of such bignesse that the inhabitants vse them for wood: fresh water is there wonderfull scarce, and such Wels as they haue are filled with raine in Winter, for in Summer they are either cleane drie, or els the water becommeth brachie. The inhabitants are so burnt with the Sunne, that they differ little in colour from the Æthyopians: they are of a wholesome constitution of body, spare of diet, industrious, rather painfull than warlike, dying more for age, than of sickneesse: their buildings, except it be in the citie, which is in the midst of the Island, and in the suburbs, are long and low (like vnto the Moores) coueredwith turfe or reed. It is commonly supposed, that S. Paul was by shipwreck Acts 27 & 28.
D cast vpon this Island: but it is with greater reason to be thought that it was the other Melita in the Adriaticke betwixt Corcyra and Illyria, and better agreeth with that which Luke writeth of the Apostles trouble and shipwrecke in the Adriatique, out of which sea, it is not to be gathered by the text, that Paul and the rest were driuen. But againe to our purpose: That side of Multa which respecteth Sicilia, hath in it many good harbours and commodious hauens fit for shipping; where besides the port Marzasiroc towards the East, where the Turkes fleet first landed, and the port of S. Thomas, with another called Scala not farre off, it hath two other notable hauens, the one called Maior, and the other Marzamoxet, diuided the one from the other by a narrow piece of ground: which with a ridge runneth in length from the South to the North almost in manner of an Island, hauing the hauen Maior on the East Marza Moxet E the West. Vpon the head of this high ridge standeth the castle of S. Elmo, of great strength both by nature and art. As a man entreth into the hauen Maior, vpon the left hand are foure promontories pointing farre into the hauen on that side, almost in manner of Islands, making so many bayes: Vpon the first standeth the gallowes, whereof also it taketh name: vpon the verie point of the second, on a rough and high rocke standeth a most strong Castle, called the Castle of Saint Angelo, whereunto adioineth the Towne, seperated from the Castle onely with a wall and a ditch, and is placed in a hollownesse cut out of the maine rocke, strengthened also with the sea and the industrie of man; and is of some called the Burg, of others the new Citie; in this Castle resideth the Grand master, and the souldiers in the Burg: vpon the third promontorie standeth another strong Castle, which they call also the Burg of S. Mi-
F chael: the fourth promontorie is not inhabited, from whence the sea runneth alongst the winding banks almost into the midst of the Island, vnto a place called Aqua Marsia. Againe, after the port Marza Moxet, Westward is the harbor of S. George; and after that another called Bennorrat: then followeth the port of S. Paul, no lesse than the port Marzasiroc: after which commeth the port called Salinarum Sinus: but on that side of the Island towards Affricke, is onely

as Gauloſo, now Goza, two other called Cuminia, and another called Piper, all ſubiect to the Maltæſes.

Thus much I haue thought good to ſet downe concerning the Turks fleet, and for the deſcription of thoſe places wherein this great action was performed, the brute whereof then filled the world. Now ſhall it not be amiſſe, in like manner to declare vpon what ſtrength, next vnto God, Valetta the Grand maſter ſtood againſt ſo mightie and puiſſant an enemie. Firſt, there was in the Iſland 1300 mercinaries, ſome Spaniards, ſome French, ſome Florentines, and the reſt of Naples: there was alſo 1000 ſea men of the Knights fleet, and 500 in the town of S. Angelo: and of the country people which were fled into the ſtrong places fiue thouſand, men not altogether vnskilfull of the wars: there was alſo fiue hundred Knights of the Order, H beſides Prieſts and Squires, for of theſe three ſorts of men are they which are called Brethren of the Order. This was the number of them which defended the caſtles and towns of S. Angelo, and S. Michael, whereunto they were proportionably diuided: and in the city it ſelfe, which is called Melita, being in the middle of the Iſland, was 200 ſouldiers and as many citiſens, with three hundred of the countrey people all horſemen, commanded by Io. Vagno a valiant captaine. Beſides this, euery place was furniſhed with plentie of victuall, armor, weapons, artillerie, and whatſoeuer els was needfull for the enduring of a long ſiege, and a warre that ſhould want many things: and that which paſſed all the reſt, minds armed with inuincible courage againſt whatſoeuer ſhould chance, which oftentimes maketh of the vanquiſhed, victors. All theſe things being in readineſſe and orderly diſpoſed, as ſoone as they vnderſtood that ſeuen and twentie of the Turks gallies had put into the hauen Marzaſiroc, and were there landing their men; Gyon Admirall for the Order, a valiant and couragious Knight, marched thithither with 500 harquebuſiers, to haue skirmiſhed with them: but as ſoone as the Turks ſaw them comming, they retired againe to their gallies. On the other part where the other fleet lay, two hundred of the Turks going on ſhore, met by chance with Riuerius a Frenchman, and eight Knights moe, who hauing his horſe killed vnder him, and one of his companions ſlaine, fell with the reſt into the hands of the enemie. Whileſt theſe things were in doing, a certaine Chriſtian mariner fled out from the Turks to the Citie Melita; who diſcouered the enemies purpoſe, telling them, That the Turks by the appointment of Muſtapha had determined to haue landed the greateſt part of their forces, preſently to haue beſieged ſome ſtrong place; had not K Piall Baſſa the Admirall exclaimed againſt it, doubting to be left too weake at ſea: ſaying plainly, That he would attempt nothing before the comming of Dragut, who was euery houre expected. For Solyman had expreſly commanded, that they ſhould doe nothing without his counſell; ſo great an opinion had he of his policie and valor. But whether this his report was true or otherwiſe, the Turks for all that returning with their fleet to the port of Marzaſirock, landed 20000 ſoldiers & fiue field pieces, and ſo intrenched themſelues. This done, Piall Baſſa with 7000 went to view the caſtle of S. Michael, but for feare of the great ſhot durſt not to come nigh it: neuertheleſſe they of the towne ſallying out, couragiouſly skirmiſhed with the Turks, in which conflict, Curfelinus, ſirnamed Parda, accompanied but with one Spaniard, ſo furiouſly aſſailed the enemy, that he tooke from him one enſigne, and ſlew one of the Sanzacks L a great commander, with diuers others. When Piall was come againe into the campe, the Generall began to conſult with the other captaines, whether it were better to lay ſiege to the Caſtle of S. Elmo, or to the towne of S. Michael: in concluſion it was agreed vpon, that they ſhould with all their forces beſiege the caſtle of S. Elmo. And going vp the hill to view the caſtle, they were incountred by the gariſon ſoldiers, in which fight ſome few were loſt on both ſides. Thus by degrees things growing hoater and hoater, the Grand maſter thought it good to certifie Garzias of Toledo Viceroy and Sicilie, how things ſtood, that he might the ſooner rig vp his fleet to come to their reſcue. Wherefore he commanded one galley to put out of the hauen by night, and to paſſe ouer into Sicilie, with Saluagus one of the Knights ſent thither on meſſage. In the meane time the Turks caſt vp a mount to haue battered the caſtle of S. Elmo, and beaten the gallies in the hauen Maior, and ſo to haue opened a way for their fleet to haue entred: but they were not able long to keepe that mount, for they had ſcarcely well ended the worke, but it was forthwith by the continuall thundring ſhot out of the caſtle beaten downe againe: which thing greatly abated the Turks courage. About that time, Ochial came to Riuerius with other Knights taken of the Turks.

The Turks land

They of the Caſtle of S. Michael kirmiſh with the Turks.

A to the fleet with ſix ſhips, drawne out of them which were left for the defence of Alexandria, and in them 900 ſoldiers. The Turks beaten from their firſt mount, caſt vp another on a higher ground, whereon they placed three great pieces of ordnance, wherewith they annoied not only the hauen wherein the fleet of Malta rid, but the caſtle of S. Angelo alſo, the Great maſters ſeat, and with a rolling trench drew neerer and neerer vnto the Caſtle of S. Elmo: which although they had at firſt in vaine attempted, hindred by them which were in the caſtle; yet at laſt with much labor and trauell they brought it to perfection: for the Turks in that kinde of worke, ſtill performed by their multitude, are accounted to excell others. Wherefore in ſhort time they planted their great ordnance in ſuch ſort, as that they might batter both the Caſtles
B of S. Elmo and S. Michael. There was in the Turks campe a gentleman of Spaine, but then a ſlaue vnto a Turke, who vnderſtanding the enemies purpoſe for the beſieging of the caſtle of S. Elmo, by a Chriſtian fugitiue aduertiſed the Great maſter thereof: whereupon hee forthwith ſent Cerda and Miranda with two companies of Spaniards into the caſtle, who were afterwards a great ſtrength vnto the caſtle, and hinderance vnto the enemie. At length came Dragut gouernor of Leptis, long looked for of the Turks, with 13 gallies, and in them 1600 ſouldiers: after whom followed ten galliots from Bona, and in them two companies. In the mean time Saluagus the worthie Knight (ſent before into Sicilia) came to Meſſana, and hauing certified the Viceroy of the ſtate of Malta, was by him commanded to returne to Malta in a Galliot, conducted by two gallies of the great Maſters; which hauing brought him neere vnto the Iſland, returned againe into Sicilia: but hee with his galliot (not without moſt manifeſt C danger) in the third watch of the night brake into the towne thorough the middeſt of the enemies fleet, with the loſſe of but one of his followers. Where hauing deliuered vnto the Great maſter what he had in charge from the Viceroy, he was the ſame night ſent backe againe by the Great maſter into Sicilia, to certifie the Viceroy, That he had need of more aid, requeſting him with all ſpeed to ſend him ſome ſupplie, whereby he might the better hold out againſt the force of ſo great an enemie. Saluagus diſcouraged neither with the labour nor the danger, preſently committed himſelf againe to ſea, and in ſhort time arriued in the port of Siracuſa, where finding the two gallies we before ſpake of, he ſent them to Malta, as he had in charge, with 400 ſoldiers, among whom were diuers Knights of the Order, & certain skilful canoniers: willing them to ſhun the Weſt part of the Iſland, whereas they muſt needs come into the enemies
D ſight, and to paſſe by the Eaſt end therof, which was further about, but ſafer; & turning Southward, to land in the port Miliare, and from thence by the low places of the Iſland to conuey the ſoldiers by night to the citie Melita, which was but foure miles off; from whence they might eaſily paſſe to the caſtle S. Michael. This order taken, he went to Meſſana, and there declared to the Viceroy the danger of the war, with the ſmall number of the defendants, requeſting of him a thouſand footmen, which with thoſe alreadie ſent, he thought would ſuffice to hold out the ſiege vntill he with his whole fleet might come to relieue them. But whileſt theſe things were ſlowly prouided (which with much difficulties and delay could hardly be brought to paſſe, the Chriſtian Princes as it were ſleeping in ſo great a danger) the Turks vpon the ſudden the third of Iune aſſaulted the caſtle of S. Elmo, in hope with ſhort ſcaling ladE ders to get ouer that part of the rampiers which was neereſt vnto the bulwarke of the Caſtle. But the defendants, in the ditch which before had no flanker to ſcoure the ſame, had of earth and faggots made a large ſtrong flanker, from whence the caſtle alſo helping them, they valiantly reſiſted the enemie, and filled the ditches with the dead bodies of the Turks. Who for all that, truſting to their multitude (wherewith rather than with true valor, they obtain ſo manie victories) thruſt ſtill on vntill they had by obſtinate force (although long firſt) gained the flanker: whereby they commanded all that part of the ditch towards the port Marza Moxet. In which place they with wonderfull celeritie ſo fortified themſelues, that they could not be hurt by the defendants: wherin they were much holpen by their own great ordnance planted on the other ſide the hauen Marza; for with it they draue the defendants from the place, beat F down the corner of the rampier, and battered the front of the bulwarke, whoſe hight & greatneſſe troubled the enemie, but was not ſo commodious for the defendants, for that it was made without any flankers. But night comming on, 5000 of the 9000 Turks which gaue the aſſault, tarried there: wherefore the Chriſtians conſtrained to forſake the place, retired themſelues into the caſtle. The Turks in the meane time couered with the darkenes of the night, with with sackes filled with tow and earth, filled vp the ditch which was vnder the bulwarke, but neither of any great wideneſſe or depth: which done, they gaue a freſh aſſault, wherein aboue 800 of them were ſlaine, part Ianizaries, and part Spachi, and beſides them many wounded, of whom the moſt part remained halfe dead in the ditch, where they periſhed, and could not be relieued. Of the Chriſtians was loſt fiue and fortie, amongſt whom was fiue knights of the Order, Guardampes an Auergnois, Maſius a Colonell of Narbona, Contilia a Spaniard, Somaia a Florentine, and Neinec a German. The ſame night the Great maſter thinking, as reaſon was, that they in the Caſtle of S. Elmo might want helpe, ſent two hundred of his Knights and as many other ſouldiers into the Caſtle; who if they had been moe, together with the foure hundred which were before in the Caſtle, might happily haue driuen the Turks both from the Rampers and the flanker, and [illegible] kept the place longer. But for as much as the Great maſter wanted ſouldiers, and had therefore ſent Saluagus into Sicilie for new ſupplies, (as we haue before ſaid) he in the meane time couragiouſly expected their comming, refuſing no labor o[illegible]ine: yet bewailing ſometime with himſelfe the vnfortunateneſſe of the Chriſtian Prin[illegible] by whoſe negligence ſo fit an occaſion for the ouerthrow of the barbarous enemie was let ſlip: But aboue all things, he maruelled exceedingly that no helpe yet came, eſpecially thoſe two gallies, which (as we haue ſaid) were in all haſte ſent by Saluagus: but they by the maſters default kept not the appointed courſe; for firſt whereas they ſhould haue ſhunned the Weſt part of the Iſle, and haue turned towards the Eaſt, they ſhaped their courſe Weſtward to the Iſland of Gaulos, the maſter vainly affirming, that he ſaw certaine of the Turkes Galliots lying before port Mileria: which was afterwards wel knowne not to haue beene ſo; for the truth was, that he for feare (whereby notable deſignes are many times fruſtrated) durſt not go forward. Whereby it came to paſſe, that the Great maſter was diſappointed of ſo neceſſarie a ſupplie: which thing much grieued both the Viceroy and others, but eſpecially Saluagus. For he ſaw it would come to paſſe, that if the Turks ſhould take the Caſtle of S. Elmo (the moſt aſſured bulwarke and defence of the Iſland of Malta) the other places muſt of neceſſitie be brought into extreame danger, all the way to relieue them being thereby ſhut vp. And that it might be taken, ſeemed not to him impoſſible, the enemie hauing alreadie taken one fort, and laying hard ſiege almoſt on euery ſide of that little pile. The due conſideration of theſe and ſuch like things grieued the minds of skilfull men, eſpecially ſeeing ſuch ſlacke preparation in a caſe requiring ſuch preſent reliefe. Yet in the meane time ſouldiers were taken vp at Rome by the commandement of Pius Quartus then Biſhop, to be ſent to Malta: and by his example to ſtirre vp other Princes to ſend aid vnto this ſacred warre, hee gaue a hundred pound of gold to Cambianus Legat for the Order, and commanded gunpouder and other neceſſaries for that warre to be taken out of his Caſtle S. Angelo, that ſo he might ſeeme to be wanting in nothing that was in him to performe. Ouer theſe ſouldiers, in number ſix hundred, he appointed Pompeius Columna Generall, and commanded Camillus Medices his Legat to accompanie him. With theſe went many voluntarie men, of purpoſe to lay downe their liues for the eterniſing of their names in ſo religious a warre, and that with ſuch an ardent deſire, as that euerie little delay ſeemed vnto them a yeare. Wherefore comming to Naples, they there found Iohn Andreas Auria with eleuen ſhips, the Prince of Populonia with nine, Lanicius with three, and three others ſet forth by other priuate Gentlemen. In theſe ſhips were embarqued all thoſe footmen which came from Rome, and ſo tranſported to Meſſana, where the kings fleet was prouiding. But whileſt the Chriſtians make ſlow preparation, conſidering the greatneſſe of the danger, the Turkes not ignorant thereof, reſolued to proue the vttermoſt before the ſtrength of the Chriſtians were readie or drawne together. For the Caſtle of S. Elmo once taken, they aſſured themſelues with more eaſe to carrie the reſt: for that thereby they ſhould firſt haue the hauen Marza Moxet in their power, where their fleet might in ſafetie ride ſo long as they pleaſed; and the riſing ridge betwixt the two hauens was commodious for them both to batter the towne of Saint Michael, and to keepe the hauen Maior, ſo that none could without their leaue paſſe in or out thereat. Wherefore vpon theſe and other ſuch like conſiderations they began againe to batter the Caſtle of Saint Elmo, as it had beene with thunder: which furious batterie they continued by the ſpace of foure dayes together without intermiſſion. The night following they ſuddenly with great force gaue an aſſault, and with their ſcaling ladders had almoſt gained the top of the wall; when the Chriſtians deſirous of nothing nothing more than to come to handie blowes, draue them downe againe with ſuch violence, that neuer after they durſt ſet ladder to the wall, vntill the very laſt conflict. Whileſt things were thus hot at the caſtle of S. Elmo, Dragut his ſouldiers vpon a brauerie, as if they had been the onely men, went to a place called Martia Scala, which is betweene the gallows and S. Thomas rode, as if they would haue done more than the reſt: which the Chriſtians beholding out of the town of S. Angelo, to repreſſe their inſolencie, ſallied forth vpon them, and ſo welcommed them, that they were glad after they had receiued a great loſſe, forthwith to retire to the place from whence they came. Of the Chriſtians were ſlaine Bonnemius a Frenchman, one of the Knights, and ſeuen others.

The ſame time Monferratus was by the Great maſter ſent into the caſtle of S. Elmo, to command there as Gouernor in ſtead of Brolia, for that he with watching and pains taken in defence thereof, was fallen ſicke. The ſame Brolia had many times before written to the Great maſter, That the caſtle was ſo well fortified and furniſhed of all things needfull, as that he thought it impoſſible to be won by the enemy: and had with cheerfull ſpeech and braue behauior, ſo encouraged the knights, and other the defendants, that they fought againſt their enemies with more than mens ſtrength, and greater courage than is to be beleeued. Neither were the Turks for that diſcouraged, although they were with great loſſe ſtill repulſed: but for certaine daies battered the caſtle with greater fury than before, and immediatly gaue an aſſault; for they had made a bridge ouer the ditch, of maſts and ſaile yards, of ſuch [illegible] breadth, that ten men might go thereon in rank; and had placed about the ditch 4000 harquebuſiers, and brought all their fleet vnto S. Georges ſhore, not far from the caſtle. And when they had by the ſpace of 18 daies ſore ſhaken it, and torne the wals with 13000 great ſhot, and were now in hope euen preſently to win the caſtle: ſee, Beragamus a Biſcane, one of the knights, and Medranus a Spaniſh captaine, with certaine other valiant men, ran to the bridge, and to the great admiration of the beholders, oppoſed themſelues againſt the multitude of the miſcreants. The fight hand to hand was on both ſides both fierce and terrible: and now one of the Turkes had aduanced a Turkiſh enſigne vpon the bulwarke, which whileſt Medranus layeth hand vpon, and the Turke on the other ſide ſtrugleth to cleare himſelfe from him, in ſtriuing together, they fell downe both dead, ſhot thorow with one bullet by one of the Turkes. At which time the 400 which we ſaid were but a little before ſent thither by the Grand maſter, ſtood in good ſtead: for ſeeing all brought to ſo great a danger, ſome of them (whileſt otherſome fought with the enemy) thruſt barrels of gunpouder vnder the bridge, ſome caſt downe wildfire, ſtones, and whatſoeuer elſe came to hand, vpon the enemie, and others farther off with their harquebuſiers ſore gauled the Turks; ſo in ſhort time the bridge was burnt and blowne vp, which in the fall thereof, ouerwhelmed eight hundred Turks: the reſt (as they might) retired, few whole, but moſt part wounded. In this conflict the Chriſtians pluckt downe two enſignes; the one Muſtaphaes, the other Draguts, which the Turkes had ſet vp vpon the very battlements of the wals. On the other part toward the Southweſt, a band of the Turkes had got to the top of the higheſt rampier, which as ſoone as they in the caſtle of S. Angelo perceiued, thinking to haue beaten them off with a great ſhot, ſlew by miſchance ſeuen of the defendants vpon the ſame rampier, as they were going too and fro: but to recompence that errour, at the next ſhot they rent in ſunder foure of the Turks captains, with twelue other of their moſt forward ſoldiers. Whileſt they were here fighting, other Turks in the meane time had caſt vp a trench on that ſide of the caſtle toward S. Angelo; out of which they were quickly driuen with fire, ſtones, & other ſuch like things throwne downe vpon them by the defendants. The Turks valiantly on euery ſide repulſed, retired into the camp, when they had in this aſſault loſt two thouſand of their beſt ſouldiers, and of the Chriſtians ſlaine almoſt a hundred, and wounded as many moe. The ſame day, Valetta the Grand maſter, perceiuing the port Marza Moxet not to bee very ſtraitly kept by the Turks, commanded a light Brigandine to be carried out of the hauen, ouerland to the place called Martia Scala, that from thence he might ſend into Sicilia: for hee (as reaſon was) conſidering in what danger the caſtle S. Elmo ſtood, by letters certified the Viceroy and the Biſhop of Rome thereof, and of ſuch things as were there done; requeſting them of ſpeedie reliefe. The copie of the letters ſent to the Viceroy, I haue here ſet downe: as for thoſe which were ſent to the great Biſhop, becauſe they were almoſt of the ſame purport, I haue purpoſely omitted.

To

To Garzias of Toledo, Viceroy of Sicilia, and Admirall of the fleet, greeting.

The Great maisters letters to Garzias Viceroy of Sicilia.

Since the time that I sent Saluagus, I haue sent vnto you two letters, which I caused to bee sent by Melita into Gaulos; which I pray God be come to your hands. After that, when as neither messengers nor letters came vnto vs from you, I commanded a man with instructions to haste to Messana, who when hee had certaine nights attempted to goe out, and was at last got out; hee was scarcely gone two miles, but hee saw the Turkes with might and maine making after him; whom to escape, hee was glad to runne his pinace on [illegible]nd: And casting his letters into the sea, to forsake his boat, and by flight to saue himselfe. No[illegible] Turkes hauing remooued their fleet out of the port Vulturnus, I considering how much it conce[illegible]s to certifie you of those things which are heere done, commanded a Brigandine to be carried to Martia Scala; for seeing that the Turkes fleet is gone to anothe[illegible] of the Island, I hope my letters will without let in short time come vnto you. And the things I [illegible]a haue you to know, are these: The fifteenth of this moneth, all the enemies fleet (a little before night) passed by this port; the comming on of the night letted, that wee could not well perceiue the weaknesse thereof; whilest the gallies almost vnarmed were with much difficultie towed forth: want of water, caused them chiefly to depart out of the port Vulturnus, and peraduenture feare of your fleet. For, as I haue heard, they haue intelligence, that an hundred and fiftie saile lie at road in the port of Messana, for which cause also, they haue not put themselues into the port of Saint Paul, but haue placed their fleete aboue the port Marza Moxet; yet a good part of their gallies lie at the port Saint George, so to bee neerer vnto their land fortes: yet is not the neerenesse such, but that if your fleete come vpon the sudden, they will with the same feare retire to their fleete, that they would if they were farther off. No man is now to bee seene at Vulturnus, for they haue left their first campe at Saint Katharines and Saint Iohns, hauing burnt all the countrey villages, and now lie with their fleete as I haue saide: and with their armie at the castle Saint Elmo, which God hath as yet kept, and as I hope will: which thing is euen for this to bee hoped for, which was but yesterday done; when all our most valiant souldiers (by the helpe of God) for the space of foure houres couragiously endured a most terrible assault. The Turkes hauing also made a bridge Westward toward the port Marza Moxet, wee haue foure times repulsed them to their great losse; yet not without some losse also on our part, amongst whome Medranus, a worthie Captaine was to my great griefe slaine. With this victorie our men are so encouraged, that I am in hope the Castle may bee defended vntill your comming, especially the enemies batterie not so furiously now as before maintained. If I were relieued with certaine companies of fresh souldiers, or at least with those our two gallies, I would neuer thinke that this castle could bee taken from vs: In defence whereof, whilest wee euery houre looke for helpe, wee haue spent both our men, and whatsoeuer warlike prouision wee had else. Wee are resolued although it cost vs all our liues, to goe thither, relying vpon you: who, as wee hope for your deuotion and noble courage, will not be vnmindefull of our health and welfare; but knowing the danger whereinto wee must needs fall, if you shall deferre to ayde vs, will send vs out of hand certaine bands of men, especially when they may so easily bee sent: for now that the Turkes are departed from the East part of the Island our souldiers may bee landed at the Blacke Rocks. our liues lie in your hands, on whom (next vnto God) resteth all our hope: Wherefore wee most instantly request you not to forsake vs: committing our selues, and all that ours is, to your compassion and protection. Fare you well from Malta the 17 of Iune.

These letters receiued, and the distresse of the besieged castle perceiued, the Viceroy was (as of right he ought) greatly moued, and made semblance as if he had been desirous to haue brought forth his whole fleet against the Turkes. But forasmuch as the supplie of ships from Genoa and Spaine was not yet come, and that without them he thought it not good to aduenture the fortune of a battell; he forthwith sent Ioh. Cardona with foure gallies, wherof two were of Malta: and with Cardona ioyned one Robles Campe-master, with a select companie of Spaniards; with whom went also about eighty knights of Malta, who stayed at Messana, awaiting some fit occasion to passe ouer: Amongst whome w[illegible]e these chiefe men of the Order, Parisot the Great masters nephew, Vincentius Caraffa, Bon[illegible]ana and Maldonatus, both Spaniards, Centius of Aquitania, and some others: Who although letted by tempest and other occasions,

A casions, they came too late to Malta, as shall bee heereafter declared, yet serued they in great stead; and had they come in time, before the castle S. Elmo was lost, happily it might haue been still kept.

The Turks making no more account of so great a slaughter of their men, than of so many sheepe, desperatly renewed the fight, as men resolued to indure all extremities. And first they most horribly thundered day and night with their great ordnance vpon the castle: afterwards they assaulted the breaches with such a multitude and force, that if true valor and hope of immortalitie had not excluded all feare out of the hearts of the defendants, the terrour of the assault had inforced them either to haue fled or yeelded. Dreadfull was the fight, and had they not been obstinatly set downe on both sides, the one to win the castle, the other to defend it, B that day had ended the quarrell. Fiue houres endured that most terrible assault, at length the Turks repulsed by the valour of the Christians, retired: yet did they not for all that passe the night following in quiet, but with their great ordnance did so beat the defendants, that they had much ado to keep the Turks from scaling the wals: which, that they should not then dare to attempt, was with exceeding indeuour prouided for by the Christians: of whom in this assault was lost two hundred, and of the Turks an infinit number. And Dragut himselfe, whilest he there performed the dutie both of a Generall, and most valiant souldier, got a blow on the head with a stone, whereof he in two daies after died: his dead body was afterwards carried to Tripolis, and there honourably buried.

A most terrible assault.

The commanders of the Turks army, stil more & more enraged with this valor of the Chri- C stians, and the slaughter of their men, gathering all their fleet together, commanded them to compasse about the castle, of purpose to giue thereunto their last assault, with all their forces both by sea and land; and to send new supplies of fresh souldiers one after another, vntill they had taken the castle. And therfore they with great industry prepared bridges, ladders, engins, armor, weapons, shot, and whatsoeuer things else was needfull for the assault. Which Valetta perceiuing out of his castle S. Angelo, and fearing (as meet was) lest they in the castle should not be able longer to indure so great a fury, called together in counsell his knights, two daies before the Turkes gaue their last assault: and told them, That they all as well as he, saw in what danger they which defended the castle S. Elmo were; and that he doubted not, but that euerie one of them (vpon a godly zeale and compassion) was no lesse moued with the slaughter and D danger of their fellowes and other their Christian souldiers, than with their owne: wherefore he requested them, to declare what they thought best to be done for their safety: yet so, as that they should not hastily determine any thing, that agreed not with the antient valor and honor of their sacred militarie profession. Which motion once made, & their opinions in briefe deliuered, a decree was made, That forasmuch as the castle could not longer be holden, regard should be had for the safegard of them that were therein: for which purpose it was agreed, that 12 pinnaces should be sent to fetch them away. But before, three knights were chosen, who should in hast the night following goe thither, & tell them what was in the counsel agreed vpon, and carefully to consider in what state the castle was, which if the defendants thought was to be abandoned, they should poison the water, & cloy the great ordnance, that it might not afE terwards stand the Turks in stead. The three knights sent thither, was Medina a Spaniard, Rocca a Frenchman, & Constantinus Castriot an Italian; who not without danger of their liues (being oftentimes shot at by the Turks) got into the castle, and declared vnto them that were there in garrison, how carefull the Great master and the rest were of them. And they on their side, first of all gaue thanks to the Grand master and the rest, for the regard they had of them: and afterward concerning the castle, said, That if they considered the straightnes of the place, the small number of the defendants, & multitude of the enemy, they should well perceiue in what danger they were, if the Turks should often with such obstinacy renew the assault: yet forasmuch as they had euer hitherto felt the helpe of God so present, who had still mercifully defended them against the rage of the enemy, & wanted nothing needful for the defence of the place; the F keeping wherof they had requested of the grand master as an honor, although they knew right wel it could not without most manifest danger of their liues be holden: yet they would for al that keep it to the last man: for, that perhaps the like honorable occasion for them to shew themselues in, should neuer again be offred: wherfore they had (as they said) resolued in that place to spend their liues for the glory of God & the Christian religion. The course of this life (they said)

Three knights sent to view the state of the castle S. Elmo.

The resolute answere of them in the castle to the knights said) was but short, but that honor and fame was for euer: and whereas death is to all men pre- G fined, it were to be wished, that the life which is to nature due, should rather seem to be by vs franckly giuen to God and our countrey, than reserued as natures debt: which if it should so happen, they would so vse the matter, as that the barbarous enemie should haue neither pleasure nor ioy, which should not cost him much bloud euen of his best souldiers. This they willed the knights to tell the Great Master, and to request him not to be too careful of them, but to promise to himself those things of them which best beseemed resolute men, especially of them who had vowed themselues to that sacred war. This answer of greater resolution than fortune, receiued, the three knights, when they had diligently viewed the castle, returned to the Grand master: who calling to counsell his knights, and hauing heard the answer of the be- H sieged, would needs hear to what opinion the three knights themselues were of concerning the keeping of the castle: whom Castriot was of opinion, That the place was stil to be defended, and that if he were there to command, he would vndertake to performe it; and rather to lose his life than to forsake it, after he had once taken vpon him the charge there. But Rocca the French knight was far of another mind, and said plainly, that the place could not possibly be holden against so strong an enemie; and that if Iulius Cæsar himselfe were aliue, & saw to what straight the place was brought (especially all the rampiers being either beaten downe or sore shaken, & such a power of obstinate enemies lying round about it) he would neuer suf- I fer so many valiant soldiers to be lost, but quit the place, & reserue his men to further seruice: for why, it was the part of valiant men to performe so much as was of men to be performed; but to striue to do more, was no manhood at all: wherefore he thought it best to do that which men vse with members mortified, whose recouerie is desperat; in which case we doubt not to make a separation, so to saue the rest of the bodie with life. The Spanish knight in most part agreeing with Castriot, said, That he thought it not good, that the place should so easily be forsaken; first, for that the ditches and bulwarks were yet defencible; and then because he saw so great a consent among the defendants, and such a cheerfulnesse to withstand the enemy, which thing (as he said) presaged victorie.

The three knights of diuers opinions concerning the keeping of the castle S. Elmo.

These opinions of the knights thorowly in counsell debated, and euery particular well weighed, it seemed good to the greater part, that they which were in the castle should for certain daies yet hold it out, especially because it was not the manner of the knights of the Order easily to abandon their strong holds, but rather to keepe them to the last, that euen therein the K barbarous enemie might perceiue with whom he had to do, and so see his pride abated. For if they should haue forsaken the place, they might haue been thought to haue done it for feare: whereby the enemies insolencie might haue bin increased, and the honorable Order of those sacred knights disgraced.

But the Turks intentiue to that they had before determined, the 23 day of Iune assembling all their forces both by sea and land round about the castle, in the dead time of the night on euery side set vp scaling ladders, made bridges, wrought mines, and with 32 great pieces of artillerie battered the rest of the walls yet standing, and presently gaue a most terrible assault.
The defendants on the other side beat down some, repulsed other, slew many, euer more care-full how to wound the enemy, than to saue themselues: and where he pressed fastest on, there L to shew their greatest valour. Great were the outcries made on both sides, mixt with exhortation, mirth and mourning; the face of the whole fight was diuers, vncertain, cruell, and dreadfull: and now it was the third houre of the day, when still the victorie stood doubtfull; and had not the fury of the great ordnance been so terrible, that it now had beaten downe all the wals vnto the very rocke wheron the castle stood, the defendants might for some longer time haue endured the enemies force. But the very rock bared both of wals & defendants, & more than foure hundred slain, a man could now scarcely shew himselfe, but he was presently struck in pieces. Monserratus Gouernour of the castle, and Garas of Euboea, men of equall valor, integritie, and honour, were both slaine with one shot; for a short and transitorie life made per-takers of immortality together. Yet the rest which stood in defence of the castle, nothing ter- M rified with so great a losse and slaughter of their fellowes, but augmented rather as it were with new courage from aboue, fought with greater force than before, ouerthrew the Turkes' ensignes now set vp in the castle, slew the ensigne-bearers, captaines, and colonels; now respecting nothing more, but honourably to lay downe their liues for their religion and the obtai-

A ning of immortall fame. By this time the sunne was mounted to the middle of heauen; great was the heat, and men exceeding wearie; the murthering shot neuer ceased, and such was the multitude of the enemy, that he sent in fresh men in stead of them that were wearied or wounded. On the other side, the small number of the Christians, and those weakened with labor, watching, thirst and wounds, did what men might; yet at length were ouercome by a greater force, and so the castle by the Turks woon, but with such slaughter of their men, that it was a wonder that so many should be slaine of so few. The defendants were all slain, euery man, in valiant fight.

Here may I not in silence passe ouer the inhumane and more than barbarous crueltie of the B Turks against the dead bodies of the slaine knights, that thereby may appeare, that crueltie neuer wanteth wheron to shew it selfe mercilesse, yea euen after death. The Turks after they had taken the castle, finding certain of the knights yet breathing; and but halfe dead, first cut their hearts out of their breasts, and then their heads from their bodies; after that, they hanged them vp by the heeles in their red clokes with white crosses, (which manner of attire they after an antient custome vse in time of war, as they do black in time of peace) in the sight of the castles, S. Angelo and S. Michael. And yet Mustapha the Turks Generall not so contented, commanded them afterwards to be fast bound together, & so cast into the sea, whose dead bodies were in few daies after by the surge of the sea cast vp in the hauen Maior, and known by their friends, were by the commandment of the sorrowful Great master honorably buried. With which the C enemies most barbarous cruelty he was so moued, that hee commanded that no Turke should from that time be taken prisoner, but to be presently slaine. And therupon all that were before taken, were forthwith put to the sword, and their heads cast ouer the wals on that side towards the enemie. From the beginning of the siege to the taking of the castle, of the Christians were slain a thousand three hundred, amongst whom were a hundred & thirtie of the sacred knights of the Order, all worthie to be registred in the Booke of euerlasting Fame.

Barbarous crueltie exercised by the Turkes vpon the dead bodies of the Knights.

The castle of S. Elmo thus lost, Valetta although his mind (as he had good cause) was inwardly attainted with exceeding griefe, yet made semblant otherwise, because he would not daunt the minds of his souldiers: telling them, that nothing was hapned vnprouided for or vnforeseen. This was (as he said) the will of God, and the chance of war, that sometimes one, sometimes ano- D ther should be ouercome: and that cowardise, not such valor as was in them that were gone, gaue occasi- on to liuing friends to lament: yet that the enemie was not for that to be feared, who had also receiued such a losse, as he might therby rather seem conquered, than a victorious conqueror: wher as the losse of his knights was recompenced with honor and immortality, things of themselues sufficient to inflame al noble minds to behaue themselues valiantly. As for himselfe (he said) that trusting not in his owne strength, but in the help of Almighty God, he had not yet cast off the hope of victorie ouer the relicks of the discomfited enemy; and that he well hoped, they were all of the same mind, wherein hee most earnestly requested them to persist vnto the end. When he had thus said, he being a man armed against all fortunes, withdrew himselfe a little aside: where casting many things in his troubled mind, he determined to send letters to Petrus Mesquita, Gouernour of the citie of Melita, to certifie him and the E knights of the Order that were at Messana, and the Viceroy, of the losse of S. Elmo: the copie wherof, because that in them euidently appeareth the Christian mind of him the Great master, I haue thought good here to set downe as followeth:

Valetta encourageth his souldiers after the losse of the castle S. Elmo.

Whilest these Knights are setting forward, in the meane time chanced the miserable misfortune of the Castle Saint Elmo: which although it brought vnto vs that griefe you may easily imagine, we for all that, as if it had happened by some secret appointment of God, haue taken it in that part, that hee as a most mercifull father purposeth thereby to warne vs, but not vtterly to destroy vs. Neither doe I thinke it lawfull to doubt of his mercie and power. Yet for all that, I may neuertheless complaine, that wee are of them forsaken of whome it least beseemed. So that in the space of seuen and thirtie dayes, F wherein our most valiant souldiers endured all the force of the enemie (which truely was done rather by the power of God than of man) we were holpen of our owne (which owe so much vnto vs) not so much as with the least helpe, which they might oftentimes haue sent vs. But I list to ascribe it, whatsoeuer it is, to God, of whom alone as we haue hitherto receiued so many good things, so rest we in hope hereafter to receiue also. For, for any thing that I can see, wee must not now trust to mans helpe: forasmuch as wee could by no Letters, no diligence, no prayers, no admonitions, and to bee briefe, by no commands

mone them, who of all others ought most to haue obeyed it. The shortnesse of the time suffereth vs not to write to the Viceroy of these things, it shall be your part to certifie both him and other our friends thereof: who if they had obeyed our command, or aided vs with neuer so small a supplie of souldiers, happily we had not lost the castle Saint Elmo: in defence whereof we haue spent the best part of our souldiers. Wherefore except the Viceroy make hast to deliuer vs from this siege, I feare that he cannot in time come, but especially if we be here besieged before the comming of those our small helpes which we as in a dreame haue promised vnto our selues, and which we now scarce hope will be in time present. For all that, we doe not distrust of God his loue and prouidence: by whose diuine inspiration the rare courage of the Viceroy being in short time stirred vp, will hasten hither to relieue vs. For all our welfare consisteth in celeritie. Our enemies haue drawne all their fleet into the hauen Marza Moxet, are busied in cleansing the castle, and repairing the breaches, that they may afterward the better vse them against vs. Wherfore vpon the sight of our letters, send vnto vs the captains Catherin, Belcacar, Belmesi, & Zoricius, with their companies, that we may vse their faithfull and valiant seruice. God of his mercie send vs aide from some place, and keepe you. Fare you well, from our Castle Saint Angelo, the of Iune, 1565.

Mesquita hauing receiued these letters, commanded a galliot forthwith to be launched, and therein imbarked Masius Codonellus, one of the knights; to whom he deliuered both the letters of the Grand master to him, and others of his owne, almost of the same purport, directed to the Knights of the Order which lay at Messana, requesting him with all speed possible to passe ouer with them into Sicilia.

In the mean time Mustapha the Turks Generall sent a messenger to Valetta, and with him an old Spanish captiue, with promise of liberty if he would goe with his messenger to the towne, to talke with Valetta concerning the yeelding vp thereof, and to try if he would by any means come to agreement: who comming to the towne, the Turke still waiting at the gate, the Christian was let in, and brought to the Great master, to whom he declared what he had in charge from the Bassa. But as soon as Valetta heard of the name of composition and yeelding, he was so filled with indignation, that had he not bin a Christian, he would presently haue commanded him to haue bin hanged. Wherefore he gaue him choice either to tarry still in the towne, if he thought so good, or els forthwith to returne and tell his companion, that if he got him not packing quickely, he would send him farther off with a great shot. With this short answer the Turke suddenly returned into the campe. Whereupon Mustapha fell into such a rage, that he openly protested, neuer from that to forbeare any kind of cruelty against the Christians. There was then with Mustapha one Philip, of the most noble Græcian Familie of Lascaris, who of a boy taken prisoner by the Christians in Patras, a city of Achaia, and by them honestly & courteously vsed, was therefore euer after well affected toward the Christians: he priuie to many of Mustaphaes designes, by a certaine diuine motion thought hee should not a little profit the Christians by reuolting vnto them: wherefore he resolued to flie vnto the castle of S. Michael. Which thing when he had oftentimes attempted, at length the first of Iuly he cast himselfe into the sea (for by land he could no way escape) and swum to the castle, not without danger of his life; for discouered by the Turks, he was many times shot at both with their arrowes and small shot. He, brought to the Great master, reuealed vnto him many of the enemies secrets, and also aduised him what was to be done at the point of S. Michaels, to frustrat the enemies purpose for the assailing of that place; with many other things, which were vnto the defendants no small helpe: and afterwards as often as need was, during the siege, fought valiantly against the Turks.

Whilest these things were in doing, Codonellus sent as we haue before said into Sicilia, came in safetie to Messana, where he found the Christian fleet not yet readie to relieue the distressed Malræses; for the Spanish ships were not yet come, and Iohn Andreas Auria with eight and twentie ships was ready to returne to take in foure thousand footmen, taken vp in Etruria by Capinus Vitellius. Which backwardnesse the knights of the Order considering, and what danger was in delay, after they had well debated the matter amongst themselues, they resolued by the power of God by all meanes possible to helpe their brethren. And for this expedition chose two most fit Generalls of their owne fellowes, the Commanders of Messana and Baroli) who forthwith went to Garzias the Viceroy, declaring to him what things the sacred knights Knights of their Order had done, not for the king of Spaine only, but for the Christian commonweale, and also what great charge they had been at the yeare before in the Pitionian expedition, wherein they had neither spared ships, victual, nor munition, neither their own liues, to profit the King and the Christian commonweale. Besides this, they besought him well to consider, that the losse of Malta concerned not the sacred knights only, but all Italie, and especially Sicilia, for the neerenesse of so troublesome and puissant an Enemie. For these and other like reasons, which the shortnes of the time suffered them not to rehearse, they requested of him 4000 footmen, with whome all the Knights of the Order which were there, and many other noble and voluntarie men would make all possible speed to relieue the besieged, which they had before in vaine attempted; with which strength they were in good hope, if not to repulse the enemie, or to recouer that was alreadie lost, yet at least to stop and stay his farther proceeding, vntill such time as he hauing rigged vp and brought forth all his fleet, might set vpon the Turks, and (as was to be hoped) vanquish and disperse them. But whilst the Viceroy hauing heard their request, considereth what answer to make, a messenger came vnto him from Spaine (but with what command from the king (although men guessed diuersly) could not be knowne. But vpon his comming, the Viceroy gaue the knights this cold answer, That he could not grant what they requested, for that in so doing he should disfurnish his fleet, & not be able afterwards to relieue them as he desired: but if it pleased them to transport the Knights with part of the Bishops souldiers into the Island, they might so doe with their owne two gallies they had alreadie, whereunto he would also ioyne another of his owne. The Knights when they could obtaine no more, accepted of that which was offered.

The cold answer of the Viceroy to the Knights.

Whilst these gallies were setting forward, those foure gallies whereof we haue before spoken, wherein were imbarked 80 knights and 600 other soldiers, hauing at sea suffered many troubles by the space of twentie dayes, could not as yet arriue at Malta: and because the Viceroy had commanded that they should not land, except they first knew whether the Castle S. Elmo were still holden by the Christians, they sent out a frigot to land, promising that day and the next to tarrie in the sea for her returne. In the meane time a great tempest suddenly arising, it so fell out, that the frigot could not at the appointed time returne: wherfore the gallies which expected her comming, fearing lest she had been either by tempest lost, or by the enemie intercepted, retired vnto Pozalo a port vpon the coast of Sicilia, neerest to Malta, there to expect some good newes: where as soone as they had put in, they vnderstood that S. Elmo was yet defended: whereupon they put to sea againe, with purpose to haue arriued at Malta. But when they were within two leagues of the place where they thought to haue landed, they saw a fire there, which caused them to mistrust that the place was possessed of the enemie, and that he lay thereabout to intercept them: wherefore they returned againe to Pozalo; where now vnderstanding of the French knight come from Malta, that that fire was made by his commandment, as a signe that they might without feare come forward; they with all speed made againe for the same place, and at the length the 29 day of Iune about midnight landed at the Blacke rockes on the South side of the Island toward Affricke, and vnseene of any, got in haste to the citie Malta, where they were ioyfully receiued, and there staid to expect what the Great Master should command. In the meane time it fortuned, a great foggie mist (which seldome times there chanceth) to arise so thicke, that a man could hardly see for it: at which time a boy of about twelue yeares old looking by chance out of a window in the castle of Melita, suddenly as one afraid cried out, that he saw a Turke going from the citie to the castle of Saint Michael. Which thing some of the knights hearing, ran presently out that way, and found a Greeke of the citie Melita, who brought backe and examined (for that without the Gouernors passe it was not lawfull for any man to goe out of the citie) confessed, That his purpose was to haue aduertised the Turks of the comming of those souldiers, that so they might haue intercepted them as they should haue come from Melita to the Grand master: for which treason he was as he had well deserued cut in foure pieces. Three dayes after, this new supplie come from Sicilia, in the first watch of the night came all in safetie from Melita to the Grand master, except two or three boyes, who ouercharged with armor and other baggage, were not able to keepe way with the rest. downe his cheekes, and his eyes cast vp to heauen, said:

I thanke thee, ô heauenly Father, which hearest my prayers, and forsaketh not this thy little Flocke, beset rownd with most rauening Wolues: these are the workes of thine euerlasting goodnesse, mercie, and prouidence. G

These new come souldiers requested of the great master, as a rewatd of their paines, That they might be put in garrison into the Towne S. Michael, a place now most laid vnto by the Turks: which thing he (commending their forwardnes) easily granted; yet for all that remoued not the old garrison. These fresh and couragious soldiers desirous of nothing more than to fight with the enemy, the next day sallied out, and hauing slaine 200 of the Turks, & wounded as many more, without losse of a man returned, euery mans sword imbrued in the bloud of his enemie. Which thing Mustapha the Turks Generall hearing, knew it was they which H lately came into the tow[illegible] and thereupon fell in rage with his captains, as that they had by their negligence entred. But the suspicion grew most vpon them which were appointed for the keeping of the vttermost part of the Island: which was the more increased, for that th[illegible]al-liots of Algiers had withdrawne themselues away; so that he neither trusted them no[illegible] negat Christians, who as occasion serued fled daily from him. For which cause he gaue out proclamation, That none of them should lie by night out of the gallies, and that such as did otherwise, should therefore be burnt, or impaled vpon sharpe stakes: and changing his warders, appointed Salec with his galliots, whom he thought to be more faithful, for the keeping of the Island. And that neither they nor the Christians should be able to attempt any thing, he chained togethet diuers gallies in the entrance of the hauen Marza Moxet, and caused the rest of I the fleet to ride neerer together thã before. But because exceeding many were at that time sick in the Turks campe, of the flix and other diseases; three places were assigned for them; one for the wounded men neere vnto Aqua Martia, garded with 2000 Turks; another in the poups of their ships & gallies for the Turks voluntaries; and the third amongst the bulwarks, where the inforced Christians were cured. At the same time, Mustapha appointed Ochiall Bassa Go-uernor of Tripolis, in stead of Dragut before slaine: who going thither with fiue gallies, and hauing set all things in order there, returned againe vnto the campe. With him the Bassa had sent two ships loaded with corne to Tripolis, there to make bread, wherof they began to feele some want in the campe. He also sent Zaloch one of his Colonels to Solyman, to certifie him of the winning of the castle S. Elmo, and to deliuer vnto him the description of the Island of Mal- K ta as they found it at their arriuall: and further to declare vnto him, That he found the Maltæ-ses stronger and better prouided, than was at his setting forth supposed: wherfore if it were his pleasure longer to continue the siege, he should send a new supplie of men, victuall, and other warlike prouision: which if he did, he would then be in hope to take the other strong places of the Island also, though not so soone as was at the first supposed: and that in the mean time whi-lest he expected answere, he would not faile to do what he possibly might. And because he would not seeme to haue written an vntruth, he began his batterie in fourteene places with 70 great pieces of artillerie, amongst which was three most huge basilisks: for from the Gal-lows promontorie to Aqua Martia, and from thence to the castle S. Elmo, wherein he had pla-ced 300 Ianizaries, the Turks had inclosed all that compasse with sundrie bulwarks, trenches, L and mounts, from whence they with their thundering shot day and night incessantly battered the townes and castles of S. Michael and S. Angelo, ouerthrew the walls, beat downe the bul-warks, and brake down the houses in such terrible manner, that scarce any could be safe there-in: which of all others most troubled the feareful women and children. But the Turks in their trenches rested in far more safetie: yet so, as they durst not stray far out of the campe, but tru-sting vpon their multitude, and not that many times without their losse, being cut off by the horsemen of the garrison of Malta, who were euer readie at their heeles.

Ochiall Bassa made gouernor of Tripoli.

A terrible batterie.

When the losse of the castle S. Elmo was knowne at Rome, the citie was filled with mour-ning and heauines: some were sorie for the dishonour, other some feared lest the calamities of the Maltæses should redound vnto themselues. There was also amongst others, a certain enui- M ous and foule mouth'd kinde of men, altogether ignorant and vnacquainted with martiall af-faires, who shamed not to lay the blame of the losse of S. Elmo vpon the Grand master: whom both his owne valour, with the worthy testimonie of so many famous and valiant men as were there present with him, as also this historie gathered out of the true light of things then done, shall

A shall both for the time present and for all posteritie sufficiently acquite of so false a slander. But he will easily blemish another mans name, that spareth not his owne: neither can Ignorance rightly iudge of the counsels of the Skilfull, or cowardise, of valiant deeds.

But to returne againe to our purpose: we said before, that three gallies were made ready at Messana; in setting forth whereof, they which had the charge vsed such diligence, that the se-uenth of Iuly they departed out of harbour. In them (besides the Knights of the Order) was imbarqued 600 Spaniards, and 300 of the Great Bishops souldiers, conducted by Pompeius Columba: the mariners were part hired, part slaues, to whom libertie was promised, if they would lustily do their endeuour to get into the hauen, and to be accounted of as the rest of the souldiers were. And because they would relieue the besieged not with men onely, but with B victuall also, they put into the same gallies fiue hundred bushels of wheat, beside gunpouder, salt-peeter, and lead for shot. And although it was thought a most hard matter, by the hauen it self to enter into the Island, the Turks possessing it and all the places therabouts; neuerthe-lesse there was in the Knights such an earnest desire to relieue their Brethren, that they pro-mised both to themselues and others, all things easie & safe. But when they began to approch the Island, they sent a scout before, to vnderstand by signes from the castle of S. Angelo, whether they were to proceed forward or not: who comming so far that they might discouer the signe, perceiued thereby that they should retyre. Which thing the Turks perceiuing also, presently with the smoake of their great ordnance and other things, they so obscured the aire as with a C thicke cloud, in such sort as that those signes were no more to be discerned: but all in vaine: for why, our men had alreadie discried them: so those three gallies returned againe into Sici-lia. For, Valetta that good Prince thought it not meet to bring so many of the sacred knights, so many noble gentlemen and valiant soldiers, into a most manifest danger: for he saw certaine of the Turkes gallies to lie by night in the mouth of the hauen Marza Moxet, at a place called the Little sands, to impeach the going in or out of the hauen Maior. About the same time, they which lay in garrison in the citie Melita, hearing of the notable sallie made by the souldiers lately come, and taking heart thereupon, at such time as the Turks were fetching in a certaine boorie of cattell, the horsemen pursued them, and hauing slaine diuers of them, recouered the prey; and yet not so contented, chased them euen to their campe. But the other Turks seeing their fellowes flying in such haste towards them, raised an alarum, ran to their Generals tent, D and for that time ceased their batterie.

The gallies vpon a signe giuen returne backe.

The Great master probably coniecturing, that the Turkes would in short time assault both the towne and castle of S. Michael, thought good by his presence to encourage and strengthen the garrison; and therefore was about to haue gon thither by a bridge made of boats from the one point of the land to the other, betweene S. Michaels and S. Angelo: but quickely vnderstan-ding the certaintie thereof, returned againe into his castle. Some there be that thinke, For him to haue so done, had been a venturous part, and full of danger, and therefore to haue beene dis-commenned: for that great things are performed, not so much by strength of bodie as of mind, by politique counsell and direction, wherwith a Generall (although absent) may yet with his E forces be alwaies present; but the Generall once lost (which may easily happen if he will pre-sent his person to the danger) we see most commonly all fall together with him, no otherwise than doth all parts of the bodie when the soule departeth. But other some are of contrarie opinion, That the Generals presence, especially in great dangers, is both praise-worthy and most necessarie; for that he, as the soule, cannot prouide for or rule the bodie, except it be present, yea placed therein: and that Valetta in so doing, followed the examples of the grea-test kings and most famous Generals; as of Alexander the Great, Iulius Cæsar, Themistocles, Ma-rius, and others: whose words vnto their souldiers were these, I my selfe will be your conducter in the field, in the battel partaker of the danger with you, you shalbe in all things as my selfe. Besides that, who knoweth not, that as in other things, so most of all in martial affaires, all things are better, F more orderly, and more easily done when the master is present; neither was the learned Poet his meaning any thing els, when in the wars betwixt the Latines & the Rutilians, he saith, Vr-get præsentia Turni? whereupon they concluded, that the Great Master in going had done both valiantly, wisely, and according to his dutie. But this we leaue for martial men to determine.

At the same time the king of Algiers came to aid the Turks with 7 gallies and ten galliots, and in them 2200 souldiers; who sorie that he was not there at the begining, and desi-rous rous to do some notable act, and withall to make proofe of the valor of his soldiers, request the great Bassa to bestow vpon him the first place in the besieging the castle S. Michael: which he not only granted, but joined to his forces 2000 of his own best soldiers. These things obtained, he commanded ninetie small vessels by deuises to be carried ouer land out of the port Marza Moxet to Aqua Martia, for that he purposed on that side to besiege the castle by water. But Valetta perceiuing the enemies purpose, both by seeing that was done, and also aduertised thereof before by a Christian fugitiue; presently called vnto him two faithfull and skilfull shipmasters of Malta, and imparting the matter vnto them, demanded what they thought best to be done to keep the Turks from landing, as it seemed they purposed at the walls foot. They quickly perceiuing the matter, answered, That in their opinion, if a chaine were made of masts and saile-yards as spars joined together with iron rings, and so drawne all alongst from the corner of the castle of S. A[illegible], to that place where the enemy thought to land, their purpose might be so defeated. This deuice so pleased the Great master, that the night following such a chain was made, and fast mored in the appointed place. The Turks so soone as it was [illegible] perceiuing this bar, stood as men doubtfull, not knowing how by any means to land their men, as they had before purposed. Whilest they stood so abashed, a Christian fugitiue a most desperat villaine (in which kind of men foolish hardinesse is accounted a vertue, and desperation, constancie) came to the king, and promised him to breake the chaine, and so with a hatchet in his hand cast himselfe into the sea; after whom followed two or three mo to helpe him: who swimming to the chaine, got vp vpon it, and began to hew apace with their hatchets. Which the Christians beholding, suddenly fiue or six of the Maltæses swam thither with their drawne swords in their hands, and hauing slaine two of them, caused the other to flie: after which time none of the Turks was so hardie as to attempt the same. The barbarous king for all that gaue not ouer his purpose so, but with wonderfull diligence prepared for the siege, which the fifteenth day of Iuly began both by sea and land. But the defendants turning their great ordinance vpon that place from whence the galliots came, with the furie thereof (in the space of three houres, which the assault endured) slew two thousand Turkes, and sunke twelue of the Galliots: the rest comming as far as the chaine, when they could get no farther, nor land their men, turned their prows vpon the corner of the castle, but were glad at last to retire and leaue that they came for vndone. The assault by land also endured fiue houres, wherein many of the Turks were slaine: and of the defendants 200, amongst whom was Fredericus the Viceroy of Sicilia his son, strucke in sunder with a great shot, Gerdius a Frenchman, Franciscus Sanoghera and his nephew Iohn, Spaniards, all Knights of the Order: Medina was also wounded, whereof he afterward died. But Valetta considering into what danger the state of Malta was like to fall, if he should be constrained to fight many such fights, where his soldiers wearied day & night without rest, were still to incounter with fresh men, and heard nothing of any aid or new supplie; the 17 day of Iuly he sent a messenger into Sicilia, who swam from the castle to the farthest part of the bay to Aqua Martia, and from thence escaped vnknowne thorow the midst of the enemies, vnto the citie of Melita, and so in a little frigot came to Messana. By him the Great master sent letters to the Viceroy, requesting him to send him his owne two gallies with those Knights which were at Messana, and such other souldiers as might in them be transported: willing them, that as soone as they came to the Island, they should houer off aloof before the hauen, readie vpon a signe giuen to thrust in. The same time that this messenger arriued at Messana, came thither also the fleet from Spaine, wherein were many of the Knights of the Order from diuers nations. The Viceroy desirous to send these two gallies to Valetta, sent letters before vnto him in secret characters by two frigots, wherein he certified him that he would send the gallies, requiring to haue from him some signe wherby they might at their comming know whether they should enter or retire: which frigots taking diuers courses, one of them laded with medicines, as was afterwards knowne, was intercepted by the enemy: the other although she came in safetie to Melita, yet for as much as all the passages betwixt the castle of S. Michael and the citie Melita, were certaine dayes before by the diligence of the enemie shut vp, and three which had vsed to passe too and fro, intercepted and most cruelly executed; and besides that, the hauen straightly kept: the Knights of Messana could haue no further direction from the Great master, for the safe [illegible]ing of the two Gallies: yet neuertheless because he had requested them, and they themselues were of the same opinion (as he

A he had before written) that where all is in question, the aduenture of a little part is lesse to be feared; they thought it good to aduenture them, yet with this regard, not to expose all those knights to so great a danger, but of them all to send onely fortie, with a conuenient number of other soldiers, and with them Salazar a Spanish captaine was sent by the Viceroy to be landed in the Island Gaulos, who should afterwards from thence in a boat (for that purpose towed along by the gallies) passe ouer into the Island of Malta as a Spie, to take view both of the citie and enemies campe.

In the meane time the Turks mindfull of the losse receiued in the assault of the castle S. Michael, and desirous of reuenge, did so violently batter the castle with their great ordnance, that what the defendants repaired by night, that they still beat downe againe by day: and in time
B of batterie made a bridge, which the 20 day of Iuly before the Sun rising they laied ouer the ditch, that they might as if it had bin vpon euen ground, come to fight hand to hand with the Christians. Which seen, and quickly perceiued what danger it might bring, by and by Parisot the Great masters nephew, and Agleria, both knights, with certaine mercinarie soldiers sallied out to haue burnt the bridge, but were so receiued of the Turks, that they were almost all slain together with Parisot and Agleria, and yet the exploit vnperformed. The Turks without ceasing continued their furious batterie vntill the eight and twentieth of Iuly, which day in the afternoone they in diuers places assaulted the castle, thrice they with fresh and new supplies relieued their repulsed and wearied soldiers, and so fiercely maintained the assault, that they made no doubt but that day to win the Castle. But the defendants with no lesse resolution C withstood them, repulsing them with their weapons, with shot, fire, and force, and at length inforced them with no small losse of their men to retire from the wals. This victorie so incouraged the besieged, that now they made small reckoning of the enemie: but forasmuch as our men alwaies spared their great ordnance but in time to fight, and sallied not out as they were wont, the Turks thought that the garrison was but weake, and that shot & pouder grew scarce in the Castle. Yet deceiued in both, for that it was rather of purpose, than for want, so commanded by the Great Master; who hearing nothing of the comming of any aid, and seeing the enemy to giue daily more fierce assaults, would not vainly spend his most necessary helps. The Turks perceiuing what little good they had done with their often assaults, determined now to proue what might be done by vndermining the castle; and had almost brought one of their D mines to perfection before it was by the Christians discouered: and to the intent they should the lesse marke it, they caused two gallies to come as neere as they could to the wals, & to batter that place; in hope that whilest our men gazed vpon that was done openly, they should the lesse regard what they were working in secret, that so they might in the meane time more easily get into the castle. But the besieged carefull of all that was to be cared for, perceiuing their purpose, with a countermine defeated their mine, & by the couragiousnesse of certain of their soldiers, but especially of one Ancient, draue out the enemy, who hauing cast certaine pots of wild-fire before him into the mine, and following presently after with a piece of fire-woike in his hand, forced him out. For which good seruice he was by the Great master rewarded with a chaine of gold of fiue pound weight. And because of vertue springeth vertue, which stil re-E steth vpon difficulties, the next day, which was the first of August, the bridge which wee said the enemie had made ouer the ditch, was by a sally made by the defendants burnt downe with fire and gunpouder cast vpon it: which was in good time done, for the next day, the Sun now declining, the Turks again assailing that part of the castle where Carolus Rufus had the charge, were by our men valiantly repulsed. This assault endured 3 houres, in which time 300 of the Turks were there slain: and of the knights, Rufus himselfe and Baresius, with certaine mercinarie soldiers. At this time the Christians were by the enemie so shut in with the multitude of great ordnance, that they could not so much as looke into the ditch or shew themselues, much lesse sally out, but they were presently set off. Yet did they not for all that make spare of their liues when occasion was giuen them to performe any notable exploit: as appeared by Calderonius a F Spaniard, who seeing some viewing that part of the wall which the enemy had most battered and shaken at the castle bulwarke, doubted not to sally out, but was presently taken with a bullet and slaine: which mischance when it might seeme of right to haue terrified the rest from attempting the like, did indeed the more incense them; so that when they saw the enemy exceeding busie in filling the ditch, they, resolutely set downe to offer themselues to most assured not be hurt by the flankers made in that place to ſcoure the ditch, but might thereby, vpon plaine ground, without ſtay paſſe vnto the wall, now opened and ouerthrowne with the continuall batterie, and with two great pieces (which they had planted vpon a high mount which they had newly caſt vp on the right hand the bulwarke Sauoire) they began to play vpon the cauſe there was but 400 ſoldiers left aliue in it, and they (as he ſaid) almoſt ſpent with labour and wounds, all the reſt being dead. Which the Turks hearing, and ſeeing faire breaches both in the wals of the new city and of the caſtle of S. Michael, wide enough for carts to go thorow, they determined with all their forces to aſſault both places at once, and to proue if there were inſtant they aſſaulted the new city at the caſtle bulwark, and the caſtle S. Michael at the breach, with ſuch a multitude, that all the earth ſeemed to be couered with men round about. The thundring of the great ordnance, the noiſe of the ſmall ſhot, with the clattering of armour, and K noiſe of trumpets, drums, and other warlike inſtruments, with the cry of men on both ſides was ſo confuſed and great, as if heauen and earth ſhould haue been confounded together. Which ſurpriſed with a ſudden feare, fled, the Chriſtian horſemen hardly purſuing them with bloudy execution, and they in their flight pittiouſly crying out vpon their fellows for helpe. Whereby it came to paſſe, that they which were aſſailing the citie and caſtle, to reſcue their diſcomfi-ted fellowes, were glad to giue ouer the aſſault: ſo with great ſlaughter foiled on both ſides by the Chriſtians, they returned to their trenches, when they had loſt about fifteene hundred at L the aſſault, beſide them which were ſlaine in the chaſe by the horſemen of Melita. Of the defendants of both places were ſlaine aboue an hundred, and almoſt as many wounded. This fight endured about fiue houres. Valetta deliuered of ſo great a danger, that day and certaine others cauſed publique prayers to be made, and went himſelfe with the multitude of the citizens to the Church, to giue thanks to Almightie God for that victorie.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Garzias the Viceroy was aduertiſed from Calabria, that certaine ſhips laded with men, victuall, and other prouiſion neceſſarie for the wars, were com-ming from Conſtantinople to Malta: wherefore he forthwith ſent Altamira and Gildandrada two noblemen, with fiue gallies to meet them: who being come within thirtie miles of Malta, met with no ſuch ſhips, but only one frigot and a galliot; the frigot they tooke, but the galliot M eſcaped to the enemies fleet at Malta.

Muſtapha the Turks General now thinking no man ſo ſtrong which might not with continuall labour and watching be wearied and ouercome, reſolued not to giue vnto the beſieged any time of reſt, but commanded his ſouldiers againe to aſſault the breach at the Caſtle of Saint Michel,

A Michael; where they were by the valour of the defendants, with no ſmall ſlaughter quickly re pulſed: neither did the Baſſa giue ſo many aſſaults, for the hope he had to win thoſe places, but rather to perform the duty of a valiant Generall, and to ſatisfie Solymans pleaſure, who had expreſſely commanded, either to win that Iſland, or there all to loſe their liues. He alſo ſent a

In the meane time thoſe two gallies of Malta (which we haue before ſpoken of) departing from Meſſana, came to Syracuſa, where they ſtaied a day. The next day after, in going out of the hauen, they met with one of Malta in a ſmall boat comming from Pozalo ſore wounded: B he being demanded how hee was ſo hurt; told them, That landing by night with his boat and one companion, he was requeſted by two Sicilians which dwelt there, to reſt there that night: which they doing, about midnight fiue Turks brake into the houſe vpon them, killed his companion, carried away the Sicilians, and he wounded as he was, hardly eſcaped by the benefit of the night: moreouer he ſaid, That the Sicilians had told the Turkes, that two gallies were come into that port, with ſouldiers and other warlike prouiſion bound for Malta, Wherby the knights perceiued, that their comming would be diſcouered vnto the enemie, and that it was a moſt dangerous thing, or rather impoſſible to get into the hauen of Malta, as they had before purpoſed: neuertheleſſe, to conduct Salazar with his little boat, they kept on their courſe. But as they were ſailing, they deſcried two gallies and one galliot going before them, who ſeeing C the gallies comming after them, made with all ſpeed to Malta: and were no doubt thoſe gal-lies, from whence thoſe fiue Turkes came, which had done thoſe things which the wounded Maltæſe reported. For all that, theſe gallies kept on their courſe as far as Pozalo, from whence they certified the Viceroy by letters, all that had happened: and not daring to put to ſea, the South wind blowing with a ſtiffe gale againſt them, they returned backe againe to Syracuſa, expecting there farther direction from the Viceroy. For which cauſe, they forthwith ſent one of the knights to him to Meſſana; by whom they receiued anſwere, That they ſhould goe no farther, but to ſtay for the comming of the whole fleet, ready in ſhort time to paſſe ouer to Malta. But Salazar brought by the gallies to Pozalo, reſolued with his little boat to go on: & although the day he departed thence, the aire was troubled with great wind, thunder & rain, D yet the dayes following proouing more calme, he in ſhort time arriued in the Iſland of Malta, Salazar a Spaniſh captaine ouerthroweth the Turks camp. and came in ſafetie to the citie Melita; and there diſguiſed himſelfe in Turkiſh apparell, and taking with him one companion, who could alſo ſpeake the Turkiſh language, by night got into the enemies camp: where diligently marking all things, they perceiued that there was in al the Turks army of land ſoldiers ſcarce 14000, and of them many wounded and ſicke; and that the reſt was but an vnſeruiceable and feeble multitude, for that the courſe of warres had (as commonly it doth) conſumed their beſt ſouldiers. When they had thus viewed the camp, they returned again to the citie; from whence Salazar with one Petrus Paccius a Spaniard, a venturous and valiant man, went to a certaine place neere vnto the watch tower of Maleca: which when they had curiouſly viewed, Paccius was there left, that obſeruing the ſignes from the Iſland of E Gaulos and the citie of Melita, hee might giue knowledge of all things to the Viceroy at his approch, as he was by Salazar inſtructed. As for Salazar himſelfe, he in his little boat (which at his comming into the Iſle hee had there left) happily returned to Meſſana, and there declared vnto the Viceroy all that hee had ſeene: conſtantly affirming amongſt other things, That the Turkes fleete was but weake, lame, and diſfurniſhed both of men and munition, farre vnable to encounter with 10000 Chriſtians. About which time alſo, one of the two frigots which were before ſent to Malta, returned with another Spaniard, & a fugitiue from the Turks campe: and foure gallies before gone from Meſſana, were alſo come in with fourteene Turks taken about the Iſland of Malta, who all confirmed the ſame that was by Salazar reported: F Which was, That the Turkes armie was with often aſſaults wonderfully weakened, both in number and ſtrength; ſo that they could not with ſtripes be enforced to the aſſault, for which the Baſſa had with his owne hands ſlaine diuers of them: and that which more encreaſed their feare, they ſaw none of their men wounded, but that they died thereof: Beſides that, they ſaw the Chriſtians with inuincible courage to defend their ſtrong places, and not to ſpend one ſhot in vaine: Wherefore they were ſorie, and repented that they euer tooke in hand

that expedition; they deteſted ſuch a war, ſhrinking as much as they could from the aſſault, and as they might ſtealing quite away, which many of them did, ſpecially ſuch as had before abiured the Chriſtian Faith. For which cauſe diligent watch and ward was kept, and commandement giuen by the great Baſſa, that they ſhould reſolue with themſelues either to winne the towne, or there all to lay vp their bones, for that the great Sultan Solyman had ſo commanded, whom to gainſay, was in it ſelfe death. Theſe and ſuch like perſuations, cauſed the Viceroy ſomwhat the ſooner to thinke of the bringing forth of his fleet: the beſieged in the meantime did what men might for defence of the place & themſelues. There was in the caſtle one Franciſcus Giuara captain of the vauntgard, a noble & valiant gentleman, of a great conceit, he about ten foot from the towne wall which the enemie had with their great ordnance beaten down, cauſed a curtain to be drawn ſo foot long, & 5 foot thicke, with flankers at both ends, which in two nights was brought to perfection, & was afterwards a great help to the beſieged. The enemie in the meantime began a mine vnder the corner of the towne ditch, where Bo[illegible]ſegna a Spaniard and a moſt valiant knight had the charge: which the beſieged perceiuing, a countermine defeated the ſame. It hapned in the meantime, that as a fugitiue was ſwimming to the towne, he was taken by the enemy, which much grieued the beſieged, deſirous to haue vnderſtood ſomething of the ſtate of the enemies camp, and of their purpoſes. Now when the former mine had taken ſo euill ſucceſſe, part of the Turkes aſſailed the caſtle S. Michael, & part with gunpouder thought to haue blowne vp the caſtle bulwarke: but by the carefulneſſe and courage of the defendants, al their attempts were diſappointed; for many of the Turks were in both places ſlaine, and certaine bags of pouder taken from them in the mine. With theſe and other ſuch difficulties, Muſtapha and Piall the Turks Generals diſappointed of their hope, conſulted with the other great captaines of the army, Whether they ſhould there ſtill continue that deſperat ſiege, or depart? Where moſt were cleere of opinion, That it was beſt betime to depart. Yet for all that, the old Baſſa ſaid, He would there ſtay, vntill the galliot which he had before ſent to Conſtantinople, were returned with anſwer from Solyman, and in the meantime both by force and policie to ſeeke after victorie: which thing he oftner did, than ſtood with the broken eſtate of his armie, or of the beſieged; neither reſting himſelfe nor ſuffering others to take reſt: for one while he battered the wals, another while he wrought mines or els made bridges, ſometime he caſt vp mounts, and then again filled the ditches; and euer and anon gaue one aſſault or another. In all which doing he vſed ſuch induſtrie, that whatſoeuer he tooke in hand, was in ſhort time brought to ſuch perfection as might haue carried a ſtronger place, had not the valour of the defendants far exceeded all his ſtrong and politique deuiſes.

The Turkes mines defeated by the Chriſtians

Robles gouernor of the caſtle of S. Michael, ſlaine.

It fortuned, that as Robles the Camp-maſter, and Gouernour of the caſtle S. Michael, was by night viewing the ruins of the wall, he was ſtrucke in the head with a ſmall ſhot, and ſlain; leauing behind him to his fellowes, the great deſire of himſelfe: for why, he was a man for many his good parts (wherewith he had many times ſtood the defendants in great ſtead) worthily beloued. In whoſe ſtead the Great maſter ſent one of the Colonels that was with himſelfe, a moſt expert and reſolute captaine, to take charge of S. Michaels caſtle; who by his valiant care and prouidence ſo well diſcharged the charge committed vnto him, that as often as the Turks attempted the place, ſo often they were with loſſe repulſed.

The two gallies with the galliot, deſcried by the gallies of Malta (as we haue before ſaid) told Piall Baſſa the Admirall, that the Chriſtian fleet was ready to come forth: wherefore hee fearing the ſudden comming thereof, cauſed ſeuentie gallies to be in readineſſe: beſides which forty others lay in the hauen Marza Moxet vnſeruiceable, as wanting both men & other equipage; for that was ſpent in making bridges, mines, & other ſuch things neceſſarie for the ſiege: as for the men, they were part with ſickneſſe, and part with often aſſaults conſumed. Wherefore Piall for certaine daies kept himſelfe by day in the port Maior neere the ſhore, and by night put forth to ſea, expecting the comming of the fleet. But after long looking, when he ſaw no man appeare, hee againe landed his ſouldiers: and becauſe at land the Baſſa began to want pouder, of euery thirtie barrels of pouder in euery gally, hee tooke out twentie, and of ſome twentie fiue, or according to that proportion. After which time, the Turks began with greater fury than at any time before, to batter the walls of both townes, eſpecially with thoſe great pieces which they call Baſiliskes, whoſe ſhot of two hundred pound weight was ſeuen hands about; whereby the walls of the caſtle of S. Michael were beaten flat. And at the ſame time, time, the Baſſa at the caſtle S. Angelo, had with continual batterie ſo ſhaken the caſtle bulwark, that it was almoſt fallen quite downe. Theſe breaches thus made, when the Turks ſaw both townes bared of wals and other defendants, and laid ſo open, that nothing ſeemed now to let them to looke vpon their enemies, they made no longer ſtay, but the 18 day of Auguſt (the Sun being now at the higheſt) with all their power fiercely aſſaulted both the towns. Thrice they were repulſed, and ſtill came on afreſh; yet at length beaten downe on euery ſide with greater ſlaughter, they were glad ſhamefully to giue ouer the aſſault, and againe to retire to their trenches. In this moſt cruell fight (which endured fiue houres) the inuincible courage of the Great maſter notably appeared, who armed with a pike in his hand, and dreadfull to behold, was ſtill valiantly fighting in the face of the breach; whoſe preſence incouraged not the ſouldiers only, but euen boyes and women to fight: for ſo it is, that men are more moued with example, than with words. Yet of the great number of the Turkes, part ſtood ſtill in the towne ditch, and to ſaue themſelues from the ſhot of the caſtle bulwarke, had with wonderful celeritie caſt vp a defence of earth, fagots, and other like matter, which they did of purpoſe to approch and to vnderminethe wals, and had therefore incloſed the ſpace of fifteen elnes: which when the beſieged perceiued, they bent certaine pieces of artillerie vpon it, and ſlew many of them, and with fire conſumed what was left. The next day the aſſault was at the ſame places by the enemie renewed, who by reaſon of his number of ſoldiers might eaſily ſend freſh men in ſtead of them which were wounded or wearie: and firſt, after their wonted manner they battered both the townes all that day vntill night; afterwards the Moone ariſing, about midnight with a horrible crie they began a moſt terrible aſſault, which at the firſt much troubled the Chriſtians, who yet ſtill mindfull of their wonted valor, did ſo much with their weapons and fire-workes, that the enemie euill intreated, was glad after three houres fight to retire to his trenches. The ſame day a mine was by the defendants perceiued, at the caſtle bulwarke, wherein a hundred Turks there found, were almoſt all ſlaine, and the mine deſtroied. Yet for all this did not the enemie reſt at all, but the next day ſeuen times aſſaulted the ſame breaches, vſing now not weapons only, but fire-workes alſo; wherewith Boſninſega had his face ſo burnt, that he loſt one of his eies. At the ſame time alſo, the Turkes at a place called the Spurre, laboured mightily to haue gotten into the caſtle: where Centius a knight of an inuincible courage, got vp vpon the rampier, and with a pike couragiouſly thruſt them downe that were climing vp, and thruſting thorow one, diſcouraged the reſt, but was himſelfe wounded in the arme with a ſmal ſhot: yet when he had a little withdrawn himſelfe to haue his wound bound vp, he came againe to the rampier, and neuer departed from the fight, vntill he had (as a valiant conqueror) preſerued the place So the Turks with great ſlaughter on euery ſide repulſed, left the victory to the Chriſtians, of whom were ſlaine almoſt an hundred, and moſt of them (as at other times) with ſhot: amongſt whom were theſe moſt valiant knights; at the caſtle Angelo, Fragus; at the caſtle of S. Michael, Scipio Piatus, Ioh. Baptiſta Soderinus, Paulus Bompertus, Marius Fagianus, Raffinus, and certaine others, men worthie of longer life. The Turkes had alſo at the ſame time wrought a mine at the caſtle S. Michael, which was at once both diſcouered and deſtroied.

The Turkes at once aſſaile the townes S. Angelo and S. Michael, and are at both places repulſed.

Another aſſault

With theſe ſo many and ſo great aſſaults, certain of the knights (and thoſe not of the meaneſt ſort) fearing leſt that which was ſo often attempted by the enemy, ſhould at length be effected, told the Great maſter, That they thought it conuenient and neceſſarie, to remoouc all the records, all the pictures and reliques of the Saints, and other their religious things into the caſtle S. Angelo, there to be kept as in a place of more ſtrength and aſſurance. The Great maſter, although he well knew that they which thus ſaid, ſpake it of a good mind, was for all that with that ſpeech exceedingly moued: wherfore he ſhortly anſwered them, That ſo to do, were nothing els but to applaule & diſcourage the minds, not of the Maltæſes only, who had hitherto valiantly behaued themſelues, & don more than any man could haue hoped for, but alſo of the mercinarie ſouldiers, if they ſhould perceiue it: wherefore he was reſolued, either together to keep all, or loſe all: and becauſe none ſhould from thenceforth repoſe any hope in the ſtrength of the caſtle S. Angelo, he ſaid he would bring all the garriſon out of the caſtle into the towne, that there they might together with others withſtand the enemy; & that he would leaue in the caſtle none but gunners, who ſhould as need required ſhoot at the enemy: an anſwer truly well beſeeming a man of his place, & to be to al poſterity commended: for how can the ſouldier hope, which ſeeth his captain deſpaire of aduenture, where the chieftain ſeemes to be ſtrucke with feare? Whilest the Grand master with this answer doth both ashame them and also encourage their quailing minds; the Turks (that this day as the other three before should not passe without assault) with the dawning of the day assailed the very same places with the greatest fury possible, especially at the ruins of the castle: where San Romanus an Auergnois, which had the charge of that place, lost this short and transitorie life, winning thereby immortall fame: and at S. Michaels, Adornius one of the knights, and Fagio with certain others, were grieuously wounded: for the enemy suddenly retiring from the assault, presently so thundred into the breaches with their great and small shot, that all the Island seemed to tremble, the heauens to burne, and the aire to be darkned with smoke. In the mean time Valetta thorowly wearied with the mornings fight, had withdrawne himselfe a little to breath himselfe: when suddenly a Spanish priest, with his hands cast vp to heauen, came running to him, roaring and crying out, That all was lost and forlorne, and that three or foure ensignes of the enemies were by the castle breach broken into the towne. Which the great master hearing, suddenly clapt his helmet vpon his head, and with a pike in his hand, said vnto them that were about him,

The comfortable speech of the Great master when the Turks were entred.

Fellow souldiers, the houre is come wherein you may shew your selues the most valiant Champions of the Christian religion, if it be so, that you now also retaine the same valour which you haue in other battels shewed. There is no cause wherefore you should doubt of this last, for the enemie is the same; and the same God which hath hitherto preserued vs, will not now forsake vs: wherefore follow mee, valiant hearts.

This said, he hasted to the place where most danger was, and with him all the souldiers, all the citisens men and women, old and yong, yea the very children, all against the common enemy. There was fought a most dreadfull & dangerous battell: some kept the enemie from entring, some set vpon them that were already entred, whom they wounded, chased, and slew, although they notably resisted. Within, without, all was couered with weapons, darts, dead bodies, and bloud. The Great master was careful of al, and in euery place present, commending, exhorting, directing, as occasion required, performing at once all the duties of a most valiant souldier & worthie Generall. At length the Turkes with the setting of the Sun retired, and so the assault ceased. Thus was the Great master the vndoubted victor, but not without much bloud of his people, considering his small number: for in this fight he lost aboue 200 men, whereas of the enemies, beside them which were entred, whereof not one escaped, were slaine aboue 2000. These are those foure terrible assaults, presently giuen one after another vnto the besieged.

Garzias the Viceroy in the meane tarried for nothing else to transport his armie to Malta, but for the comming of Io. Cardona, who with twelue gallies was gone to Panormo, to conduct thence foure ships laded with prouision: but when he saw him stay long, he sent to him in post, That if he could not with such speed as was required tow forth those ships, hee should spend no longer time, but take out the prouision into his gallies, and with speed to come away, So the Viceroy with a fleet of 72 gallies the twentieth day of August set forward from Messana to Syracusa, wherein he carried ten thousand select souldiers, amongst whom were aboue two hundred knights of the Order of S. Iohn, and aboue fortie of the Order of S. Stephen, which is an Order of knights instituted by Cosmos Medices, Duke of Florence, to the imitation of the knights of Malta in the yeare 1561, and haue their residence at Cosmopolis, a new built city in the Island of Elba in the Tuscane sea, ouer against Piombino. Besides these Knights, in this fleet were diuers noble and valiant gentlemen of Italie, Sicilie, and other countries. The fleet being arriued at Syracusa, the Viceroy sent Auria with one gallie and a boat to Malta, to land a man, to know of Paccius (left, as we haue before said, for a watch in the Island at Maleca) what newes, or what he had seen. By whom it was vnderstood, That no ship was seene at sea, but one galliot, which the one and twentieth day of August in the morning made towards Gaulos, & the same day towards night as hee was informed by the watchmen of Maleca, sixteene gallies came to water at Saline, but what became of them afterwards, by reason of the comming on of the night could not be descried

In this while the besieged had notably repaired the breach at the castle bulwarke, & had in sundry places aptly placed certain great pieces to flanker the ditches, & to beat the mount cast vp by the enemie at the bulwarke of Boninsegna, that they might from thence annoy all the plain of the castle with their smal shot. But the Turks hauing determined with all their forces at once to assault both the townes as before, brought an engine made of spars and boords, able to couer thirty men, vnder the breach at S. Michaels: whereby it came to passe, that none of the defendefendants could without danger shew themselues in the breach: which when they could by no means endure, they suddenly sallied out, & putting them to flight which were there couered, set fire on the engine and burnt it. In like manner, they which besieged the new city, were repulsed at the castle breach, & another like engine burnt. The next night, certain of the watch of the castle issued out, and hauing destroied the Turks engines prepared for the assailing of that place, and slaine them that were set for the keeping thereof, returned in safety into the castle. But when the enemies both that day and others following rested not, but repairing their mines, mounts, and engines, laboured in both places ro haue beaten the Christians from the wals; all their endeuour and labour was by the industry and valor of the defendants made frustrate. The besieged had at the castle breach made a mine, and laid in it eight barrels of pouder, that if the enemie should againe assault that place, he might there be blown vp: but whilst the Turks were for like purpose working a mine in the same place, they chanced vpon the mine before made, which they spoiled, and carried away all the pouder. Thus whilest they labour both on the one side and the other, Mustapha the Generall, a most expert and famous commander, considering that Summer now so far spent, he was not to vse longer delay; and withal, that resolute perseuerance oftentimes in war findeth out a way to victory; determined with all his power once againe to assault the castle S. Michael. Wherefore displaying the stately standerd of the Turkish Emperor, vpon the point whereof was fastened a globe of Gold, he commanded his souldiers to enter the breach; who now like desperat men attempted to haue performed his command, and were by the Christians valiantly encountred: so that in the breach was made a most terrible & doubtful fight. But when the Turks had now bin twice reiected & beaten downe; Mustapha perceiuing his souldiers as men halfe discouraged, but faintly to maintain the assault, came himselfe to the places, praying and exhorting them not to be discouraged, but that day to confirme their former labors and victories; and not to suffer their vanquished enemies to triumph ouer them: hee told them that the enemie had now no defence left wherewith to couer himselfe, that all was beaten downe flat, and that there remained only a few wearie & maimed bodies, which were not able long to indure the edge of their swords; that with such resolution they had before won the castle S. Elmo: last of all, hee by promising to some mony, to some honor and preferment, threatning some, & requesting others, incouraged some one way, some another, euery one according to his quality and disposition: who moued either with their Generals presence, promises, or threats, gaue a fresh and fierce assault. The fight was on both sides terrible, yet at length the Turks were again inforced to retire: for the defendants had cast vp a rampier, wheron they had fitly placed two field-pieces, wherwith they sore troubled the enemie, and at the first shot strucke in sunder one of those wooden engines, which the enemie had made stronger than the rest, couered with raw hides to keep it from burning, and rent in pieces fortie souldiers which were vnder it: and the same night they which were in the other towne and the castle bulwarke, sallying couragiously out, destroied all the enemies defences, and draue them from a mount which they had made vpon the fortifications of the Christians: whereby they perceiued plainly, what small courage the Turks had to fight, for vpon that mount they were almost 300, wheras of our men was but 25, with which smal number for all that, they had no mind to deale. The defendants had for like purpose as before, made another mine at the castle bulwarke, but perceiuing that it was in danger to be found by the enemie in repairing his fortifications without, they suddenly put fire vnto it, by force whereof threescore Turks which were within the danger of the place, were blowne vp and slaine.

The Turkes inforced to retire

Garzias the Viceroy, in the mean while that these things were in doing, departing with his fleet from Syracusa, with a prosperous wind kept on his course toward Pachynum, where they descried a tall ship at sea, driuen thither (as was afterward knowne) by tempest: shee out of the Island Mening was carrying a great supply of shot and pouder vnto the Turkes campe at Malta; but now ouertaken by the Christian fleet, easily yeelded, and was by the Viceroy sent by other mariners to Syracusa. And now the Christian fleet carried with a faire gale towards Malta, suddenly arose such a tempest from the East, that they were driuen to the Island Ægusa, two hundred and twentie miles West of Malta, from whence the first of September letters were brought from the Viceroy to the Great master, certifying him, That hee would in short time come with his fleet and relieue him. The same day also a Christian fled out of the Turks gallies, wherein he was captiue, to the city S. Angelo; who reported, That in the Turks camp were were few men able to fight, moſt of the armie being with wounds, famine, ſickneſſe, and other miſeries brought to extreame weakneſſe: and beſides that, that infinit numbers of them died daily: yet for all that he ſaid moreouer, that they were determined to beſiege the citie of Melita, and had already for that purpoſe mounted fiue great pieces of artillerie for batterie; and that they had but a few daies before taken twelue, & the laſt day of all fourteene horſemen of the garriſon ſouldiers of that citie. In the meane while the fleet which was driuen (as we ſaid) to Æguſa, the rage of the ſea being now well appeaſed, came to Drepanum, and from thence toward Gaulos, as was before intended: where by the way the two gallies of Malta light vpon two of the Turks galliots, and tooke them.

The Chriſtian fleet commeth to Gaulos.

The fift day of September the Chriſtian fleet came to Gaulos, where the Viceroy perceiuing not the appointed ſigne from Malta, whereby he might ſafely land, returned forthwith backe againe to Pozalo. Another Auria immediatly following him, told him, That he had ſeen the ſignes, and aſſured him of ſafe landing in the Iſland of Malta: wherewith the Viceroy encouraged, the next day towards night returned againe to Gaulos.

A fugitiue diſcouereth the enemies purpoſes to the Great maſter.

The ſame day a Chriſtian captiue fled from the Turks to S. Angelo, and told the Great maſter, That hee was come to bring him good newes, how that the Turkes had determined to proue their laſt fortune in aſſaulting the Caſtle S. Michael, which they would do the next day: where if the ſucceſſe were anſwerable to their deſire, they would then tarrie, but if not, then forthwith to be gone: and that Muſtapha the more to encourage his ſouldiers, had promiſed fiue talents of gold to the enſigne bearers, that ſhould firſt aduance their enſignes vpon the wals and farther to promote them to greater places of honor; as for the reſt, he would reward euery one of them according to their deſert, either with mony or preferment. Valetta thinking all theſe things to be by Gods appointment diſcouered vnto him by ſuch men, as they had from time to time been: firſt gaue thanks vnto Almighty God; and after that, with all diligence prepared ſuch things as he thought moſt neceſſary for the repulſing of the enemy. But the Turks all that day with their great ordnance battered the new citie, and the ſhipping in the hauen, in ſuch ſort that one of the great ſhips was there ſunke.

In the morning Garzias the Viceroy with his fleet arriued at the Iſland of Malta, and there quickly and quietly landed his forces, and whileſt his gallies watered at Gaulos, went forward with the armie about halfe a mile, inſtructing the Generalls and Colonells, what he thought needful to be done, commanding all proclamations and commands to be made in the name of the king of Spaine, vntill they came to the Great maſter, and then in all things to obey him as their Soueraigne: and charged Aſcanius Cornia the Generall, in all his actions to follow the counſell of the greater part. So in few words exhorting them to play the men, hee left them marching towards Melita. About noone he retired to his gallies, and ſailing Eaſtward, came with all his fleet within the ſight of the citie of Melita, about 3 miles diſtant from the South ſhore. They of the citie vpon ſight of the fleet, in token of ioy diſcharged all the great artillerie, which was anſwered from the fleet, by diſcharging all their great ordnance twice. After that, he returned as he had before determined into Sicilia, to take into his gallies the Duke of Vrbins companies, which were come to Meſſana, and certaine bands of Spaniards at Syracuſa, and ſo forthwith to return to Malta, to attend the departing of the Turks fleet, being now euill appointed, and already as good as halfe ouerthrowne.

The Turks, who (as is before ſaid) had purpoſed to proue their laſt fortune vpon the towne of S. Michael, had now certaine daies before the comming of the fleet, begun to truſſe vp their baggage: but as ſoon as they heard that the fleet was come, and the army landed, there ſuddenly aroſe a wonderful tumultuous confuſion amongſt them, ſome cried, Arme, arme, and other-ſome as faſt to be gone: and being generally all afraid, euery one according to his diſpoſition, betooke himſelfe to his weapons or to his heels; the greateſt number thruſt together into their trenches as neere as they could vnto the great ordnance: and ſo burning the engines and fortifications, with all the ſpeed they could imbarked their great ordnance and baggage. Which they in the town of S. Angelo perceiuing, not expecting the commandement of the Great maſter in ſo ſudden an opportunity, courageouſly ſallied outto Burmola, where certain Turks kept a huge great piece of ordnance; who now hauing no minde to fight, betooke themſelues to flight, & forſooke the piece; which they of the town preſently drew within their wals: and if the new come forces had that day charged the enemy as they diſorderly ran to their gallies, happily

A pily they had either found an occaſion of victory, or at leaſtwiſe taken from them the greateſt part of their artillerie. But it may be, that they followed the old militarie ſaying, That vnto the fl ing enemie a man ſhould make a bridge of ſiluer. Beſides that, they thinking it not conuenient to depart from the prouiſion and things which they had brought for the reliefe of the beſieged, which for the roughneſſe of the way and want of horſes were hardly carried, would not prouoke the enemy with any skirmiſh: wherby it came to paſſe, that the Turks without let imbarked their great ordnance, their baggage, and moſt part of their army. The 11 of September, whileſt the Turks fleet was brought out of the hauen Marza Moxet, a fugitiue of Genoa came in haſt to the Great maſter, & told him, that 10000 Turks were marching toward Melita, to meet with the Chriſtians vpon the way. Which thing the Great maſter hearing, preſently

The Turks fleet departing out of the hauen Marza Moxet to the port of S. Paul, there landed ſeuen thouſand men, with Muſtapha their Generall, who was falſly informed, That the Chriſtians were not aboue three thouſand ſtrong: and from thence incouraged with the ſmall number of the enemie (as they ſuppoſed) they marched directly toward Melita. The Chriſtians alſo marching orderly & ready to giue battell, held on their way to meet them: and at the riſing of an hill both armies meeting together, they gaue a great ſhout, and withall the formoſt began the battell, where ſome few were at the firſt ſlain on both ſides. Brother Valetta, Master of the Hospitall of Ierusalem, to the reuerend and religious our welbeloued brother in Christ, George of Hohenheim, called Bombast, Prior of our Priorie in Almaine, greeting.

Although wee doubt not but that by the letters and relation of many, you alreadie vnderstand of the comming of the Turkes to inuade these Islands, or rather vtterly to subuert our Societie: And the happily and heauenly victorie by vs obtained of it: yet if the same things shall by our letters also bee brought vnto you, wee haue thought the same will be vnto you a thing much more pleasing. For seeing that wee are certainly perswaded, that you in this no lesse happie than wholesome successe will giue most heartie thanks to Almightie God, and that the fruit of this good shall most of all redound vnto you, for the honour which you beare in our Order; wee haue willingly determined to participate this our ioy with you, and plainely and openly to protest, That we attribute this so notable and wonderfull a victorie to our Lord Christ Iesus, the greatest King of all Kings, and authour of all good things. Which that you may the more worthily and willingly doe, we will declare the whole matter, not at large (for that were to write an historie) but briefly and in few words. Sultan Solyman the most mortall enemie of the Christian name, and especially of our Societie, not contented to haue spoyled vs of the most famous Island of the Rhodes, the castle of Tripolis, and almost whatsoeuer we had else; commanded a great and strong fleet to be made readie against vs; which departing from Constantinople the one and twentieth day of March, arriued heere the eighteenth day of May: Which fleet consisted of almost two hundred and fiftie gallies, galliots, and other ships. The number of the enemie that bare armes, according to the truth, was about fortie thousand more or lesse: Generall of the land forces, was Mustapha Bassa; and of the fleet, Piall Bassa was Admirall: who hauing spent a few dayes in landing their forces, viewing the places, pitching their tents, and setting things in order (as the manner of warre is) they began first to assaile the castle of S. Elmo (scituat in the mouth of the hauen, with great force, & a most furious batterie. Which when they had many dayes done without intermission, and had opened a great part of the wall, and with all kind of weapons assaulted the breach: yet was it by the valour and prowesse of our Knights, and other worthie souldiers, kept and defended by the space of thirtie fiue dayes, with the great losse and slaughter of the enemie: although the Castle it selfe, in the iudgement of many, seemed not possible to be but a few daies defended against so great a force. At length the foure and twentieth day of Iune, when our men could no longer indure the multitude and furie of the enemie, enuironed and shut vp both by sea and land, and destitute of all helpe, the castle was taken by the Turkes; those few of our men which were left, being all slaine. Of which victorie they being proud, began to besiege the castle and towne of S. Michael, and this new citie, especially at the castle and Portingall bulwarke: and (as their manner is) with great diligence and greater force and number of great Artillerie and warlike engines, they began in diuers places at once to batter and beat downe the walls. Which siege, the dreadful armie of the Turks by sea and land, made to bee most fearefull and terrible, with such huge great ordnance, as the like for bignesse and force was in no place to bee seene; day and night thundering out their yron and stone shot, fiue and seuen hands about; wherewith not the thickest wals, but euen the very mountaines themselues might haue beene beaten downe and ouerthrowne: by furie whereof, the wals in many places were so battered, that a man might easily haue entered as on plaine ground. Where, when the barbarous enemies had with wonderfull force and hideous outcries oftentimes attempted to enter, so often were they with great slaughter and dishonour repulsed and beaten backe, many of their men slaine or wounded. Their Generalls, as well at sea as land, after that they had in so many places, with all their forces in almost foure moneths siege and assault, with exceeding furie in vaine attempted the breaches, and lost the greatest part of their old souldiers, especially Winter now comming on, wherein all warres by law of nations ought to cease; thought of nothing else but of departure, or rather of flight: which the comming of Garzias of Toledo, Viceroy of Sicilia, and Admirall of the King of Spaine his fleet, with ten thousand select souldiers (amongst whom was at the least two hundred and foureteene of our knights, and many other noble and valiant Gentlemen; which onely with a Christian zeale, voluntarily met together from diuers parts of the World to helpe and relieue vs) caused them to hasten. So haue you summarily and in few words, the proceedings and flight of the Turkes fleet, and the victorie by vs (by the power of God) thereof obtained. It shall be your part to consider and coniecture, in what state state our Order and this Island now standeth, into what poore estate we are brought, how many things we want; wherein except we be relieued by the helpe and aid of our Brethren, especially such as you are, as we well hope, and assuredly beleeue we shall, our State will quickely take end. Fare you well.

The Great master thus deliuered of so great a siege, and bountifully relieued by the Christian Princes, and the great Commanders of his Order; speedily repaired the breaches and places battered, and with new fortifications strengthened those places as hee had by the late passed dangers perceiued to be most subiect to the enemies force.

After the returne of the Turks fleet to Constantinople, Solyman being exceeding angry with the gouernor of the Island of Chios his tributarie, as well for that he had during the late siege of Malta, had intelligence with the Great master, and reuealed vnto him many of the Turkes designes; as also for detaining of two yeares tribute, which was yerely ten thousand duckets, and had also neglected to send his wonted Presents to the great Bassa's, who therfore the more incensed the Tyrant; commanded Piall Bassa his Admirall to make readie his fleet, and by force or policie to take that fruitfull and pleasant Island wholly into his own hand. Who without delay, with a fleet of eightie gallies the fifteenth day of Aprill in the yeare 1566, being then Easter day, arriued at Chios. The chiefe men of the Island vpon sight of the fleet, forthwith sent Embassadors to the Bassa with presents, curteously offering vnto him the hauen, and whatsoeuer els he should require. Piall with great kindnesse accepted their offer, and presently possessed himselfe of the hauen in three places: and afterward landing, sent for the gouernour of the city and twelue of the chiefe citizens to come vnto him, as if hee had had some speciall matter to confer with him about from the great Sultan, before his departure thence for Malta or Italie. Who hauing a little conferred together, went to him with great feare; and that not without cause; for as soone as they were come before him, he commanded them to be layd hold vpon and cast fast into yrons: which done, the souldiers forthwith tooke the towne hall, and without resistance pulling downe the townes ensigne, (wherin was the picture of S. George with a red Crosse) in stead thereof set vp one of the Turks: the like whereof was done with great reioicing of the Turks, thorow the whole Island. After that, they rifled the Churches, and againe consecrated them after their Mahometan manner. The gouernour of the citie, and the Senators, with their families, the Bassa sent in fiue ships to Constantinople: as for the vulgar people, they were at choice, either there to tarrie still, or depart, as best stood with their liking. And so the Bassa, when he had there placed a new gouernour, one of the Turks, with a strong garrison, and set vp the Mahometane superstition in that most fertile Island, departed thence for Italie: where sailing alongst the coast of Apulia, he did exceeding much harme in burning and destroying the country villages, and carrying away of the poore people into captiuitie; and so returned.

At this time the kingdome of Hungarie was most miserably rent in pieces by the lieutenants and captains of Solyman and Maximilian the Emperor, and Iohn the Vayuod of Transiluania Solymans vassall: who grieued with the harmes done vnto him by the Emperors captaines, whereof himself was the cause, and vainly hoping to haue obtained at Solymans hands the greatest part of the kingdome of Hungarie, as had somtime king Iohn; ceased not continually to solicite him to come himselfe in person to make a full conquest of the reliques of Hungarie, yet holden by the Emperor and some of the Hungarian nobilitie: and flattering himselfe in that vaine hope, called himselfe the king of Hungary: and increasing his strength by letters vnto the nobilitie and burgesses of the cities of Hungarie, summoned them, as if it had bin by the appointment of Solyman his great Patron, that they should all the ninth of March meet together at Thorda, to determine with him of matters concerning their common good. Which thing as soone as Lazarus Swendi the Emperors lieutenant vnderstood, he forthwith by other letters countermanded those of the Vayuods; perswading the Hungarians not to listen to the charms of the Vayuod and the Turke, tending to their destruction, but rather to yeeld their obedience to Maximilian the Christian Emperour, whose purpose was by the aid of the Christian Princes, to protect and preserue them in peace. And hereby it came to passe, that the remainders of this sore shaken Kingdome, diuided into factions, and diuersly carried, according to their affection, some to the one side, some to the other, began afresh to worke one anothers confusion, confusion, which fitly serued the Turks to incroach more and more vpon them: Who at the same time surprised the towne of Ainatsch (the captain whereof, with certaine of the garison soldiers being gon about their busines to Agria) and put to the sword all them that they found in the towne. They thought also to haue taken the strong town of Sigeth, but were by the valiant Countie Nicholaus Serinus gouernor thereof, couragiously encountred, and after foure houres hard fight ouerthrowne and put to flight. Not long after, they ranged vp and down the country, and set in booties as far as Iula and Rab, and did the country people much harme. For which cause, Maximilian the Emperor about the latter end of May brake vp the assembly of the Empire then holden at Augusta, and began carefully to prouide things needfull for the war: appointing his commings for the raising of such forces in Germany, as were but a little before granted vnto him by the Princes and States of the Empire; in their late assemblie; but went himselfe to Vienna. For it was told him (as the truth was) that Solyman now in his extreame age was with a mightie army set forward from Constantinople, and marching through Bulgaria and Seruia, was come directly to Belgrade; where Iohn the Vayuod of Transyluania met him, and kissing his hand, had commended himselfe and all his state vnto his protection. At which time Suendi the Emperors lieutenant laid hard siege to the towne of Husth in the borders of Transyluania. The Bassa of Buda at the same time on the other side, by commandement of Solyman, with 8000 Turks and 25 pieces of great ordnance besieging Palotta (a strong towne about eight miles from Rab) had with continuall batterie by the space of eight dayes brought the same into great danger, although it was valiantly defended by George Thuriger. But hearing of the approch of George Countie of Helffenstein, sent by the Emperor with certaine companies of Germans to relieue the same, he rise in such hast from the siege, that he left certaine of his great ordnance and a great part of his baggage behinde him, and retyred towards Alba Regalis. The Countie hauing relieued the town, caused the breaches to be forthwith repaired, and with a new supplie strengthned the old garrison. Thus was a most lamentable war at once begun in diuers places of Huugarie. After that, the Countie of Helffenstein, strengthned by the comming of the Countie Salma with certaine companies from Rab, departed from Palotta, and came to Vesprinium a citie about two miles off, then holden by the Turks: which citie he tooke by force the last of Iune, and left not a Turke aliue therein, because that they a few dayes before had cruelly slaine certaine Christians whome they had taken prisoners. So leauing strong garrisons both in Vesprinium and Palotta, they returned to Rab. Shortly after, the Countie Salma laid siege to Tatta a strong towne, otherwise called Dotis, betwixt Rab and Comara, which at length he tooke by assault the eight and twentieth day of Iuly, and slew all the Turks, except fiftie, which flying into one of the towers of the castle, yeelded vpon composition: amongst whom was the late gouernor of Vesprinium, and the gouernor of this place, with the Bassa of Buda his nigh kinseman, who were all presently sent prisoners to Vienna. So the Countie following the course of his victory (the reason of his former good fortune running before him into the Turks strongest holds) was on his way to haue besieged Gestes a town neere to Palotta: when the Turks there in garrison vpon the first sight of his Armie, left all and fled out at the farther side of the Towne to Strigonium. After whose example other of the Turkes garrisons in Witha, Tschokiku, and Sambok, castles thereabouts, set fire on that they could not carrie, and followed their fellowes to Strigonium also. The Emperor vnderstanding of the good successe of his Captaines, caused publique prayers with thankesgiuing to Almightie God to be made thorow all the Churches thereabouts. Also Countie Serinus Gouernour of the strong towne of Sigeth and the Countrey thereabout, certainly aduertised of the comming of Solyman, sent Casparus Alapianus and Nicholas Cobeck, two of his Captaines, with a thousand foot and fiue hundred horse, to lie in wait for the forrunners of the Turkes Armie: who drawing neere vnto the place where these Turkes lay, not farre from Quinque Ecclesiæ, suddenly in the shutting in of the next day set vpon them, doubting no such matter, and put them in such feare, that they disorderedly fled, some one way, some another, and were most of them slaine or wounded by the Hungarians in their flight. Hali Beg one of the Turks great Sanzackes and leader of that compañie, sore wounded, and seeking to saue himselfe by flight in the Marishes, there perished: his sonne and many other notable men amongst the Turks, were there taken and caried prisoners to Sigeth. The spoile the Hungarians there tooke was exceeding great: for beside plate and coine, whereof they found.

found good store, they tooke eight Camels, fiue Mules, threescore horses, and six carts laden with all manner of spoile, and many garments of great price; wherein the Gentlemen attired, returned to Sigeth in great brauerie, with two faire red ensignes of the enemies. A great prey.

Maximilian the Emperor long before aduertised of Solymans purpose for the conquest of the remainder of Hungarie; to withstand so mightie an enemy, had beside the forces raised in his owne Dominions, procured great aid both of the States of the Empire and other Christian Princes, which about this time met together at Rab. First there repaired thither foure legions of German footmen, and vpwards of twentie thousand horsemen, with foure thousand Hungarians: the Duke of Sauoy sent thither foure hundred Argoletiers, and many noble gentlemen out of diuers parts of Europe reserted thither, to serue the Emperor in those warres, of their owne charge; especially the Knights of Malta: and out of Italie, Prosper Columna and Angelus Cæsius: out of France, Guise the graund Prior, Brissack, and Lansack, who but a little before were going to Malta, of purpose to haue serued there if the Turks fleet had come thither againe, as it was reported it would; but vnderstanding that it came not, returned directly into Hungarie, with certaine other Knights of the Order. Many also of the Princes and free cities of Italie declared their good will toward the Emperor in this war; some sending him men, as did Cosmus Medices Duke of Florence, who sent thither of his owne charge three thousand footmen: some money, as Mantua, Genoa, and Luca. Thither came also Alphonsus duke of Ferrara with a gallant companie of noble gentlemen, and other his followers. Beside which land forces, the Emperour had also prouided vpon the riuer of Danubius twelue gallies, and thirtie other ships for burthen, so made, as that the men could not be hurt with the Turkes arrowes: wherein was imbarqued three thousand souldiers, most part Italians, vnder the conduct of Philippus Flachius a German and one of the Knights of Malta, who was afterward receiued into the number of the Princes of the Empire.

Solyman comming to the riuer Dranus, commanded a bridge to be made ouer that great Riuer, and the deepe tens on the farther side of the riuer towards Sigeth, for the transporting of his great armie; a worke of such difficultie, that being thrice vnfortunately begun, it was again giuen ouer, as a thing almost impossible. Wherwith Solyman was so moued, that in his rage he swore to hang vp the great Bassa that had the charge of that worke, if he did not with as much speed as were possible, bring it to perfection. Whereupon the worke was againe begun, all the boats that were to be found in the riuer taken vp, and timber for the purpose brought from far, for the making of that bridge. In this worke were imploied not the vulgar people onely, of the countrey which was tributarie to the Turks, but the gentlemen themselues also, were by the imperious Turke (now commanding for his life) inforced to lay their fingers to worke day and night without ceasing, vntill the bridge (which before was thought scarce possible to haue beene made) was by the restlesse industrie and labour of such a multitude of men, in the space of ten daves brought to perfection. Wherein the seuerity the barbarous Tyrant vseth towards his subiects, is worth the noting; whereby he extorteth from them more than is almost possible for men to performe: so that it is not to be maruelled, that he hath so good successe in whatsoeuer he taketh in hand. Ouer this bridge (a mile in length) passed Solyman, and incamped at a place called Muhatchz, where he stayed certaine dayes, vntill his armie was all come ouer. The last of Iuly, ninetie thousand Turks (the vauntgard of Solymans army) came before Sigeth, and incamped within a mile of the towne: after whom shortly after followed a hundred thousand more out of Solymans campe; of whom many in approching the town, were slain with great shot out of the castle: the rest for all that incamped themselues as neere vnto the towne as they could, and began the siege. The Turkes with much labour make a bridge ouer the great riuer of Dranus. The Turkes encampe before Sigeth.

The towne of Sigeth is strongly scituate in a marish on the North side of Dranus vpon the frontiers of Dalmatia, commanding all the countrey round about it, which of it taketh name; and was at that time a strong bulwarke against the Turks, for entring farther into the country that way toward Stiria. In this town was gouernor Nicholaus Serinus, commonly called the Countie, a valiant man, and a mortall enemie of the Turks, with a garrison of two thousand three hundred good souldiers: who seeing the hugie armie of the Turks, called together into the Castle, the Captaines of the garrison, and the chiefe of the Citizens; where standing in the midst of them, he spake vnto them as followeth:

You see (said he) how we are on euery side beset with the multitude of our enemies, wherein resteth their chiefe hope: but let not vs be thereof affraid or discouraged; for that victorie dependeth not of a confused multitude of heartlesse men, but of the power of our God, who hath by a few at his pleasure many times ouerthrowne the mightie armies of the proud; and will not in the middest of these dangers now forsake vs, if we putting our trust and confidence in him, do what beseemeth valiant and couragious men. Besides that, our iust cause, with the strength of the place we hold, our owne valour, and the helpe of our friends, who I assure my selfe wil not faile vs at our need, counternaileth their confused multitude, forced together by their imperious commanders out of far countries, and whatsoeuer els the proud tyrant hath brought with him into the field. Wherefore let vs all as becommeth valiant men, for the truth of our Religion, and for the honour of our Prince and Countrey, liue and die together; knowing whatsoeuer befall, that to a life so lost belongeth a most assured hope of ioy and felicitie. As for my selfe, I am resolued, and so I hope are you also, that as I am a Christian, and free borne, so will I (by the grace of God) in the same faith and freedome end my dayes. Neither shall the proud Turke, so long as I am able to hold vp this hand, haue euer power to comand ouer me, or the ground whereon I stand.

This said, he first tooke himselfa solemne oath to perform what he had promised, and perswaded the rest to take the like: which done: euery man returned to the place of his charge.

Solyman commeth into the camp at Sigeth.

The fift of August Solyman incamped within a mile of the towne, and the next day after came himselfe into the campe, at whose comming the great ordnance and small shot so thundred out of the Turks campe, as if heauen and earth should haue gon together, the Turks after their wonted manner crying aloud their Alla, Alla, Alla, and the Christians answering them with the name of Iesus. The seuenth of August the Turks cast vp a great mount, and thereon planted certain great pieces of ordnance. The next day following they began most terribly to batter the new towne in three places, and with incredible labor cast vp a mount in the midst of the marish, as it were in the towne ditch, from whence they the next day with certaine pieces of great artillerie day & night battered the inner castle of the town without any intermission, & did great harme both to the castle and the defendants. The Countie perceiuing the new citie to be now so laid open with the furie of the Turks batterie, as that it was not possible to be defended, caused his souldiers to set it all on fire, and to retire into the old. The tenth of August the Turks furiously battered the old towne in three places, & brought their ordnance into the new town: and with timber, earth, and rubbish, made a bridge, the more commodiously to goe ouer the marish. For the speedier accomplishment whereof, all the Turkes were compelled to lay to their hands, and to carrie wood, fagots, earth, and such like things without ceasing. There might a man haue seen all the fields ful of camels, horses, and of the Turks themselues, like emmets, carrying wood, earth, stones, or one thing or other to fill vp the marish: so was there with wonderfull labor two plaine waies made thorow the deepe fen, from the towne to the Castle: where the Ianizaries, defended from the great shot with sacks of wool and such like things, did with the multitude of their small shot so ouerwhelme the defendants, that they could not against those places without most manifest danger shew themselues vpon the walls. So that what by their vigilant industrie, and the furie of the great artillerie, the Turkes (though not without great losse) by force entred the old towne the nineteenth of August, vsing in their victorie such celeritie, that they slew many of the most valiant defendants before they were able to recouer the safegard of the castle. Both the townes thus lost, and so many worthy men slain, not without cause brought great heauinesse vpon the rest which were in the Castle with the Countie. The Turks possessed of the old town, the next day planted their batterie against the castle in foure places, and with fagots, rubbish, and earth, made two plaine waies vnto it, still filling vp the marish: and hauing with continual batterie made it saultable, the nine and twentieth day of August they began fiercely to assaile the breaches: but when they had lost many of their men, & done what they could, they were inforced with shame to retire. In this assault, amongst many other of their best souldiers, was lost one of their great Bassa's also.

Whilest these things were in doing, Solyman far spent with yeres, and distempered with his long trauell, fell sicke of a looseues of his bellie, and for the better recouerie of his health, retired himselfe (the siege yet continuing) to Quinque Ecclesiæ a citie neere to Sigeth, where shortly after he died of the bloudie flix the fourth day of September, in the yeare of our Lord 1566, when he had liued 76 yeares, and thereof raigned 46. He was of stature tall, of feature slender,

A slender, long necked, his colour pale and wan, his nose long and hooked, of nature ambitious & bountifull, more faithfull of his word and promise than were for most part the Mahomerane kings his progenitors, wanting nothing worthie of so great an empire, but that wherin all happinesse is contained, faith in Christ Iesus. Muhamet the Visier Bassa (who all commanded in Solymans absence) fearing the insolencie of the Ianizaries, and lest some tumult should arise in the camp, if his death should be known, concealed it by all means: and to be sure of them that were of all others best able to make certain report therof, caused his Physitions and Apothecaries to be secretly strangled, & by a trusty messenger, sent in post, certified Selymus (Solymans only son, and his father in law, then lying in Magnesia) of the death of his father, willing him in haste to repaire to Constantinople, to take possession of the empire; and that done, forthwith to

B come to the armie in Hungarie. But this could not be so secretly done, but that the Ianizaries began to mistrust the matter: which Muhamet Bassa quickly perceiuing, caused the dead bodie of Solyman in his wonted apparel to be brought into his tent sitting vpright in his horse-litter, as if he had bin sicke of the gout his wonted disease, and so shewing him to the Ianizaries, both deceiued and contented them, and so went forward with the siege.

The great bulwarke undermined & set on fire by the Ianizaries.

The Ianizaries hauing in the last assault lost many of their fellows, began now to vndermine the greatest bulwarke of the castle, from which the defendants with their great ordnance, did most annoy them: wherein they vsed such diligence, that the fift of September they with gunpouder and other light matter prouided for that purpose, had set all the bulwarke on a light fire; and by that means possessed therof, with al their force assailed the bulwark next vnto the

C castle gate, from whence they were with great slaughter twice repulsed by the Countie. But the raging fire stil increasing, he was inforced with those which were yet left aliue, to retire into the inner castle, wherein was but two great pieces, and 14 others of small force. Thus the Turks still preuailing, and taking one place after another, the seuenth of September they furiously assaulted the little castle, whereinto they cast such abundance of fire, that in short time it caught hold on the buildings, and set all on fire. The countie thus assailed by the enemy without, & worse distressed with the fire within, which still increasing, left no place for him in safetie to retire vnto, went into his chamber, where putting on a rich new sute of apparell, came presently out again with his sword & targuet in his hand; and finding his souldiers with cheerful countenance & their weapons in their hands, attending his comming, spake vnto them these

The little castle set on fire.

D few his last words: The hard fortune of this sinful kingdome hath together with our own ouertaken vs: but let vs, noble hearts, with patience indure what is to vs by God assigned. You know what we haue before promised, which hitherto God be thanked we haue accordingly performed, and now let vs with like resolution performe this last. The place you see is not longer to be kept, the deuouring fire groweth so still vpon vs, and we in number are but few: wherefore let vs as becommeth valiant men breake out into the vtter castle, there to die in the middest of our enemies, to liue afterwards with God for euer; I will be the first that will go out, follow you me like men. This said, with his sword and targuet in his hand, without any other armor, calling thrice vpon the name of Iesus, he issued out at the castle gate, with the rest following him: where valiantly fighting with the Ianizaries vpon the bridge; and hauing slaine some of them, he was first wounded in two places of his bodie with small shot, and

E at last strucke in the head with an vnluckie shot, fell downe dead; the Turks for ioy crying out their wonted word Alla. The rest of the souldiers in flying backe againe into the castle, were all slain by the Turks, except some few, whom some of the Ianizaries in regard of their valor, by putting their caps vpon their heads, saued from the fury of the rest. In this siege, the Turks (as they themselues reported) lost seuen thousand Ianizaries, and twentie eight thousand other souldiers, beside many voluntarie men not enrolled in their muster-bookes, and three of their great Bassaes. Serinus his head was presently cut off, and the next day (with the heads of the other slaine Christians) set vpon a pole, for all the armie to gaze vpon. After that, it was taken downe, and by Muhamet the great Bassa sent to Mustapha the Bassa of Buda his kinsman, who by two country men, sent it wrapped in a red scarfe couered with a faire linnen cloth, to coun-

Muhamet Bassa to Eccius Salma, greeting.

In token of my loue, behold, here I send thee the head of a most resolute and valiant Captaine thy friend friend, the remainder of his bodie I haue honestly buried, as became such a man. Sigeth biddeth thee farewell for euer.

The death of this noble and valiant captain was much lamented of all the Christian army, and his head with many teares by his sonne Balthasar honorably buried amongst his ancestors in Tschacaturna, his owne castle. Solyman at his comming with this mightie armie into Hungarie, had purposed before his returne, if he had not been by death preuented, to haue conquered both the remainder of the kingdome of Hungarie, and to haue againe attempted the winning of Vienna. For the accomplishing of which his designes, he at his first comming sent Parthaus Bassa, with fo[illegible] thousand Turks to helpe the Bassa of Temesware and the Tartars, in the behalfe of the V[illegible] to besiege the strong towne of Gyula, scituate vpon the lake Zarkad in the confines of Transyluania, not farre from whence Suendi had but in August before ouerthrowne the Tartars, called in by Solyman for the ayd of the Vayuod, and slaine [illegible]m ten thousand. And at the same time hee sent Mustapha Bassa of Bosna, and Carambeius, [illegible] a great power to Alba Regalis; who ioyning with the Bassa of Buda, should keep the Emperor Maximilian busie, whilest he in the meane time besieged Sigeth, as is before declared. Parthaus Bassa comming to Gyula, and laying hard siege to the towne, was still notably repulsed by Nicholas Keretschen, Gouernour of the Towne: insomuch, that in a sallie hee had certain pieces of his great ordnance taken from him by the defendants, & the rest cloied. But this braue captaine, not to haue been constrained by all that the Bassa could doe, was at last persuaded by his kinsman George Bebicus (from whom Suendi had a little before taken certaine castles, for reuolting from the Emperour to the Vayuod) for a great sum of money to deliuer vp the towne to the Bassa: which he did, couenanting beside his reward, That the soldiers should with bag and baggage in safety depart; all which was franckly granted: who were not gone past a mile out of the towne, but they were set vpon by the Turkes, and all slaine except some few which crept into the reeds growing in the marrish fast by, and so escaped. The traitor himselfe expecting his reward, was carried in bonds to Constantinople: where afterward, vpon complaint made how hardly he had vsed certain Turks whom he had sometime taken prisoners, he was by the commandement of Selymus, who succeeded Solyman, thrust into a hogshead strucke full of nailes with the points inward, with this inscription vpon it, Here receiue the reward of thy auarice & treason. Gyula thou soldest for gold: if thou be not faithfull to Maximilian thy Lord, neither wilt thou be to me: and so the hogshead closed fast vp, he was therin rolled vp and downe vntill he therein miserably died.

A traitor well rewarded.

The Emperors campe then lying at Rab, and the Bassa of Buda and Bosna with thirty thousand Turks not farre off at Alba Regalis, and many hot skirmishes passing betweene them: it fortuned that the fift of September the Turkes in hope to haue done some great piece of seruice vpon the Christians, came forth of the campe in great number, and by chance light vpon a few forragers of the army, of whom they slew some; the rest flying, raised an alarme in the campe: whereupon the Hungarians and Burgundians with some others issuing out, pursuing the Turks, slew diuers of them: in which pursute George Thuriger descrying the Gouernor of Alba Regalis, a man in great account, and very inward with Solyman whilest he liued, fiercely pursued him in the middest of the flying enemies, and neuer left him vntill he had taken him prisoner: and at his returne presenting him to the Emperour, was for that good seruice knighted, and rewarded with a chaine of gold. There was by chance then present a Spaniard, who had heard him say openly at Constantinople, That he alone with his owne power was able to vanquish the Germane King (by which name the Turkes commonly tearme the Emperour:) With which words when that the Spaniard hardly charged him in the presence of the Emperour, still vrging him as it were to say something for himselfe, the Turke answered him in these few words following: Such is the chance of war, thou seest me now a prisoner, and able to doe nothing.

The Gouernour of Alba Regalis taken.

All these troubles, with many moe like in short time to haue insued, were by the death of Solyman within a while after well appeased. Muhamet Bassa after he had repaired the breaches, and placed a Turke Gouernour of Sigeth, with a strong garrison for the defence of the place and commanding of the Countrey, called backe his dispersed forces; and rising with the armie, retired toward Belgrade, carrying Solymans dead bodie all the way sitting vpright

The death of this noble and valiant captain was much lamented of all the Christian army, and his head with many teares by his sonne Balthasar honorably buried amongst his ancestors in Tschacaturna, his owne castle. Solyman at his comming with this mightie armie into Hungarie, had purposed before his returne, if he had not been by death preuented, to haue conquered both the remainder of the kingdome of Hungarie, and to haue againe attempted the winning of Vienna. For the accomplishing of which his designes, he at his first comming sent Parthaus Bassa, with fortie thousand Turks to helpe the Bassa of Temeswar and the Tartars, in the behalfe of the Vayuod to besiege the strong towne of Gyula, scituate vpon the lake Zarkad in the confines of Transyluania, not farre from whence Suendi had but in August before ouerthrowne the Tartars, called in by Solyman for the ayd of the Vayuod, and slaine [illegible] ten thousand. And at the same time hee sent Mustapha Bassa of Bosna, and Carambeius, [illegible] a great power to Alba Regalis, who ioyning with the Bassa of Buda, should keep the Emperor Maximilian busie, whilest he in the meane time besieged Sigeth, as is before declared. Parthaus Bassa comming to Gyula, and laying hard siege to the towne, was still notably repulsed by Nicholas Keretschen, Gouernour of the Towne: insomuch, that in a sallie hee had certain pieces of his great ordnance taken from him by the defendants, & the rest cloied. But this braue captaine, not to haue been constrained by all that the Bassa could doe, was at last persuaded by his kinsman George Bebicus (from whom Suendi had a little before taken certaine castles, for reuolting from the Emperour to the Vayuod) for a great sum of money to deliuer vp the towne to the Bassa: which he did, couenanting beside his reward, That the soldiers should with bag and baggage in safety depart; all which was franckly granted: who were not gone past a mile out of the towne, but they were set vpon by the Turkes, and all slaine except some few which crept into the reeds growing in the marrish fast by, and so escaped. The traitor himselfe expecting his reward, was carried in bonds to Constantinople: where afterward, vpon complaint made how hardly he had vsed certain Turks whom he had sometime taken prisoners, he was by the commandement of Selymus, who succeeded Solyman, thrust into a hogshead strucke full of nailes with the points inward, with this inscription vpon it, Here receiue the reward of thy auarice & treason. Gyula thou soldest for gold: if thou be not faithfull to Maximilian thy Lord, neither wilt thou be to me: and so the hogshead closed fast vp, he was therin rolled vp and downe vntill he therein miserably died.

Nicholaus Keretschen corrupted for money, betrayeth Gyula to the Turks.

A traitor well rewarded.

The Emperors campe then lying at Rab, and the Bassa of Buda and Bosna with thirty thousand Turks not farre off at Alba Regalis, and many hot skirmishes passing betweene them: it fortuned that the fift of September the Turkes in hope to haue done some great piece of seruice vpon the Christians, came forth of the campe in great number, and by chance light vpon a few forragers of the army, of whom they slew some; the rest flying, raised an alarme in the campe: whereupon the Hungarians and Burgundians with some others issuing out, pursuing the Turks, slew diuers of them: in which pursute George Thuriger descrying the Gouernor of Alba Regalis, a man in great account, and very inward with Solyman whilest he liued, fiercely pursued him in the middest of the flying enemies, and neuer left him vntill he had taken him prisoner: and at his returne presenting him to the Emperour, was for that good seruice knighted, and rewarded with a chaine of gold. There was by chance then present a Spaniard, who had heard him say openly at Constantinople, That he alone with his owne power was able to vanquish the Germane King (by which name the Turkes commonly tearme the Emperour:) With which words when that the Spaniard hardly charged him in the presence of the Emperour, still vrging him as it were to say something for himselfe, the Turke answered him in these few words following: Such is the chance of war, thou seest me now a prisoner, and able to doe nothing.

The Gouernour of Alba Regalis taken.

All these troubles, with many moe like in short time to haue insued, were by the death of Solyman within a while after well appeased. Muhamet Bassa after he had repaired the breaches, and placed a Turke Gouernour of Sigeth, with a strong garrison for the defence of the place and commanding of the Countrey, called backe the dispersed forces; and rising with the armie, retired toward Belgrade, carrying Solymans dead bodie all the way sitting vpright

A right in his horselitter carried by mules, giuing it out that he was sicke of the gout: which thing the Ianizaries easily beleeued, knowing that he had beene many yeares so carried: yet still wishing his presence, as alwaies vnto them fortunate, although that he were able for to do nothing.

Vnlike his father, Selymus the royall Scepter takes :
And shaking armes with cruell hand, exceeding stirs he makes.
With Venice State his League he breakes (With Turks what league can stand ?)
And Cyprus kingdome takes from them by force of mightie hand.
He couered the swelling seas with hugie fleets to see :
That vanquished, vnto those seas he might an honour be.
The Vayuod of Moldauia he brought to wofull end,
The borders of his kingdome great so that he might extend.
In Gulet he the Spaniards ouerwhelm'd with mightie power ;
And thereby Tunes kingdome did the selfe same time deuour.
But wholly giuen to venerie, vnto excesse and play,

THE LIFE OF SELYMVS, THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, FIFT EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

C Elymus, the only son of Solyman then left aliue, by letters from Mahamet Bassa vnderstanding of the death of his father, hasted from Cutai, a citie of Galatia not far from Ancyra, towards Constantinople ; and comming to Scutarie, was from thence by Bostanges Bassa of the Court, conducted ouer the Strait to Constantinople : where by him and Scander Bassa (Selymus his sonne in law, and then Solymans Vicegerent) hee was conueyed into the Imperiall Pallace the three and twentieth of September, in the yeare 1566, and there possessed of his fathers seat, was by the Ianizaries there present, saluted Emperour. He was about the age of fortie two yeares when he began to raigne, a man of an vnconstant and hastie disposition, wholly giuen to wantonnesse and excesse : so that he neuer went to wars himselfe, but performed them altogether by his lieutenants, contrarie to the charge of Selymus his grandfather, giuen by him to his father Solyman, whereof he was neuer vnmindful. Selymus saluted Emperor of the Turks in the yeare 1566.

D The next day he came abroad, and shewed himself in his maiesty ; and in the temple of Sophia, after the manner of the Turkish superstition, caused solemne praiers and sacrifices to be made for his father : which done, he gaue vnto the Ianizaries a largious of 100000 Sultanines, with promise to augment their wages. And all things being now in readinesse for his intended iourney, hee with a goodly retinue set forward from Constantinople the seuen and twentieth of September : and the twentieth of October a little from Belgrade met the army comming from Sigeth, gallantly marching vnder their ensignes, with the dead bodie of Solyman, whom the souldiers generally supposed to haue been yet liuing, but troubled with the gout, to haue kept his horse-litter, as his manner was to trauell. Selymus alighting, came in his mourning attire to

E the horse-litter, looked vpon the dead bodie of his father, kissed it, and wept ouer it, as did all the other great Bassaes also. And that the death of Solyman might then be made knowne to all men, the ensignes were presently let fall, and trailed vpon the ground, a dead march sounded, and heauie silence commanded to be kept through all the campe. Shortly after, Selymus was with the great applause of the whole armie proclaimed Emperor, his ensignes aduanced, and euery one of the great commanders of the army, in their degree admitted to kisse his hand. So marching forward, he returned againe to Constantinople the two and twentieth of November : but thinking to haue entered his palace (which they commonly call the Seraglio) he was by the discontented Ianizaries but now come from the wars, prohibited so to doe ; they with great insolencie demanding of him a greater donatiue, together with the confirmation both of their antient and new priuiledges, before they would suffer him to enter. Against which their

F great presumption, the Visier Bassaes, together with the Aga, opposing themselues, and seeking by all meanes to appease them, were by them fowly entreated, and well rapped about the pates with the stocks of their calliuars ; but especially the two great Bassaes, Muhamet and Partau, as the chiefe authours that their Lord had dealt no more liberally with them. With which so sudden and vnexpected a mutinie of his best souldiers, Selymus not a little troubled, and calling ling vnto him the Aga(or captaine of the Ianizaries)demanded of him the cause thereof:who G with teares trickling downe his cheekes for griefe; told him, That it was for money. Which by Selymus now promised vnto them, together with the confirmation of their liberties;& the Aga with faire words and heauie countenance most earnestly intreating them, not to blemish the antient reputation of their wonted loyaltie with so foule a disorder, nor to oppose the life of him their louing captaine, vnto the heauie displeasure of their angrie Sultan; and farther assuring them, that he would not faile them in the least of his promises, but content them to the full of their desires; th[illegible]tinie was at length appeased, the insolent Ianizaries againe quieted, and Selymus into the Se[illegible]io receiued. Howbeit Muhamet, chiefe of the Viſier Bassaes, for certain daies after went no[illegible]t of his pallace, neither came (as he was wont) into the Diuano, but kept himselfe close, for f[illegible]re of some greater mischiefe from them. This tumult thus ouerpas- H Selymus buried sed, and all againe well quieted, Selymus with all royall solemnitie buried his father in a chappel which he after the manner of the Mahometan kings, had in his life time most state[illegible]ilt, with a colledge and an hospitall. Where fast by his side is to be seene the tombe of Ro[illegible]s his best beloued wife, and of certaine others his murthered children: and by him hangeth his scimitar, in token that he died in wars; an honor not otherwise granted to the Mahometa princes. The reuenues arising of the country about Sigeth, of late woon from the Christians, at the time of his death, were giuen to the maintenance of the houses by him built of deuotion; which for the magnificence thereof, exceed all the rest before built by the Mahometan kings and Emperors, except those which were the buildings of Mahomet the Great, and Baiazet the second. It was by many thought, that Solyman was in good time by death cut off, as purposing I that yeare to haue wintered in Hungarie, and the yeare following to haue done great matters against the Christians both by sea and land.

1567 The great army of the Turks thus drawn out of Hungarie by the death of Solyman, in some part asswaged, but altogether appeased not the endlesse troubles of that vnfortunat kingdom.
Troubles in Hungarie. Maximilian the Emperor on the one side, and Iohn the Vayuod of Transyluania with the Turks captaines on the other, renting it in pieces, as if they had sworne the destruction thereof. The Vayuod desiring to recouer the strong castle of Tockay, in the frontiers of his countrey, but lately taken from him by Suendi the Emperors lieutenant, laid hard siege to it, & had brought it to great extremitie, although it was notably defended by Iames Ramınger the captain thereof: when suddenly newes was brought vnto him, That the Tartars (whom he had called into K his country to haue aided him against the Emperor) did with all hostility after their barbarous manner, burne and destroy his country before them, making hauocke of all things, so that the country people were glad in defence of themselues, to take vp armes against them. Where-vpon he forthwith left the siege, & went to aid his distressed subiects against the Tartars, with whom he had many an hot skirmish; and after much bloudshed, at last ouercame them, and with much adoe rid himselfe of such bad guests. Now in the meane time, Suendi strengthened with new supplies sent vnto him from the Emperour, had taken the castle of Zackmar in the borders of Transyluania, and with like good fortune had the castle of Muncatz yeelded vnto him, and after that besieged the towne of Husth: so that the Vayuod was glad to craue aid of the Turkish Emperour Selymus, vnder whose protection hee was: who presently commanded L Partaw one of his chiefe Bassaes, and then his great Lieutenant in Romania, to goe with his forces into Transyluania, to relieue them. But hearing that Embassadours were comming from Maximilian the Emperour, hee called him backe againe, vntill he had heard the effect The Bassa of Buda desirous to further the peace. of that embassage. At which time also the Bassa of Buda enclining vnto peace, sent Presents to the Emperour, requesting him to remoue certaine Hungarian captaines from off the frontiers, lest happily they should interrupt the treatie of peace, then on both sides purposed; promising for his part, to punish with death all such Turks as should make any further inuasion, or raise any new troubles. He writ letters also to county Salma, That he could not but maruell, to what end Maximilian the Emperor was about to intreat with his lord & master of peace, whilst Suendi in the meane time was raging in Transyluania, then vnder the Turks protection; which M if he proceeded still to do, Selymus would thereof take o[illegible]sion (as he said) to turne all his forces that way: wherefore he requested him to persuade t[illegible]Emperour to take some more easie course in that behalfe; promising also, that hee would fo[illegible]is part effectually trauell with his master, to haue better li[illegible]g of peace than of warres, wishing him also to doe the like. Which thing

A thing as soone as the Emperour vnderstood, he commanded Suendi to giue ouer the siege of Husth, and to keepe himselfe quiet vntill he might by his Embassadours vnderstand what the Great Turke purposed, and how he was affected towards peace.

Now indeed these two great Princes, Maximilian and Selymus (although they notably dis- Maximilian & Selymus both desirous of peace sembled the matter) were both of them in heart desirous of peace, and that for diuers great and vrgent considerations. Maximilian for want of mony saw it was not possible for him to send into the field such an armie the next yeare as he had the yeare before. And Selymus, besides his other troubles, was to take order for the appeasing of a great & dangerous rebellion in the farthest part of his dominions in Arabia Fœlix; where the people rising vp in arms, and hauing B slaine the Bassa's and Sanzacks their gouernors, were readie to haue cast off the Turkish obedience: neither was he out of feare of the Persians, readie (as was reported) to make war vpon him. For which causes he wished rather for peace with the Emperour Maximilian, than wars: and so much the more, for that it was impossible for him to send an armie of any puissance into Hungary, for want of many necessarie prouisions for the maintenance thereof, in a countrey so much impouerished by reason of his late wars, wherein no victuals were to be found for the relieſe of such a multitude of men as he was to send, if he would do any good there. And truth it was (as the Turks themselues afterward reported) that Maximilian with halfe the power he had in field the last yere, might haue easily recouered the greatest part of that kingdom before lost: but well knowing his own wants, and ignorant of theirs, he altogether inclining to peace; C and by Countie Salma aduertised from the Bassa of Buda, That if he would send Embassadors to Constantinople, with the tribute woont to be there paid for Hungary, a peace vpon reasonable conditions might be easily obtained; he resolued vpon that point. And so certain messengers being sent vp and downe to Constantinople to the same effect, it was concluded, That if the Emperor would send Embassadors to Constantinople with the tribute yet behind, and a large commission for the treatie of peace, Selymus should giue them his safe conduct, with libertie at their pleasure to returne in case either of peace or war. Which agreed vpon and faithfully promised on both sides, Selymus set at libertie the lord Albert de Vuis, who six yeares Lie-ger in Constantinople, first for the Emperor Ferdinand, and after for Maximilian, had now been straitly imprisoned in his owne house by the space of 22 moneths; in such sort that neither he D nor any of his household could go abroad, watch and ward being kept both day & night about his house, and his windowes also boorded vp, to the end that he should not so much as looke out into the citie or any whither els more than the court of his house only. So the Emperour Maximilian now resolued to send Embassadors to Constantinople with the tribute money and diuers other rich gifts and Presents, as wel to the Great Turke himselfe, as the Viſier Bassa's his Counsellors: and considering with himselfe, whom to be most fit, with wisedome and honor to bring this so weightie a matter about, hauing to do with so barbarous, couetous, and mightie a people, made choice of the lord Anthonius Varantius of Agria (of his Councell for the kingdome of Hungarie) a Prelat of great estimation, who being a man of 63 yeares old, besides his great learning, had the experience of 27 embassages; wherin he alwaies so discreetly bare E himselfe, as well contented his Prince, and purchased vnto himselfe the reputation of a most graue & wise man: and about ten yeres before this embassage, being sent by the Emperor Fer- dinand Embassador to Solyman, and now by Maximilian, to Selymus at Constantinople, returning with good successe, was by the Emperor created a Prince of the Empire, and Bishop of Agria.
Vnto which so honorable a personage, hauing the charge of this so weighty a matter, the Em-perour the more to ennoble this embassage, as also to purchase the greater credit to his embas-sador, ioyned vnto him a most honorable Baron called the lord Christopher Teusenbatch of Stiria, one of his Counsellors also for the warres: who with full instructions both taking their leaue of the Emperor (then holding a Parliament at Presburgh) departed, and being attended Maximilian the emperor sendeth Embassadors to Selymus.
vpon with a great and honourable Retinue, set forward the first of Iuly 1567, and so came to F Comara a strong towne in Hungarie not past a league from the Turks frontiers. In which place the Embassadors staying vntill the seuenth of Iuly; in the meane time gaue knowledge of their comming vnto the gouernour of Strigonium, demanding for their securitie in the enemies countrey, to be met and receiued by some of his garrison: which granted, they tooke their barkes brought from Vienna and Possonium, sufficient for their greatnesse to haue carried them downe the riuer to Belgrade, with horse and waggon and their whole furniture: and so

ling vnto him the Aga(or captaine of the Ianizaries)demanded of him the cause thereof:who with teares trickling downe his cheekes for griefe; told him, That it was for money. Which by Selymus now promised vnto them, together with the confirmation of their liberties; & the Aga with faire words and heauie countenance most earnestly intreating them, not to blemish the antient reputation of their wonted loyaltie with so foule a disorder, nor to oppose the life of him their louing captaine, vnto the heauie displeasure of their angrie Sultan; and farther assuring them, that he would not faile them in the least of his promises, but content them to the full of their desires; the [illegible]tinie was at length appeased, the insolent Ianizaries againe quieted, and Selymus into the S[illegible]llo receiued. Which agreed vpon and faithfully promised on both sides, Selymus set at libertie the lord Albert de Vuis, who six yeares Lieger in Constantinople, first for the Emperor Ferdinand, and after for Maximilian, had now been straitly imprisoned in his owne house by the space of 22 moneths; in such sort that neither he nor any of his household could go abroad, watch and ward being kept both day & night about his house, and his windowes also boorded vp, to the end that he should not so much as looke out into the citie or any whither els more than the court of his house only. So the Emperour Maximilian now resolued to send Embassadors to Constantinople with the tribute money and diuers other rich gifts and Presents, as wel to the Great Turke himselfe, as the Visier Bassa's his Counsellors: and considering with himselfe, whom to be most fit, with wisedome and honor to bring this so weightie a matter about, hauing to do with so barbarous, couetous, and mightie a people, made choice of the lord Anthonius Varantius of Agria (of his Councell for the kingdome of Hungarie) a Prelat of great estimation, who being a man of 63 yeares old, beside his great learning, had the experience of 27 embassages; wherin he alwaies so discreetly bare himselfe, as well contented his Prince, and purchased vnto himselfe the reputation of a most graue & wise man: and about ten yeres before this embassage, being sent by the Emperor Ferdinand Embassador to Solyman, and now by Maximilian, to Selymus at Constantinople, returning with good successe, was by the Emperor created a Prince of the Empire, and Bishop of Agria. Vnto which so honorable a personage, hauing the charge of this so weighty a matter, the Emperor the more to ennoble this embassage, as also to purchase the greater credit to his embassador, ioyned vnto him a most honorable Baron called the lord Christopher Teufenbatch of Stiria, one of his Counsellors also for the warres: who with full instructions both taking their leaue of the Emperor (then holding a Parliament at Presburgh) departed, and being attended vpon with a great and honourable Retinue, set forward the first of Iuly 1567, and so came to Comara a strong towne in Hungarie not past a league from the Turks frontiers. In which place the Embassadors staying vntill the seuenth of Iuly; in the meane time gaue knowledge of their comming vnto the gouernour of Strigonium, demanding for their securitie in the enemies countrey, to be met and receiued by some of his garrison: which granted, they tooke their barkes brought from Vienna and Possonium, sufficient for their greatnesse to haue carried them downe the riuer to Belgrade, with horse and waggon and their whole furniture: and so so entring vpon the Turks dominion about a league or a little more from Comara, being so far wasted by the soldiers and gallies of Comara, they were met by an Aga of the Turks, with a Chiaus called Becrams (sent by the Bassa of Buda) in certaine gallies armed with Turkish soldiers. To whom the Embassador at his landing deliuered his mind, and afterward his person, giuing them to vnderstand, that they were with all safetie to conduct both him and all his to the Bassa of Buda: which they answered they were ready to accomplish; and so curteously inuited by the Embassadors, they came aboord their barke, and there dined together. Here they that were sent with them, leauing them in the hands of the Turks, hauing licence to depart, returned to Comara: and they that day after fiue leagues sailing arriued at Strigonium, where they were by the gouernor of the citie denied landing: for which so dishonorable a part he was afterward sharply rebuked by the Bassa of Buda. Yet as they lay that night vpon the water, certaine Turkish instrels, to do them honor, and to get a largesse, with their barbarous bawling instruments played them vp many a homely fit of mirth: and diuers others with sundrie sorts of vauting and tumbling, sometime leaping one vpon anothers shoulders, and sometime doing their trickes on the earth, all the euening shewed them great sport and pastime.

From Strigonium they with fiue leagues sailing came to Buda, leauing behind them the castle of Vicegrade, two leagues distant from Strigonium. In this citie of Buda lieth the great Bassa by whom all Hungarie, with the prouinces thereto belonging (in the Turks power) is gouerned. This citie, sometime the regall seat of the Hungarian Kings, is scituate vpon a little hill on the South side of Danubius, hauing in the South point thereof a castle, much higher than the citie, and of a most braue prospect: in which castle lieth a captaine with a garrison of fiue hundred souldiers (as the Turks say) howbeit it is thought that they are not altogether so many: it is the losse of his head to stir out of his charge; and beside, he hath commission to denie the Bassa himselfe entrance, vnlesse he come very sleighrly accompanied: so jealous are the Turks of that castle, as if the state of Hungarie depended thereon. Herein standeth the kings Palace, which taketh vp most part of the place, greatly beautified by Matthias, and shewing outwardly to haue been a verie stately thing: for there are in it both large halls and faire Galleries, and chambers built in most royall manner; where amongst other roomes, the Embassadors found a decaied Librarie, full of pictures and Latine titles of bookes: all which things when they present themselues to the eyes of the Christian beholders, offer a iust consideration of noble and reuerend antiquitie, and withall, strike into their hearts a certaine compassion joyned with horror, to see the renowned glorie of so many great Kings all wasted & brought to nothing. The next morning the Embassadors went to speake with the Bassa: whose house was reasonable faire (considering their guise and custome, not much delighting in the beautie of their priuat buildings) scituat vpon the riuer side at the bottome of the hill whereon the City standeth. Vnto this Bassa the Embassadors presented two great gilt cups, a clocke all curiously wrought in gold, and a thousand dollars: which Present the Bassa receiued in his Diuino (being a large hall) where he sate with his counsellors, officers, and other Turks in their places and order; some on his right hand, and some on his left, all richly attired in garments of silke of diuers colours and fashions, reaching downe to their anckles after their manner: their heads couered with their passing white and well made turbants: in which assemblie nothing beeing then to be seene but goodly order and graue silence, they seemed to the strange beholders so many counsellors of exceeding grauitie and reputation. Round about the Hall wherein the Embassadors had audience, were many seats couered with Turkie carpets; the rest of the roome being all vacant. The Bassa in a place more apparant than the rest, sitting in great maiesty: before whom was set two little chaires, on which (after he had stood vp a while and embraced the Embassadors) he caused them both to sit downe. Whose speech deliuered in the Italian tongue, after they had discharged themselues of the Emperours letters and greetings, was to effect this, viz. That his Imperiall maiestie (for the common benefit of their subiects in Hungarie) requested him to continue in his good purpose and dealing for peace: and further, to giue safe conduct vnto them his Embassadours with their retinue, vntill they were come vnto the Turks court, where they were to entreat and conclude a peace, to the ending of all troubles, and the publique benefit of their subiects in generall. Which speech with cheerefull and friendly countenance ended, many of the Embassadors followers were admitted to kisse the Bassa's hand, accounted no small fauour amongst those Barbarians. The Interpreter

A pretor of these things was a Iew of Padua, who declared all that was spoken, in the Turkish language vnto the Bassa, and in the Italian vnto the Embassadors. And although (if it had been their pleasure) they might haue told their mind each to other in the Crouatian tongue without an Interpretor; yet the Bassa standing more vpon his reputation, and for some other respects beside, would haue the matter propounded and likewise answered in the Turkish. In which sort they also conferred continually afterward with the Bassa's at Constantinople, vnles it were in some particular and priuat talke of small importance, or els in some point beside the matter; for then the Interpretor spake in the Crouatian or Sclauonian tongue, which is familiar to most of the Turks, but especially to the men of war. Before this hall where the Embassadours

B were entertained by the Bassa, in the base court stood all the Ianizaries in goodly array, and his slaues with their red zarcul on their heads, and other souldiers with high and long plumes of feathers standing vpright: all which made a beautifull shew, and gaue all great grace to the Bassa's court. These men stir not one foot in their standings, and if the consultation do last foure houres long, so long are they to continue standing without moning. The Embassadors hauing staied two daies at Buda, were by the Bassa dismissed, sending with them his Checai (the Stewward or gouernor of his house) a man of great reputation, and Becrams the Chiaus (the same that came to meet them at Comara, with a sufficient guard and certain Ianizaries, sent for their more safe trauelling, and to prouide for them from place to place, of all things necessarie for their diet, as also for their horses, at the Turks charges. And thus accompanied, they imbarqued the

C tenth day of the aforesaid moneth, towed vp the Turks gallies, which holpen by the swiftnes of the riuer, carried them downe in eight days to Belgrade, where they arriued the eighteenth of Iuly. So hauing staid at Belgrade, & there leauing their boats, and taking their coaches, they set forward by land the twentieth of the said moneth, and with great paines trauelling thorow Rascia, Bulgaria, and Thracia, and passing a part of the great mountaine Scardus, and after that, the mountaine Rhodope, so by the way of Philippopolis and Hadrianople, the two and twentieth of August gathered fast vpon Constantinople: where many of the Spahies and Chiausais of the court, with a number of the Ianizaries and other souldiers, for their greater honour came to meet them a great way without the citie. By whom the Embassadors honourably mounted

D on horseback, were by them conducted to their lodging appointed for them about the midst of the citie; where the Lord Albert de Wuis the Emperors Embassador Lieger (not long before inlarged) hauing long looked for their comming, now most ioyfully receiued them. It was then Fryday the Turks Sabaoth, and a day of them aboue all other dayes in the weeke regarded, and about ten of the clocke two houres before noone; at which time the Embassadors were no sooner alighted, but that Selymus going to heare the ceremonies of his religion, in the Moschie of his father Solyman (as his manner was sometime to do) passed along before the gate where the Embassadors lay, with the whole traine of his Court; and peraduenture somewhat more than ordinarie, to shew the magnificence of his power and state, to the end that the Embassadors (aboue the former opinion by them conceiued) might hold him in the reputation of a most puissant and mightie Monarch. He passing by, vouchsafed not once to giue them a re-

E gard, or so much as to cast his eye aside vpon them, although they were strangers, and but euen then arriued: but with a countenance as if hee had knowne not so much as any thing of their comming, held on his way as it lay. But Muhamet the chief Visier Bassa, with the other Bassa's and great Courtiers, in most gratious manner as they passed by cast their eyes vpon them; all the curtesie they could then shew them. Six dayes after, being the eight and twentieth of August, the Embassadors all three went to visit and salute Muhamet (or as the Turks call him Mehemet) the chief Visier Bassa, as the manner was, presenting him from the Emperor, with foure cups of siluer all gilt, of most faire and curious workemanship; of which, two of them being greater than the other, were three spans high, the other two being not so high by a span, but hauing in them two thousand duckets of gold: beside which, they gaue him also a clocke, being

F a most curious piece of worke, and all ouer double gilt. After which greetings and presents deliuered, beside the contents of his Maiesties letters, they declared vnto him in generall points, the cause of their comming, and the mind of the Emperor well disposed to a peace; and what great benefit would arise thereby to both parties: and lastly turning ouer the blame of the late wars, and laying the fault therof to the charge of others, sweetned thereby the sowre of their former dealings. Neither was the Bassa likewise for his part to seeke of good words, but answered swered them in Turkish by the mouth of Hibraim the chiefe Dragoman, who deliuered his mind to them in Latine or Italian, according as the Embassadours had before vttered theirs: which parle so ended, certaine of the chiefe of the Embassadors followers were admitted into the Diuano to kisse the proud Bassa's hand. The same day the Embassadors also saluted Partan the second Bassa, and Ferat the third in order and authoritie. To Partan the presented two cups of siluer all gilt, beside a clocke of the same making with the afore named, and two thousand dollars: and the like to Ferat. The next day they went to visit the other three Bassa's, Achomat, Piall, and Muhamet, presenting euery one of them with two faire cups and a thousand dollars. These were the six Visier Bassa's to Selymus, then lying at court with him, men that for wealth and authoritie [illegible] before all other in the Turkish empire, as in the course of this Historie may appeare. A[illegible] hauing visited them in generall, the Embassadors to set their affaires on foot, the four[illegible] September closed with Muhamet, to whom the ordering of Estate-matters was especially committed. Yet after this first conference, because it was necessarie before so weightie affaires were broached, first to do the Turke reuerence, and to deliuer [illegible]presents, with the Emperours letters to him written; for some few dayes there was not any point at all of the Embassadors businesse handled.

Selymus not long after the Embassadors were arriued, went out for his disport and pleasure on hunting: so that in the mean time, after the presents were giuen to the Bassa's, matters stood still altogether vnaduanced, vntill the 21 of September: and that day (Selymus being now returned from his disport) it was appointed that the Embassadours should haue audience at the Court. Whereupon they made choice out of their followers, of those that should attend vpon them, which were not in all aboue twelue persons: for they to whome this charge was committed, said it was neither the manner, nor yet meet, that any great traine should come before so great a Prince, and that they might not bring with them aboue that number: whereupon they appointed but six a piece to attend them; and of fifteen cups of siluer and gilt, being most curiously and cunningly engrauen, one of the faire st among the rest was giuen to each of those twelue to carrie, and they ordered to go by two and two before the rest that came after in order with the rest of the Present; which was two exceeding pretious clocks, like in bignesse to them before giuen to the Bassa's, but far aboue them in value; & 45000 dollars for the tribute behind and yet vnpaied. The greatest of those cups was six spans and a halfe, and the least two spans in height: some of them being double cups, after the high Dutch manner. The Embassadors (whose comming a great multitude of the Ianizaries attended below at the gate of their lodging; beside many of the Spahi's and Chiausi's, and others of good sort (which were come to honor them with their presence to the palace) putting themselues in readinesse betimes in the morning, and taking horse set forward toward the court. The formost were they that did beare the Present in their hands, the people of the citie in euery street flocking together in exceeding multitudes to behold them as they passed: and verily there had beene seldome times seene the like embassage in those parts: for besides the fame that was blowne abroad in euerie quarter, That they were men sent from one of the greatest Princes in Christendome; the diuersitie of their attire (so few as they were) more than any thing beside, did represent the Maiestie of the Christian Emperor to them that gazed vpon his Embassadors and their traine, the people conceiuing thereby, that he was lord and ruler ouer many prouinces & countries. For they that were Hungarians belonging to the Bishop of Agria (the chiefe Embassador) being attired in long & sober garments of very fine purple cloath, hauing their shooes pieced ouer the soles with yron plates, and halfe their heads shauen, seemed to differ from them but little: but on the other side, the high-Dutch attired in blacke, with their veluet caps, & short cloaks laied with siluer lace, & long breeches little lesse than Rutter wise, and chaines of gold about their necks, appeared very strange & vncouth to the Turkish people: so accompanied in this honorable wise, the Embassadors entred the first gate of the Great Turks palace. This gate is built of marble in most sumptuous maner, & of a stately hight, with certain words of their language in the front thereof ingrauen & gilt in marble. So passing thorow the base court, which hath on the right side very faire gardens, & on the left, diuers buildings seruing for other offices, with a little Moschy; they came to the second gate, where all such as come in riding, must of necessitie alight: there so soon as they were entred in at this secõd gate, they came into a very large square court, with buildings & galleries round about it, the kitchins standing on the right hand, with other other lodgings for such as belonged to the court, and on the left hand likewise roomes deputed to like seruices. There are moreouer many halls and other roomes for resort, where they sit in counsel, handling and executing the publike affaires either of the court or of the empire, with other matters, where the Bassa's and other officers assemble together. Entring in at this second gate, in one part of the court, which seem'd rather some large street, they saw the whole companie of the Solaches set in a goodly ranke, which are archers keeping alwaies neere vnto the person of the great Turke, & seruing as his footmen when he rideth: they vse high plumes of feathers, which are set bolt vpright ouer their foreheads. In another place there stood the Capitzi in like array, with black staues of Indian canes in their hands: they are the porters and warders of the gates of the palace, not much differing in their attire from the Ianizaries; who stood in ranke likewise in another quarter. And beside all those, with many more that were out of order; as well of the court as of the common people, those Knights of the court which accompanied the Embassadors thither, with other great ones also of like degree, were marshalled all in their seueral companies. And among the rest, the Mutfaracha's, men of all nations and all religions (for their valor the only freemen which liue at their owne libertie in the Turkish empire) stood there apparelled in damaske veluet and cloath of gold, and garments of silke of sundrie kinds and colours: their pompe was great, and the greater, for the turbants that they wore vpon their heads, being as white as whitenes it selfe, made a most braue and goodly shew well worth the beholding. In briefe, whether they were to be considered all at once, or in particular, as well for the order that they kept, as for their sumptuous presence, altogether without noise or rumor; they made the Embassadors and the rest of their followers there present, eye-witnesses both of their obedience, and of the great state and royaltie of the Othoman court. Passing through them, the Embassadors were led into the hall, where the Bassa's & other great men of the court were all readie to giue them entertainment: they of their traine being at the same time brought into a roome that stood apart vnder one of the aforesaid lodgings all hung with Turkie carpets. Soone after (as their vse & manner is) they brought in their dinner, couering the ground with table-cloathes of a great length spred vpon carpets, and afterward scattering vpon them a maruelous number of wooden spoons, with so great store of bread, as if they had bin to feed 300 persons: then they set on meat in order, which was serued in 42 great platters of earth, full of rice pottage of three or foure kinds, differing one from another, some of them seasoned with hony, and of the colour of hony; some with soure milke, and white of colour; and some with sugar: they had fritters also, which were made of like batter; and mutton beside, or rather a daintie and toothsome morsell of an old sodden Ewe. The table (if there had any such bin) thus furnished, the guests without any ceremonie of washing, sate downe on the ground (for stooles there were none) and fell to their victuall, and dranke out of great earthen dishes, water prepared with sugar, which kind of drinke they call Zerbet. But so hauing made a short repast, they were no sooner risen vp, but certaine yong men, whom they call Giamoglans, with others that stood round about them, snatcht it hastily vp as their fees, and like greedie harpies rauened it downe in a moment. The Embassadors in the meane time dined in the hall with the Bassa's. And after dinner certaine of the Capitzies were sent for the twelue of the embassadors followers, before appointed to do the great Sultan reuerence: by whom (their Presents being alreadie conueied away) they were remoued out of the place where they dined, & brought on into an vnder roome, from whence there was an ascent into the hal, where the Bassa's were staying for the Embassadors: who soone after came forth, and for their ease sat them downe vpon the benches, whilest the Bassa's went in to Selymus; who before this time had made an end of dinner, and was remoued in all his royaltie, into one of his chambers, expecting the comming of the Embassadors. All things now in readinesse, and the Embassadors sent for, they set forward with their traine, and came to the third gate, which leadeth into the priuy palace of the Turkish Emperor, where none but himselfe, his eunuchs, & the yong pages his minions, being in the Eunuchs custodie, hath continuall abiding: into which inward part of the palace none entreth but the Capitzi Bassa (who hath the keeping of this third gate) and the Cesigniers (that serue in the Turks meat) with the Bassa's and some few other great men; and that only when they haue occasion so to do by reason of some great busines, or sent for by the Sultan. Being entred in at this gate, which is of a stately & royal building, the Capitzi by who they were conducted suddenly caused them to stay, and set them one from another about fiue paces, in a little roome, which neuertheleſſe was paſſing delicate, all curiouſly painted ouer with diuers colours, and ſtood between the gate and the more inner lodgings. On both ſides of which roome, when all things els were whiſt & in a deep ſilence, certain little birds only were heard to warble out their ſweet notes, and to flicker vp and downe the green trees of the gardens (which al along caſt a pleaſant ſhadow from them) as if they alone had obtained licence to make a noiſe. Selymus himſelfe was in great maieſtie ſet in an vnder chamber, parted only with a wall from the roome wherein the Embaſſadours followers attended, whereinto he might looke through a little window, the portall of his ſaid chamber ſtanding in counterpoint with the third gate aboue mentioned. The Embaſſadors entring in, were led ſingle, and one after another, to make their reuerence vnto the Great Turke. And in the mean time certain of the Capitzi with the Preſents in their hands fetching a compaſſe about before the window, muſtered them in his ſight. All this while not the leaſt ſound in the world being raiſed, but a ſacred ſilence kept in euery corner, as if men had bin going to viſit the holieſt place in Ieruſalem. Yet for all that, the Embaſſadors followers placed one from another (as is aforeſaid) were not aware that the great Sultan was ſo neere, looking ſtil when they ſhould haue bin led on forwards all together: howbeit they were ſet in one after another, neither did they that were ſo ſet out, return again into the roome, but hauing ſeuerally done their reuerence, were all (except the Embaſſadors, that ſtill ſtaid in the chamber) by one and one ſent out another way into the court; neither could he that came after, ſee his fellow that went before him, after he was once taken in to do his reuerence: but ſuddenly as the former was let out, the next was aduanced forward to the doore, where Iſman the Capitzi-Baſſa and the Odda-Baſſa, taking him by both arms and by the necke, the one at the right hand, and the other at the left, & ſo leading him apace, by the way ſoftly felt his wriſts with their hands, leſt peraduenture he might haue ſome ſhort weapon in his ſleeue. Yet were they not all thus groped, as Marc. Antonio Pigafetta (the reporter of this negotiation) ſaith of himſelfe and ſome others alſo. Howbeit this hath bin, and yet is the manner of giuing of acceſſe vnto the perſon of the Great Turke, euer ſince that Amurath the firſt was after the battel of Caſſoua murdred by one of Lazarus the Deſpots men; who admitted to his preſence, in reuenge of the wrong done vnto his maſter, with a ſhort poinard that hee had cloſely hidden about him, ſo ſtabbed him in the bellie, that he preſently died. And thus like men rather carried to priſon by ſergeants, than to the preſence of ſo mightie a Monarch, they were preſented vnto his Maieſtie: he ſitting vpon a pallet, which the Turks call Maſtabe, vſed by them in their chambers to ſleepe and to feed vpon, couered with carpets of ſilke, as was the whole floore of the chamber alſo. The chamber it ſelfe being not very great, was but darke, altogether without windows, excepting that one whereof we haue before ſpoken, and hauing the walls painted and ſet out in moſt freſh and liuely colours by great cunning, and with a moſt delicat grace: yet vſe they neither pictures nor the image of any thing in their painting. The ſix Viſier Baſſa's before mentioned, were ſtanding at the left hand as they entred in at the chamber dore, one by another in one ſide of the chamber, and the Embaſſadors on the right hand on the other ſide ſtanding likewiſe, & vncouered. The Dragomans were in another part of the chamber, neere the place where the Sultan ſat gorgeouſly attired in a robe of cloath of gold all embroidred with jewels: when as the Embaſſadors followers by one & one brought before him, (as is aforeſaid) and kneeling on the ground, a Turke ſtanding on his right hand, with all reuerence taking vp the hem of his garment, gaue it them in their hands to kiſſe. Selymus himſelf all this while ſitting like an image without mouing, and with a great ſtate and maieſty keeping his countenance, dained not to giue them one of his looks. This done, they were led back again, neuer turning their backs towards him, but going ſtill backwards vntill they were out of his preſence. So after they had all thus made their reuerence, & were departed out of the chamber, the Embaſſadors deliuered vnto Selymus the Emperors letters, and briefly declared vnto him their meſſage: whom he anſwering in foure words, as, That they were to confer with his Baſſa's; preſently they were diſmiſſed. And ſo comming out of the two inner gates, they mounted on horſeback, & tooke the way leading towards their lodging, being at their returne accompanied with the whole order of the Ianizaries, with their Aga & other captains: among were certain of their religious men called Haagi (which vſe to follow the Ianizaries) who continually turning about, and in their going, ſinging or rather howling certaine Pſalmes and prayers for the welfare of their Great Sultan; gaue the Embaſſadours and their followers occaſion to wonder,

The Embaſſadors brought in vnto Selymus, with the manner of the entertainment of the and their followers.

The ſtatio Dr. Marc Antonio Pigafetta ca. 5.

A wonder, that they either left not for wearineſſe, or fell not downe like noddies for giddineſſe. All theſe were ſent, the more honourably to accompanie the embaſſadors to their lodging: and beſide theſe, many more on horſebacke than attended them at their forth comming: in regard wherof, the embaſſadors when they were come to their lodging, to requite their greedie courteſie, franckly diſtributed amongſt them aboue foure thouſand dollars, and yet well contented them not.

The embaſſadours after this entertainment at court, had diuers times conference with the great Baſſaes concerning peace, as Selymus had commanded: wherein by reaſon of the Turks vnreaſonable demands (as their manner is at their firſt meetings) nothing could be as then concluded: ſo that Selymus himſelfe being ſhortly after to depart for Hadrianople, where he was B to continue for ſome moneth (but rather as it was thought for that they could not agree vpon a point of great conſequence) the treatie for peace was intermitted, vntill ſuch time as a meſſenger diſpatched in poſt, might returne vnto the Turks court, with ſome reſolute anſwer concerning that matter. So it was, that during the raigne of the late Emperour Ferdinand, that the Turke his ſubiects in Hungarie payed all their taxes and tributes vnto their old Lords and maſters, abiding and liuing in the Emperors iuriſdiction, as did the ſubiects of Ferdinand, to their lords that dwelt in the Turkes dominion and territories: now in this treatie for peace, the Turks (amongſt other their vnreaſonable requeſts) demanded to haue their ſubiects freed, & yet the ſubiects of the Emperor to pay as they were before accuſtomed. Which as it was a re- C queſt nothing indifferent, ſo was it no leſſe preiudiciall and hurtfull vnto the Emperor his ſubiects in Hungarie: for which cauſe the embaſſadors would not by any meanes conſent thereunto, before they knew the Emperors farther pleaſure concerning the ſame. Whereupon they diſpatched one Sig. Odoardo a gentleman of Mantua, verie skilfull in the Turkiſh language and in ſuch like affaires, by reaſon that as well about this buſineſſe as at diuers times before about other the like, he had been employed from Vienna to Conſtantinople in the Emperours ſeruice. So Selymus ſhortly after, Viz. the twentieth of October, departing from Conſtantinople, in great magnificence paſſed by the gate where the embaſſadours lay, with his whole court in armes, and in the ſame order that is vſually kept when he goeth to warre or taketh any great iourney. After whoſe departure the embaſſadors hauing ſufficiently viewed the citie of Con- D ſtantinople, and then at good leiſure, to paſſe the time and to ſee the countries they had ſo often both heard and read of, together with the ports and hauens on both ſides that narrow ſea which diuideth Europe from Aſia, embarking themſelues, and croſſing the mouth of the hauen betwixt Conſtantinople and Pera, paſſed all alongſt the coaſt on Europe ſide, vnto the Euxine or blacke ſea, and ſo backe againe by the other ſide of that ſtraight ſea: curiouſly noting the great ruins of the antient cities of Bythinia, with ſome others alongſt the Aſian ſhore, together with the pleaſant ſcituation they in former times had, whileſt they yet flouriſhed in their glory, but now for moſt part (or rather altogether) laid in the duſt & brought to nought: and ſo returned againe to Conſtantinople. But whileſt they thus deceiued the time, and lay long expecting the returne, as well of their owne meſſenger ſent vnto the Emperour, as of Selymus E himſelfe: they were aduertiſed in all haſte to repaire vnto him to Hadrianople, whether the aforeſaid meſſenger was now come with full inſtructions of all things concerning the treatie for peace. For which cauſe they with great ſpeed making themſelues ready, and taking their leaue of Piall Baſſa (who for that he was Selymus his great Admirall, then lay at Conſtantinople) ſet forward the firſt of Ianuarie in the yeare 1568, and ſo after nine daies trauel, at length arriued at Hadrianople about an hundred fiftie three Italian miles diſtant from Conſtantinople. ding sundry cauillations, and raising many doubts about the aforesaid capitulations, did what they might to haue in some part altered what they had before agreed vpon, to the bettering of themselues and the hurt of the Christians: and so with many their vnreasonable demands stayed the departure of the embassadors vntill the twentieth of March following. At which time hauing their dispatch, and taking their leaue of the Great Turke and the Bassaes, accompanied with Hebraim-Beg (Selymus his embassador vnto the Emperour) they by land returned towards Vienna; where they with the ioyfull newes of peace the tenth of May arriued, being there two daies after at the court most honourably receiued. And fiue daies after, audience was giuen vnto the Turks embassador, who well heard and better rewarded, shortly after returned with a full conclusion of peace from the Emperou, to Constantinople.

But whilest this peace was thus in concluding, and the embassadors yet resident at Hadrianople, the sixteenth of Februarie came an honourable embassage from Shach Tamas the Persian king, vnto the great Sultan Selymus, to intreat a peace betwixt them, or rather to conclude the same, being before agreed vpon the controuersies, for which they afterwards fell in war. Which embassage for that it is no lesse truly than plainely set downe in a letter sent from Erzirum (a citie then in the confines of the Turkes dominions towards the Persians) written by a Chiaus to Muhamet chiefe of the Visier Bassaes; which Chiaus was of purpose sent from Constantinople, to meet the said Persian embassador: I thought it not amisse for the better vnderstanding thereof, to set downe the effect of the same letter as it was translated out of the Turkish into the Italian by the Emperors embassadors interpreter.

The effect of the letter written to Muhamet Bassa, the chiefe Visier, by a Chiaus sent of purpose to meet the Persian Embassadour.

After due salutations, this is the effect of that which we thought good to make knowne vnto your Lordship. Now at this present (to wit in the beginning of the moneth Giuma Sulacchir) is in good health arriued the Embassadour of Persia, the Kings chiefe counsellour, called * Schach Culi Soltan, attended vpon with a hundred and twentie Gentlemen, with guilt Turbants on their heads, and well furnished with spare horses led in mens hands. Besides whom he was accompanied also with two hundred knights all apparelled in cloath of gold, with foure hundred Persian merchants, in all aboue seuen hundred persons; with a thousand nine hundred beasts, Camels, Mules, and Horses; fiue couple of drums, euery couple being placed vpon a seuerall Camell, fiue Nacars, three trumpets, fiue flutes, and other instruments, in all about thirtie musitions, playing vpon these instruments: There were also two queristers or chaunters of the Alcoran, one Organist, one playing vpon a Turkish instrument like a Lute, two players vpon Sagbuts, with two other Musitions, eight in all. There were also foure bondwomen seruing in the Embassadours owne chamber. Who when hee was with all this magnificent pompe come within one dayes tourney of Erzirum, the * Sayms and Spahies assembling themselues together to the number of eight thousand men, went to meet him: amongst whome were an hundred and more, all apparelled in cloath of gold and Sattin: two thousand men with guilt morrions on their heads: in which brauerie wee marching forward, the Persian Embassadour amazed to see so great maiestie and pompe, said that all the armie of Constantinople was come to meete him: and so being come into the Citie, caused all the instruments to bee played vpon, euen from morning vntill night. The next morning, the Embassadour inuited the Bassa with all the Lords and officers; who being come, hee entreated them to heare his musicke: and in like manner the Lord Bassa inuited the Persians. But as the Embassador was going to the banquet, came another Sultan of the Kings, who brought vnto the same Embassador a guilt Turbant, and a rich gowne wrought with gold, which he caused him to put on by the way. By this Embassadour the Persian King hath sent all the armour of Sultan Baiazet, with all his Camels and other wealth. The causes of the long stay of this Embassadour were specially two: the one for that the Persian King had caused to bee made two pauilions of one peece, the curtaines being interlaced with gold, and the supporters imbroidered with the same: Besides this, he sent two bookes of Histories, and two Pearles, which in weight weighed ten * Mescali: one Balasso as big as a little Pearle; fourescore and two times an hundred * Tumenlich *of stuffe, amounting to foure score and two summes of Aspers, and sortie Falcons: all which the Persian King hath sent vnto the great Sultan, as to the onely Monarch and Patron of the World. time of great King Hysmael. These two Persian Sultans are the Kings chiefe Sultans and courtiers, and therefore set themselues forth with all the pompe they can. Yet notwithstanding all their brauerie, being come to Erzirum within the view of our armie, the Persians were amazed to behold the goodly order of the Othomans. One part of these Persians are returned againe into Persia. And if it please God, at the comming of my messenger vnto you, your Lordship shall vnderstand of what condition and state these two Princes and Sultans are. They haue each of them yearely six Tumeni: which maketh after the computation of the Othomans, six thousand Aspers. Your Lordship after this account may iudge of the rest. The other cause of the long stay of this Embassador, was for that in Syruan the people were vp in rebellion, wherein many of them were slaine: to the appeasing of which sedition, this Schach Culi was sent, and now at last is come. From Erzirum in the beginning of the moneth of * Giuma Sulacchir, in the yeare of the Prophet Mahomet, 975. * December.

This the Persian embassador was with the greatest pompe that might be entertained by the Turks at his first comming to Hadrianople, all the braue courtiers with the Ianizaries & other souldiers of the court going forth in most seemely order to meet him. Who now entred the citie, and come before the house where the Emperours embassadors then lay, and seeing certain of their retinue before the dore, asked of Isnam the Capitzi Bassa, what people they were; who told them that they were the followers of an embassador that there lay, sent from one of the greatest Princes of the Christians, namely the Emperour, who was desirous to make peace with the great Sultan his master. Whereunto the embassador replied, That he would willingly salute them: which Isnams hearing, straight way turned his horse towards the place where they stood. Now the Emperors embassador being secret within a lattise, and seeing him come towards them, went forth & stood vpon the dore threshold, and so with signes and words saluted one another. Among the others the Persian embassador said vnto the Emperors, That he would gladly talke with him, if it might so please the grand Seignior: Hebraim the Dragoman who then was with the Emperors embassadors, being interpreter. So hauing courteously saluted one the other, they departed, but neuer after came together. Two daies after, the Persian embassadors (according to the maner of those barbarous nations, who with empty hands salute not one another) by his Checaia or steward of his household, presented all the Visier Bassaes with diuers rich gifts and Presents, euery one of them according to their degrees & places: and the day after went himself to visit them; where by the way fel out a strange matter, like enough to haue cost him his life. For a Giamoglan (as the embassador was going to visit Muhamet the chiefe of the Visier Bassaes for the first) meeting him, shot at him with an harquebush, with purpose to haue slain him; but as God would, missed him, & hurt but one of his chiefe followers in the arm. Wherwith the embassador not a little dismaid, as supposing himselfe to haue bin betraied, turning his horse, was about to haue gone to his lodging: but the great Bassa in the meantime hauing knowledge therof, presently sent out men to guard him, and to excuse himselfe of the fact. Whereof the embassador being assured, held on his way. In the meane space, the fellow who shot the harquebush, being apprehended, was brought before the embassadour and the Bassa; who asking him for what cause he discharged the shot against the embassadors he without change of countenance boldly answered, That he did it for no other cause but for that the embassador was an heretick, and sent from an hereticall king, and an enemy to their religion: and therefore that it was not conuenient hee should come to intreat of peace with his lord; adding further, that he was not worthie of any peace. Which the Bassa hearing, adiudged the desperat villain the next day to be drawn at an horse taile through the city, & then to haue his right hand cut off, and afterward his head, which was accordingly put in execution. After this, the Persian embassador the 22 of the same moneth went to deliuer the Presents sent from his master vnto the grand Seignior, and to kisse his hand: sending first before him the Presents vpon 44 Camels, whereof 34 were the Kings of Persia, and the other ten his owne. The Kings Present was an Alcoran, with the authoritie of Ali, as they hold. For this is their custome, alwayes to present one such Alcoran vnto the Princes to whome they send their Embassadours. It was couered with gold, and garnished with most precious stones. Hee presented also a booke of Histories, couered as the other: he gaue also a box, wherein was a verie faire precious stone called Balasso, and two pearles of a wonderfull greatnesse, with two purses of an handfull long, full of Iewels. Besides these, he presented also 8 Firuari or Porcellane dishes camels haire, nine saddles set with stone after the Persian fashon, seuen staues of siluer, seuen scimitars with red scaberts, seuen bowes with arrowes and quiuers, all wrought with gold and precious stone; he presented also many other carpets called Teftich, made of the finest lawne, were also these: an Arran, a pauilion faire and large, certaine scimitars, bowes and arrowes richly garnished, with certain carpets of silk, & Camels haire. After which Presents so deliue-red, & reuerence don vnto the great Sultan by the embassador, and thirty of his follow[illegible]l in cloth of gold, he returned to his lodging, very honorably accompanied, as wel by the [illegible]as them of his owne retinue. First besides many others, there were a great companie of the Spa-hies and Chiausies, and other courtiers mounted vpon goodly horses, well furnished & in decent order: here might a man haue seen store of cloth of gold, veluet, damaske, & other kinds of silke. After these, there followed about three hundred Persian horsemen, apparelled after their manner, some with gowns made of diuers little pieces of taffata of sundry colors, representing the pictures of men, women, horses, and other beasts; and some of them imbroidered I with flowers and fruits of sundry sorts; some had also gowns of cloth of gold, but not so faire as the Turks; and some of veluet, but very few of cloth; for that the Persians haue no great plenty either of veluet or yet of cloth, except such as they haue from the Portingals that trauel into those Eastern countries; yet of silk & wooll it appeareth they haue great plenty, most part of their gowns being of wooll quilted with bombast. After these horsemen followed many Persian footmen, peraduenture all seruants; after whom came the Turkish horsemen: and last of al came a horse of the embassadors led by a Persian; after which horse followed 200 Ianizaries: and in the rereward of all came the embassador alone, gorgeously attired both himselfe & his horse. He himself was inuested with crimosin veluet, mingled with some other colors: his saddle and bridle were all bedeckt with iewels: the capariſon of his horse, was all imbroidered K with Turquoies and other precious stones: the horne vpon the top of his Turbant (which the Turks call Meteuenchia) was altogether wrought with gold, and set with precious stones: in briefe, vpon euery part of his bodie hanged iewels of great price. After the embassadour, followed about 140 Persian horsemen, and others of his court apparelled as before, some well, some ill, according to their abilitie. Now although the Persians (as is to be thought) shewed all their pompe, yet they made nothing so faire a shew as did the Turks; neither are they so faire men of complexion, being for the most part of a swart and browne color, and rather little men than otherwise, not much vnlike to the Spaniards. The embassadour being departed, the Pre-An honourable allowance. sents were all brought & shewed to Selymus; who allowed for their ordinary charges 500 ducats a day, for that indeed their number was great, and their beasts many. These expences be- L stowed vpon the embassadors, do presently begin as soone as any of them enter into his dominions; and end, so soone as the businesse for which they come is finished. But long it was not, but that this embassador hauing concluded a peace betwixt the two great Princes, Tamas and Selymus, & dispatched such matters as he came for, returned home again into Persia. The Venetians also now at this same time, by their embassadors sought to renew the league they had made with the great Turke, now expired: which as it was easily obtained, so was it of final afsurance; Selymus the next yeare quarrelling with them, and raising new wars, to the great hurt and disturbance of that State, as shall forthwith appeare.

1569 Selymus now at peace with all the world (a thing of the Turks not much desired) began to thinke of workes of charitie: and purposing to build a magnificent temple at Hadrianople for his owne sepulture, with a Monasterie, a Colledge, and an Almes-house (as had his M father, and other his ancestours before him at Prusa and Constantinople, led thereunto with a vaine and superstitious deuotion) was troubled with nothing more, than how to endow the same with lands and reuenues sufficient for the maintenance of so great a charge: for that the Mahometan Kings, are by their superstition prohibited to conuert any lands or possessions

A to such holy vses, other than such as they haue with their owne sword won from the enemies of their religion, which they may (as they are persuaded) as a most acceptable sacrifice, offer to their great Prophet: which deuilish persuasion, serueth as a spur to pricke forward euery of those ambitious Princes to adde something to their empire. This his deuout purpose once knowne, wanted not the furtherance of many ripe heads, deuising some one thing, some another, as they thought best fitted his humour. But amongst many things to him presented, none pleased him so well, as the plot laid for the taking of the rich Iland of Cyprus from the Venetians: a conquest of it selfe sufficient, both for the eternizing of his name, and performance of his owne charitable workes intended; with a large ouerplus, for the supplying of what soeuer wanted in his fathers like deuout workes at Constantinople. But that which moued him most B of all, was the glory of such a conquest, which as his flatterers bare him in hand, might make him equall with any his predecessors; who in the beginning of their raigne, had vsually done or attempted some notable thing against the Christians. Hereupon the matter was by Selymus propounded to the great Bassaes to be considered of; without whose aduise and counsell, the Turkish Emperors seldome or neuer take any great wars in hand. Amongst these graue counsellors, Muhamet the chiefe Visier Bassa, a man of greatest authoritie (vnto whom Selymus was beholden, that he had so quietly obtained the empire) and a secret friend vnto the Venetians, Mahamet Bassa dissuadeth Selymus from the inuading of Cyprus.
seemed much to mislike of that motion, persuading Selymus not to yeeld thereunto: alledging beside the danger and vncertaintie of the expedition, that his father Solyman at the time of his death had charged him straitly, that the league with the Venetians should be religiously kept, C and that he could not with his honour without iust cause so quickly breake the league, which he himselfe had but a little before most solemnly confirmed. But Mustapha the second Bassa, sometime Selymus his tutor, and therfore of him much honored, with Piall Bassa the Admirall (both enuying at the great honor of the Visier Bassa) so mightily impugned that he had before said, and so importuned Selymus with the shew both of honor and profit attending that action, as also with the easinesse thereof (a great part of the Venetian Arsenall being but a little before burnt, and their forces much weakned) that he reiected the counsell of Muhamet, calling him in his choler, Christian (which among the Mahometans is a word of no smal disgrace:) and yeelding wholly to the persuasion of Mustapha and Piall, presently caused preparation to be made both by sea and land, for the performance of that his resolution. Which was not so couertly D carried in the Turkes court, but that it was discouered by M. Antonius Barbarus the Venetian embassador; and not without cause suspected by the Venetian merchants, whom the barbarous Turks began now to cut short in their trafficke, looking big vpon them, as men suddenly changed, and euill intreating them with hard speeches, the vndoubted signes of greater troubles to ensue. The Venetian Embassador now out of doubt of the Turkes purpose for the inuasion of Cyprus, came vnto Muhamet the chiefe Bassa, complaining of the breach of the league: and putting him in mind of the fidelitie of the Venetian State towards the Turkish Emperour; requesting him, that Selymus might not make too much hast to begin that war, which would set all Europe on a broile; but rather by his embassadors first to declare his mind to the Senat, for that so it might haply come to passe, that al might be quieted, to the good of both parties with-E out war. Which the politick embassador requested not of the Bassa for any hope he had to auert the war, for which the Turk had now al things in a readinesse, but only by such an hope of composition, to hinder the Turks endeauors, and to win time, vntill that the State (being fully certified of al these matters) might make ready their fleet & forces, and so in armes be ready to answer their armed foes: Neither did he euer leaue the Bassa, vntill he had by his means procured, That one Cubates should be sent Embassadour to Venice, to proue the mindes of the Senators, whether they would willingly deliuer the Island, or aduenture to haue it taken from them by force. These things and such like as were then done at Constantinople, beeing by letters sent in post from the Embassadour, made knowne at Venice, brought a generall heaul-nesse vpon the citie: for why, that vnderstanding and prouident State, warned by their former Selymus sendeth Cubates his embassadour to Venice.
F harmes; of all others most dread the Turks forces. Cubates the embassadour accompanied with Aloysius Barbarus the Embassadours sonne, and Bonricius his Secretarie, departing from Constantinople, came by long iourneyes to Ragusium, where Angelus Surianus sent from Venice to meete him, was readie to receiue him, who beeing taken into his gallie, brought him to Venice.

In

In the meane time the Senators sitting oftentimes in counsell were diuided in opinions concerning the chiefe matter they consulted vpon: some there were, that thought it not good to wage war against such an inuincible enemie, nor to trust vpon a vaine and idle hope, neither to commit all vnto the hazard of such fortune as was vnto them in that war by the enemie pounded: they alledged, That they had alwaies vnfortunately taken vp armes against the Turks, and that therefore they should set before their eyes, what harmes they had suffered, and how that beside the losses already sustained, they had alwaies in the winding vp of the warres lost something more: that it were better to depart with Cyprus, so that they might quietly inioy the rest, rather than to enter into armes: Time they said, would at length giue them some one fit occasion or other to recouer that they had lost, and to restore their state vnto their former honour; which for the present, was aboue their power to maintaine: To put their trust in their confederats (they said) was but to deceiue themselues: they should remember how often euen small causes of false suspition, or hope of profit, or feare of harme, had vtterly frustrated and broken in sunder the most solemne capitulations of the strongest leagues: how often true succion had come thence from whence ayd was alwayes to haue bin hoped for, they need not to seeke further for examples, than from their owne domestical affaires. Others were of a contrary opinion, as that the Island was by force of armes to be defended: saying, That nothing could be more dishonorable, than without fight to depart with so notable a part of their seignorie; neither any thing more commendable, than to proue all things for defence of their honour; neither would the proud Turks, with whom no assured league could be made (as they said) hold themselues content with this yeelding vp of the Island, but by intreating of them and giuing them way, become more insolent: and when they had taken Cyprus from them, would also seeke after Creet & Corcyra, and so yeelding them one thing after another, spoile themselues of all together: Ambitious and greedie Princes (they said) grew more bold and insolent by other mens feare: and that no great or notable matter was to be don without danger: that hard beginnings had oftentimes merrie endings: that the fauor and good will of that insatiable and greedy nation, was not to be gained but with so great losse and charge as that such a costly peace would be much more hurtfull than war it selfe: beside that, it much concerned other Christian Princes to haue the Venetian State preserued, and that therefore it was to be hoped, that they would to the vttermost of their power giue them aid. The matter thus debated too and fro, it was in the end resolued vpon, to take vp armes in defence of their honour, and by plaine force to withstand the Turke.

Hard to trust vpon confederations.

So when Cubates the Turks embassadour came to Venice, neither did any man of courtesie meet him, neither was any honor done vnto him, or so much as common courtesie shewed vnto him: but being afterward admitted into the Senat house with his two interpretors only, he deliuered Selymus his letters, inclosed in a little bag wrought with silke & gold; and so whilest the same letters were in breaking vp, and translating out of the Turkish language into Italian, deliuered also his message by word of mouth, as followeth:

What great account the mightie Sultan my dread Soueraigne hath alwayes made of your most honourable friendship, is therein right well declared, That in the verie entrance of himselfe into his Empire, hee foorthwith and without any hard or new conditions renewed his league with you: which hee hath on his part alwayes kept most faithfully and vnuiolate; worthily grieuing the like kindnesse not to bee shewed on your behalfe, neither the like care of keeping your faith to appeare in you; who by harbouring of Pyrats in your hauens, and murthering of his subiects, haue oftentimes broken the league. Which iniuries, although they were by war to haue beene reuenged; yet hath hee, so mightie a monarch, hitherto beene alwayes more mindfull of your honour and friendship, than of his owne maiesty and profit. But for somuch as there is no end of these iniuries & wrongs, and that it is now come to that point, That longer to forbeare, might be imputed vnto him rather for cowardise than courtesie, as also that it much more concerneth your state than him, and that therefore you ought no lesse than hee to desire, that all cause of vnkindnesse might bee cut off, and order taken, that in so great and mutuall goodwill, there should bee no falling out by new quarrells dayly arising: the onely remedie thereof is, if you shall deliuer vnto him the Island of Cyprus, the cause of all these grieuances. Now it beseemeth you for your great wisedome, to make small reckoning of [illegible] small a matter, in comparison of the fauor of so great a Prince; which if you willingly of your [illegible] yeeld vnto him, you shall right wisely prouide

A prouide for your affaires, and haue him so great a monarch alwaies your friend and confederat: where if you shall shew your selues obstinate, and not to yeeld to this his so small a request, his purpose is, by strong hand not only to take from you the Island, the cause of the war, but also to prosecute you with most cruell war both by sea and land. And thereupon I take God to witnesse, all the blame of the calamities to ensue of so mortal a war, to be imputed vnto your selues, as the worthy reward of your wilfulnesse and breach of faith.

Which said, he in the name of Muhamet the Visier Bassa told the Senatours, That he was right sorie that this breach was fallen out betwixt the Emperor Selymus & them; and that although he doubted not but that they would right wisely consider of all things; yet he could not for the good will he bare vnto them, but admonish them of such things as he deemed for them both profitable and wholesome: and therefore did most instantly request them, and withall aduise them, not to enter into armes against so mightie a Prince, neither wilfully to plunge themselues into such dangers, as they could hardly or neuer find the way out; for that their strength was nothing answerable vnto his, and that the euent of that war would be vnto them deadly: and therefore he tooke God and the loue that he bare vnto them to witnesse, that he had in friendly sort forewarned them of their harms, and aduised them for their good. Giuing them further to vnderstand, that Selymus did nothing but thunder out most cruell threats against their State; which his indignation was raised of the manifold complaints brought against them to his court at Constantinople.

Selymus his letters answerable to his Embassadours speech, was also full of false surmised grieuances; he complained, That the Venetians had in warlike maner entred into the frontiers of his Empire in Dalmatia, and there had done great harme; that they had put to death certain Turkish pyrats whom they had taken aliue: that their Island of Cyprus was an harbor for the pyrats of the West; and that from thence they robbed his peaceable countries, and surprised his subiects trauelling that way for deuotion vnto the Temple of Mecha, or otherwise about their affaires. And that therefore those causes of discord might be taken away, and the hinderance of traffique remoued, he required them to yeeld vnto him the Island of Cyprus: which if they refused to do, he would by force of arms take it from them; and by force of strong hand cause them to do that which they might the better haue done frankly and of their owne accord; and further, to make them vnderstand how far the Turks did excell all other men in martial prowesse. As for the league before made betwixt his father and them, he said he had renewed the same, not becaus he had any liking thereunto, but becaus he had as then set downe with himselfe, for a while in the beginning of his Empire peaceably to endure all things.

The Venetians, for that they knew the Embassadours errand before his comming, hauing now read his Letters, gaue him such answere as they had before resolued vpon: which was, That the Venetians had at all times inuiolably kept their leagues with the Othoman Emperors, and had in regard thereof let slip many opportunities and fit occasions for them to haue augmented their dominions in: That they could without any danger to themselues, haue destroyed the Turks fleet both at the Rhodes and Malta, and other places also; but that they more regarded their honour; and alwaies thought, that nothing better became great and magnificent Princes, than to performe their faith once giuen, and in all their actions to be like themselues. And therefore had dissembled and put vp many grieuous & bitter indignities, lest they might be thought to haue first broken the league: That they had neuer passed their owne bounds, or inuaded the Turks; only to haue taken order, that no pyrats should at their pleasure roame vp and downe the seas. Now whereas all duties being on their part sincerely and most religiously kept, Selymus complained himselfe to be wronged, whereas he himselfe had done the wrong, and had contrary to the league, denounced war against them, expecting nothing lesse: sithence that they could not by the power of the league, they would by force of arms defend that Kingdome, which they by antient and lawfull right possessed, deliuered vnto them by their Ancestors. That God, in whose helpe they trusted, would weigh in indifferent balance, all mens words and deeds; whom they tooke to witnesse, that they were the authors of peace, and Selymus the cause of war: and that the same God would be now present vnto their iust complaints, and forthwith after with his power to take reuenge on them, which falsifying their faith and promise giuen, and violating the sacred league, had enforced them to take vp most iust and necessarie armes, which they would with the same courage manage, that they had taken them in hand. G

With this answer the Embassador departed, let out by a secret postern, for feare of the people; who hauing got knowledge of the matter, were in great number assembled to the Court gate, muttering among themselues, that it were wel done to rend in pieces that accursed Turke, the messenger of his faithlesse Master. Which outrage it was thought they would in their furie haue performed, had not such as by the commandement of the magistrats garded him, better assured him of his safetie, than either regard of dutie or the law of nations; he by the way as he went still storm[ed] and swearing by his Mahomet to be of that so great an indignitie reuenged. This answer [of the] Senat vnto the Turks Embassador concerning warre, was of some well liked and highly [com]mended, as full of honour and valour. Others deemed too sharpe, liking of nothing that w[as] said or done to the further incensing of the Turkish Emperor: being of opinion, that they might haue of him obtained a more indifferent peace by curtesie than by rigor. As for the decreed warre, they vtterly disliked, forasmuch as all wars were wo[rse] but especially those that were to be maintained against them that are too strong for vs. In such diuersitie of opinions it appeared, That the Senat should of that so honorable a decree reap such commendation, as the euent thereof should afford (than which nothing is more vnreasonable:) if things fell out well, then was it wisely and worthily done; if otherwise, then was it like to be reputed a foolish, a rash, and wofull resolution. H

The greater the danger was now feared from the angrie Turke, the more carefull were the Venetians of their State: wherefore they forthwith sent messengers with letters vnto the Gouernors of Cyprus; charging them with all carefulnes and diligence to make themselues readie to withstand the Turke, and to raise what power they were able in the Island, not omitting any thing that might concerne the good of the state: and at the same time made choise of their most valiant & expert captains both by sea and land, vnto whom they committed the defence of their dispersed Seigniorie, with the leading of their forces. Hieronimus Zanius was appointed Admirall, Lucas Michael was sent into Crete, Franciscus Barbarus into Dalmatia, Sebastianus Venerius into Corcyra, all men of great honour, experience and valour. Other meaner captaines were also sent with lesse charge into the aforesaid places, as Eugenius Singliticus a noble gentleman with 1000 footmen into Cyprus, who had also the leading of all the horsemen in the Island: after whom Countie Martinengus promised to follow with 2000 foomen moe. The strong cities were now by the Venetians in all places new fortified, armor, ordnance, and victual prouided, and whatsoeuer els they thought needful for defence of their State. And for as much as they well knew they had to do with too mightie an enemie, they by their Embassadors sent for that purpose, earnestly solicited most of the Christian princes to ioine with them in league, and to giue them aid against the common enemie, who as he was too strong for any one of them, so were he not able to stand against their vnited forces. But the Emperor Maximilian excused himselfe by the league he had not long before made with the Turke for eight yeares, which he said he might not breake: yet he had before his eyes a most pregnant example, what small reckoning the Turke maketh of his faith and league, which he without any iust cause had broken with the Venetians. The like excused vse also Charles the French king, and Sigismund king of Polonia; who both seemed to be verie sorie for that the Venetians were fallen out with the Turke, but could not help them for that they were in league with the Turkish Emperor. Neuertheless the French king did them the courtesie, to offer himselfe to be a mediator, if they so pleased, betwixt them and Selymus. The yong king of Portingal Don Sebastian pretended also for his excuse the great plague which had but a little before raged in his kingdome, & much diminished his people; as also that he was to maintaine wars by sea against the Turkes in the East-Indies, to the no lesse benefit of the Christian commonweale, than if he should aid the Venetians in the Mediterranian. Only Pius Quintus then Pope, and Philip king of Spaine, with certaine of the Princes of Italie; namely Philibert duke of Sauoy, Guido Vbaldus duke of Vrbin, Cosmus Medices duke of Florence, & the knights of Malta, promised them aid, which they afterward most honorably performed. I K L M

The Emperour, the French king and the King of Polonia entangled with their leagues, refused to aid the Venetians against the Turks.

What Christian Princes promised to aid the Venetians.

Selymus of himselfe angrie with the Venetians, and [more] in his resolution for the conquest of Cyprus, was vpon the report of Cubates his Emb[assador] bad entertainment at Venice, further inraged: he deemed the Maiestie of the Turkish Emperor contemned, and himself in the person

A person of his Embassador disgraced: seeing that they whom he had thought would haue yelded vnto any thing, rather than the league should haue bin broken, had sent him such a shorr answer, and so contemptuously vsed his Embassador, vnto whom they had not afforded so much as common curtesie. It did not a little moue him also, that the Venetians had in their letters sent by his Embassador, omitted the glorious titles vsually giuen the Turkish Emperors: wherfore in some part to satisfie his angrie mood, he caused Marcus Antonius Barbarus the Venetian Embassadour, and all the Christian merchants of the West thorowout his Empire, to be clapt vp in prison, and their ships stayed vnder an arrest. And setting all other things apart, set himselfe wholly for the preparing of such things as should be needfull for the intended war.

But forasmuch as the Island of Cyprus was the prey whereafter the greedie tyrant so much B gaped, and for which the bloudie wars betwixt the Turke and the Venetians with their Christian confederats, presently ensued; it shal not be from our purpose to spend a few words in the describing thereof, as the stage whereon the bloudie tragedie following was as it were acted: as also, how it came first into the hands of the Venetians, and by what right of them so long possessed (although it be in some part before declared) vntill it was now by Selymus the Great Turke, against all right iniuriously demanded, & at length by strong hand by him wrested from them. This Island lieth in the farthest of the Cilician sea: it hath on the East Siria, on the West Pamphilia, Southward it regardeth Ægypt, and Northward Cilicia, now called Caramania. It is worthily accounted amongst the greatest Islands of the Mediterranian, containing in circuit 427 miles, and is in length (after the description of Strabo) 175 miles, and in bredth not C aboue 65. It aboundeth with corne, wine, oyle, cotton wooll, saffron, hony, rosin, turpentine, sugar canes, and whatsoeuer els is needfull for the sustentation of man, whereof it sends forth great abundance to other countries, of whom it craueth no helpe againe. It was in antient time called Macaria, that is to say, Blessed. The people therein generally liued so at ease & pleasure, that thereof the Island was dedicated to Venus, who was there especially worshipped, & thereof called Cypria. Marcellinus to shew the fertilitie thereof, saith, That Cyprus aboundeth with such plenty of all things, that without the helpe of any other foraine country, it is of it self able to build a tall ship from the keele to the top saile, and so put it to sea furnished of all things needfull. And Sextus Rufus writing thereof, saith, Cyprus famosa diuitijs, paupertatem populi Romani, vt occuparetur solicitauit, ita vt ius eius insulæ auarius magis quam iniustus simus assecuti, &c. Cyprus famous for wealth, allured the pouertie of the people of Rome to lay hold vpon it, so that D we haue rather couetously than iustly got the rule thereof. In the heart of the Island standeth Nicosia, sometime the regall and late metropoliticall citie thereof. And in the East end thereof Famagusta, sometime called Tamassus, a famous rich citie, the chiefe and only port of all that most pleasant Island. Other faire cities there be also, as Paphos, Amathus (now called Limisso) and Cyrene. This Island of it selfe long time maintained the maiestie of a Kingdome, as then when Richard the first, King of England, passing that way with his fleet for the reliefe of the Christians then distressed in the Holy land about the yeare 1191, was prohibited there to land, and certain of his people by force of tempest there cast on shore, were by the Cypriots either cruelly slaine or taken prisoners: which barbarous violence king Richard tooke in so euil part, E that he there by force landed his armie, and rested not vntill he had taken Isaac the king prisoner, and subdued the Island. The king he sent in chaines of siluer to Tripolis, there to be kept in close prison; the kingdome he kept a while in his owne hand, which not long after he gaue, or as some say, exchanged with Guido the titular King of Hierusalem: for which cause the Kings of England for a certain time afterwards were honored with the title of the Kings of Ierusalem. This kingdome by many discents came at length to Ianus son of king Peter, who in the yeare 1423, was by Melechel a Sultan of Ægypt taken prisoner; but afterwards for the ransome of 115000 Sultanins was set at libertie and restored to his kingdome, paying vnto the Sultan and his successors a yerely tribute of 4000 crownes. This Ianus left a son called John, who after the death of his father maried the daughter of the Marquis of Mont-Ferrat: after whose death M he married one Helena of the most noble house of the Paleologi in Græcia, by whom he had one only daughter called Carlotte; but by another woman a base son called Iames. This King John was a man of no courage, altogether giuen to pleasure, & according to the manner of his effeminat education, shewed himself in al things more like a woman than a man: which Helena his wife, a woman of a great spirit, quickly perceiuing, tooke vpon her the soueraignty and whole gouern-

King Richard in England.

gouernment of the Realme, gracing and disgracing whom she pleased, and promoting to the Ecclesiasticall dignities such as shee best liked; abolishing the Latine ceremonies, and bringing in them of the Greekes, and tooke such further order as pleased her selfe in matters of state concerning both peace and warre; her husband in the meane time regarding nothing but his vaine pleasure: wherby it came to passe that all was brought into the power of the Greeks the queenes friends. Now the queene her selfe was much ruled by the counsell of her nurse, and the nurse by her daughter: so that the people would commonly say, The daughter ruled the nurse, the nurse the queene, and the queene the king. The nobilitie ashamed and wearie of this manner of gouernment, by generall consent of the people, sent for Iohn the king of Portingals cousin german (some call the king of Portingal) to whome they gaue Carlotte the kings daughter in marriage, with full power to supplie that want of gouernment which was in king Iohn his father in law. He taking the authoritie into his hands, quickely reformed the disordred kingdome, as well in matters concerning religion, as ciuile policie. The Latine Ceremonies were againe restored, and the gouernment of the daughter, the nurse, and the Queene, brought to an end. But the mischieuous daughter doubting the countenance of the yong king, perswaded her mother, as she tendred her owne life, to poison the king. Which thing the wretched woman (by the consent of the queene mother, as was reported) in short time performed, and so brought that noble prince, wel worthie longer life, vnto his vntimely end: whereby the gouernment was again restored to the Greeke queene, who in the name of her weake husband commanded again at her pleasure. But aboue all, the nurse and her daughter insulted vpon the yong queene Carlotte: which she not well brooking, grieuously complained thereof to Iames her base brother, requiring his helpe for redresse thereof: who not long after slew the nurses daughter, not so much in reuenge of the wrong by her done vnto his sister, as to prepare a way for himselfe for the obtaining of the kingdome: grieuing inwardly, that shee or her husband should be preferred before himselfe. Which thing Helena the queene quickly perceiuing, perswaded the King her husband to cause his base son to enter into the orders of priesthood, and so to become a Church-man, thereby to cut off all his hope of aspiring vnto the kingdome: which the king at her instance did, and made him Archbishop of Nicosia. In the meane time Carlotte by the perswasion of her mother and the nobilitie of the country, married Lewis son to the duke of Sauoy: who being for that purpose sent for, came with all speed to Cyprus. After that, the queene mother and the old nurse (desiring nothing more, than to reuenge the death of the nurses daughter, vpon Iames now Archbishop) deuised first how to thrust him out of all his spirituall promotions, which were great; and afterward quite banish him the kingdome. Hereupon the queene wrot letters against him to the Pope, to haue him disgraded, for that he being a man base borne, with his hands imbrued with guiltlesse bloud, was vnworthie of holy orders. Which letters by chance came to Iames his hands: who inraged therewith, accompanied with a number of his friends and fauorits, suddenly entred the court, slew such of his enemies as he found there, diuided their goods amongst his followers, and as king possessed himselfe of the regall citie. In this broile the Greeke queen Helena died, and shortly after her husband also. All things being thus in a hurley and out of order, certaine of the nobilitie for redresse thereof, sent for Lewis the husband of Carlotte, as for him to whom that kingdome in the right of his wife most iustly belonged: who vpon his arriuall was of all sorts of men ioyfully receiued & welcommed as their king. Iames the vsurper vnderstanding before of the comming of Lewis, and perceiuing the inclination of the people towards him, fled with diuers of his friends to Alexandria to craue aid of the Ægyptian Sultan: in whose court he found such fauour, as that he was by the Sultans commandement royally apparelled and honored with the title of the king of Cyprus; which he promised for euer to hold of the Sultans of Ægypt as their vassal and tributary. At which time the Sultan also by his embassadors commanded Lewis to depart the Isle: who by all means sought to haue pacified the Sultan, declaring vnto him his rightfull title, yet offering to pay vnto him the wonted tribute, and to allow vnto Iames a yerely pension of 10000 duckets during his life. But all in vaine; for Iames still present in the Sultans court, and wisely following his owne suit, at last concluded with the great Sultan (who thought it more honour to make a king, than to confirme a king) and receiuing of him a great armie, returned into Cyprus: where in short time he so dispossessed Lewis, that he was glad to forsake the Island, with his wife, and to returne into his country, leauing the kingdome of Cyprus againe again to Iames: who now by the supportation of the Ægyptian Sultan possessed therof, yet liued not without care of Carlotte & her husband Lewis, whom he knew the Cipriots wondefully affected. Wherfore for the more assurance of his estate, he thought it best to ioyne in league and friendship with the Venetians, whom he knew to be of great power at sea, and of all other fittest to crosse whatsoeuer Lewis should in the right of his wife attempt against him. Which league he afterwards made, and the better to confirme the same, tooke to wife Catharin Cornelia, the daughter of Marcus Cornelius a Magnifico of Venice, being before adopted to the Senat, and euer after their reputed daughter. Not long after this marriage, Iames died in the yere 1470, leauing the queene great with child, who in due time was deliuered of a faire son; vnto whom with the mother the Venetian State became tutors, as their adoptiue fathers, & in their behalfe tooke vpon them the gouernment of the realme. This childe shortly after died also, not without some suspition of poison; after whose death great troubles arose in the kingdom, insomuch that Andreas Cornelius the queens vncle, a most graue counsellour, and gouernor of the Realme vnder the queene, was by the conspiracie of certaine noblemen slaine, and all the Island readie to reuolt from the queene. For appeasing of which troubles, the Venetians were glad oftentimes to send their admirals with their gallies into Cyprus, to take order in the matter, and to aid the queene: who at length perswaded by George Cornelius her brother, whilest it was yet in her power, as a louing daughter to yeeld vp the kingdom vnto her adoptiue fathers, which she destitute both of counsell and power, could not long hold so far from her friends, beset on the one side with the Great Turke, and on the other with the mightie Sultan of Ægypt. She I say thus perswaded by her brother, came to Venice, where she was with the greatest honor that could be deuised, receiued by the Duke & whole State at sea in their great and goodly ship the Beucentaure, and so with all royall triumph brought thorow the midst of the citie vnto the place most richly for the time appointed for the receiuing of her: where shortly after attired in all her royal habiliments she came in great maiestie vnto the Senat house, and there before the tribunal seat of Augustinus Barbadicus then duke of Venice, laied downe her crowne and scepter, and as a most louing daughter resigned vp her kingdome, to the great honor and profit of her country. Thus the kingdome of Cyprus was deliuered into the hands of the Venetians in the yeare 1473; which they peaceable held from that time, paying vnto the Sultans of Ægypt such tribute as had the late king Iames: which yearely tribute they in like manner payed vnto the Turkish Emperors, after that the kingdome of Ægypt was by Selymus the first conquered in the yeare 1517, as due vnto him by law of armes: with which yearely tribute both Selymus himselfe, and Solyman after him, held themselues well contented. But now this Turkish Emperor Selymus the second, of whom we speake, desirous both of the honour of such a conquest, and of so rich a prey, made no account of the accustomed tribute, but of the fruitfull Island it selfe: whereof he, as is before declared, hath by his Embassadour made a proud demand, but is thereof denied by the Senat.

Selymus throughly furnished with all things necessarie for the inuasion of Cyprus, in the beginning of Februarie sent a great power both of horse and foot into Epirus, and the fontiers of Dalmatia, to forrage the Venetian territorie, especially about Iadera; of purpose by that war so neere at home, to withdraw them from the defence of Cyprus so far off. About the middle of April following he sent Piall Bassa with fourescore gallies and thirtie galliots to keepe the Venetians from sending aid into Cyprus. This Piall was an Hungarian, borne of base parents, but turning Turke, and giuing himselfe to armes, was first preferred for his valor shewed against the Christians at Zerbi, and afterward by many degrees rise to the honor of one of the greatest Bassa's. He departing from Constantinople, and cutting through Peloponesus and Hellespontus, came to Euboea, and there for certaine dayes lay in such order, as if he should haue presently giuen the enemie battell: but vnderstanding by his espials, that the Venetians grieuously visited with the plague, and slowly relieued by their friends, were not like in haste to come out, he tooke his course to Tenos an Island of the Venetians, to haue taken it from them. This Island is one of the Cyclades, and was by nature strong, but stronger by the industrie of the defendants; who liuing far from the Christian countries, and compassed about with such cruell and warlike enemies, as people far distant stood in dread of, could neuer for any feare or danger be remoued from the Christian religion, or induced to submit themselues to the Turks gouernment, as most of the other Islands had. Piall here landing his forces, fought both by meanes and foule to haue perſuaded the Inhabitants to haue yeelded vp their Towne: G but when he could get nothing of them but foule words againe, he began by force to aſſault the ſame. Two dayes the Towne was valiantly both aſſaulted and defended: but at length the Turkes perceiuing how little they preuailed, and that the defendants were reſolutely ſet downe for the defence of themſelues and their Countrey; ſhamefully gaue ouer the aſſault, and abandoning the Iſland, directed their courſe toward Cyprus. For Muſtapha authour of that expedition (for his antient hatred againſt the Chriſtians made Generall by Selymus) had before appointed Piall Baſſa at a time prefixed to meet him at the Rhodes, and that he that came firſt ſhould tarrie for the other, that ſo they might together ſayle into Cyprus.

Muſtapha hauing before ſent a great part of his armie by land into Pamphilia, embarqued H the reſt with Haly Baſſa General of the forces at ſea, who yet ſtaied for him with the reſt of the fleet at Conſtantinople. This Haly was one of the chiefe Baſſa's, a man of great account and ſometime an eſpeciall and noted follower of Muhamet Baſſa; but now (as it is oftentimes elſe-where ſeene, that men together with the change of fortune, change their mindes and affections alſo) was become a great fauorite of Muſtapha. Now to colour ſo manifeſt a wrong & breach of the Turks faith, Muſtapha the Generall, according to the Turkiſh manner, a little before his arriuall in Cyprus, gaue the Venetians there to vnderſtand by letters of his comming, as alſo of his purpoſe for the taking of that Iſland from them: for that without ſome ſuch ſlender denouncing of war vnto them againſt whom it is intended, the Turks generally account their expeditions not to be altogether ſo lawfull or fortunate as otherwiſe; and therefore writ vnto I them in this ſort:

Muſtapha Baſſa his Letters vnto the Venetians.

That the kingdome of Cyprus by antient right belongeth vnto the kingdome of Ægypt, you are not ignorant; which being conquered by the Turks, is together with it become of right a part alſo of the Othoman Empire: that Iſland we come to challenge, leading after vs two hundred thouſand valiant ſoldiers, vnto which power, and the wealth of the Othoman kingdomes (all which, the moſt mightie Emperor is about, if need ſhall be, to ſend thither, and to bend his whole ſtrength thereon) all the vnited forces of the Chriſtian kings are not comparable; much leſſe the Venetians, ſo ſmall a part of Europe, forſaken K of their friends, can ſuffice. Wherefore we will and exhort you, for the antient amitie which hath beene betwixt your State and the victorious Othoman Familie, to yeeld this kingdome vnto the moſt puiſſant Emperour, whoſe verie name is become dreadfull vnto all the nations of the world; and quietly and without reſiſtance to leaue the Iſland, with the loue and friendſhip of ſo great a Monarch to be for euer inuiolably kept betwixt him and you. Whereas if you ſhall before ſuch wholeſome counſell, fondly prefer your vaine hopes, you are to expect all the calamities of war, with ſuch dreadfull examples as the angrie Conquerors vſe to make of their vanquiſhed enemies. For reſolution whereof, we yet giue you haiſe a moneths ſpace to bethinke your ſelues in: and ſo fare you well.

Muſtapha Baſſa goeth for Cyprus.

All this being now in readineſſe, and a moſt royal gally of wonderfull greatneſſe and beauty L by the appointment of Selymus prepared for the great Baſſa the Generall; he together with Haly Baſſa and the reſt of the fleet departed from Conſtantinople the ſix and twentieth of May, and at the Rhodes met with Piall, as he had before appointed. The whole fleet at that time conſiſted of two hundred gallies, amongſt whom were diuers galliots, and ſmall men of war, with diuers other veſſels prepared for the tranſportation of horſes: with this fleet Muſtapha enemies comming, from their watch-towers firſt diſcouered their fleet at the Weſt end of the Iſland, not far from Paphos: from whence the Turks turning vpon the right hand, and paſſing the promontorie Curio, now called Del Le Gate, landed diuers of their men, who burnt and ſpoiled certaine villages, and with ſuch ſpoile and priſoners as they had taken, returned againe M

(of the abundance of ſalt there made) where they knew the beſt landing, and there in an open roade came to an anchor, where the Baſſa's without any reſiſtance vpon a plaine ſhore landed their armie.

A Now all the hope of the Chriſtians, was to haue kept the Turks from landing, which they ſhould with all their ſtrength and power haue done; neither was it a matter of any great difficulty, for had the defendants but kept the ſhore, and from the drie and firme land valiantly repulſed their enemies, they might vndoubtedly with their ſhot and weapons haue kept them from landing, or els haue done them greater harme: knowing in the mean time, that in all the Iſland was no good harbour for them to put into, and that riding in an open road ſubiect to all wind and weather, they could not long without danger of ſhipwracke ride it out: but they either terrified with the greatneſſe of the fleet, or preuented by the celeritie of the enemie, to their great hurt omitted ſo faire an opportunitie, as the wofull ſequell of the matter declared.
It exceedingly incouraged the Turkes that they had ſo eaſily footed the Iſland, which they B thought they ſhould not haue done without a bloudie fight.

The Baſſa now landed, preſently intrenched his army, and forthwith ſent the fleet to tranſ-port the reſt of his forces out of Pamphilia into the Iſland. And at the ſame time ſent out certaine ſcouts to take ſome priſoners, of whom they might learne the ſcituation of the country, the beſt waies to paſſe them with his army, the ſtrength of his enemies, & what they did, and many other ſuch like things which it concerned him to know. But the greateſt queſtion among the Turks themſelues was, Whether they ſhould firſt let vpon Famaguſta or Nicoſia? Fama-guſta ſtandeth low, altogether ſubiect to the ſcorching heat, which was then great, according as the time of the yeare, and nature of the countrey required: wherefore the Baſſa for feare of diſeaſes to ariſe in his army of the immoderate heat and vnwholſome ſcituation of the place, C thought it better to begin his wars with the ſiege of Nicoſia, and to make that city the ſeat of the warre, for the conqueſt of the reſt of the Iſland. So hauing put all things in order, and well viewed the countrey, and finding nothing he needed to ſtand in doubt of, he ſet forward with his armie toward Nicoſia, which was about thirtie miles diſtant, being the chiefe and richeſt citie of all the Iſland. Which way ſoeuer the army marched, it ſpread a great deale of ground, and the neerer it came, the greater was the ſlaughter of the countrie people, and the number of priſoners taken of al ſorts. But when newes of the enemies approch was brought into the city, a generall feare preſaging future miſerie poſſeſſed the hearts of all men. There was not in the citie any valiant or renowned captaine, who as the danger of the time required, ſhould haue taken vpon him the charge: neither any ſtrong army in the Iſland to oppoſe againſt the ene-D my: the Gouernour of the city was one Nicholaus Dandulus, a man too weake for ſo great a burthen; who alwaies brought vp in ciuile affaires, was to ſeek how to defend a ſiege. Of the citiſens and country people he had taken vp foure thouſand footmen, and a thouſand horſemen, all raw ſoldiers, commanded by the gentlemen of the country, men of all others moſt courteous: but as well the captaines as the ſouldiers, as men brought vp in a plentifull countrey, fitter for pleaſure than for war. The greateſt hope and ſtrength of the city, was repoſed in twelue hundred Italian footmen, and ſix hundred horſemen. The whole number of the ſouldiers in garriſon for defence of the city, was deemed about 8000 horſe and foot: too weake a companie againſt ſo fierce and ſtrong an enemy; and the more, for that the Baſſa an old and moſt expert Generall was there in perſon himſelfe preſent, a moſt ſeuere and abſolute commander, whom E it would haue beene a hard matter to haue withſtood with equall power. The Venetians hauing euer had great care of the Iſland of Cyprus, as lying far from them, in the midſt of the ſworne enemies of the Chriſtian religion, and had therefore oftentimes determined to haue fortified the ſame: yet fearing thereby to ſeeme to diſtruſt or dread the Turks, and ſo giue them occa-ſion of offence, left it ſtill vndone. This citie of Nicoſia ſtandeth in the middeſt of the Iſland, in a plaine and champaine country, compaſſed round with a wall, as it it had been drawne with a compaſſe, and is in circuit about fiue miles: for the manner of the ſcituation, and magnificent buildings, as well publicke as priuat, many haue compared it vnto the beautifull citie of Florence in Italie: and was for the wholeſome and commodious ſcituation thereof notably peopled. This citie had the Venetians of late fortified with new wals, thicke rampiers, and eleuen F ſtrong bulwarkes, according to the manner of the fortification of our time, and had raiſed three great fortreſſes for defence of the wall, which they furniſhed with a ſtrong garriſon, great ſtore of artillerie, and other warlike prouiſion. Neuertheleſſe, they found by experience in this war, That fortifications are ſtrengthened by the defendants, rather than the defendants by the fortifications.

The Turks before Nicosia.

22 of Iuly, the Bassa with his army incamped within a mile & a halfe of the city, when presently the Turks by troups issuing out of the campe, rid contemptuously before the walls and gates of the citie, and with often & lowd outcries vpbraided the defendants: which by them being answered with silence, was taken as a token of their feare. And Mustapha himselfe comming as neere as he might without danger, tooke full view of the wals and situation of the citie. Shortly after, the enemy drew neerer vnto the citie into a more open plaine, and with their tents filled the lower part of the hil, which they called Mandia: but the Bassaes tent they set aloft vpon the hill to the terrour of the defendants and incouragement of the Turks. The campe being fortified [illegible] Turkes with incredible labour and celeritie brought their trenches from far, and at the fir[illegible] vp some few forts, but afterwards, as their armie increased, many mo, which they raised [illegible]gh, that they ouertopped the wals of the citie, and made the place more dangerous for the Christians to defend. There hauing placed 70 great pieces of batterie, they began to batter the citie both day and night without intermission; with such a horrible thundring, that the earth trembled, the houses shooke as if they would haue falne down: at which time many were slaine; both with the deadly shot, and the broken pieces of stones beaten out of the wals: neuer was such a feare as then within the citie of Nicosia: euery day the enemie brought his trenches neerer and neerer, and rested not vntill he had with restlesse labour brought them vnto the verie brim of the towne ditch, which the citizens before the comming of the Turks had not well scoured. Being come so nigh, they first skirmished a farre off with their smal pieces: but afterwards, they not only battered the wals with their great artillerie, but with small shot, arrowes, and stones, ouerwhelmed the defendants, as if it had bin a shower of haile; so to haue driuen them from off the wall & rampiers. In few daies, not onely all the curtaines betwixt three of the bulwarks, was by the furie of the great ordnance beaten downe, but all places thereabout lay full of the dead bodies of the assailants & defendants. For although the Christians fought at great disaduantage, both for the number of men, and indifferencie of the place: yet desperation ioyned with extreme necessitie, of all other the greatest weapon, gaue them such courage, as with shot, stones, timber, and such like, to keep down their enemies, and defend their wals; and oftentimes to make great slaughter of them, with their artillerie & murthering pieces, bent vpon them as at a certain marke, who the thicker they stood the greater was their harme. They also oftentimes dismounted many of the great pieces and made them vnseruiceable; and with featherbeds and sacks of cotten wool, made vp their breaches: which the Turks labored again to burn with pitch barrels, and earthen pots full of wild fire. After long fight the Turkes entring the ditch, made themselues two wayes to the walls, which they fortified on both sides with fagots & earth; in such sort, as that they were safe from the loupes of the bulwarks which flankered the ditch. All this quickly performed, some presently set vp scalling ladders: others filled the ditches with rubbish, wood, fagots, & earth; and others in the mean time with mattocks and leauers were digging down the foundations of the bulwarkes Constance and Podocatera, taking name of them that had the chiefe charge in the building thereof. The Christians right valiantly indured the first assault of the enemie, and strucke downe dead into the ditches many of them that were climing vp the ladders: & had in short time slain mo than they were themselues in number, & inforced the rest to giue ouer the assault. These things were done in the beginning of the siege, whilest yet both parties were strong: in which hard conflicts a great number of souldiers were lost, & most of the canoniers slain. After this assault, both parties for a while busied themselues & spent the time in their ingenious deuises: wherein it appeared, that the Turks were much cunninger in deuising of means to take cities, than were those Christians in defending the same.

Nicosia battred and assaulted, & by the Christians valiantly defended.

Now had the Venetians in the first motions of these warres, prayed aid of diuers Christian Princes, from most part of whom they receiued but cold comfort, as is before declared: yet now at length (though somewhat late) they had drawn into the confederation of this war, the Pope & the king of Spain: by whose example some other princes of Italie moued, put to also their helping hands. The Venetians, as they whom the matter most concerned, had in good time put their fleet to sea; but knowing themselues too weake to encounter the Turks, they lay still vpon the coast of Dalmatia, about Iadera, expecting the [illegible]ming of the Spanish Admirall with his gallies. Two moneths (wherein much might haue been done) were now past in this expedition, and yet no newes [illegible] his comming: so that what the speed and industrie of the Venetians

A Venetians had well prepared, was by the delay and lingering of the Spaniard, marred. Besides that, the plague began to arise in the fleet, lying so long in one place; which at length grew so hot, that many of the gallies had neither mariner nor souldier left in them: neither did this mortality so cease, vntill there were twentie thousand dead thereof; amongst whom were many noble gentlemen of great account, which might haue done their country good seruice, had they been in time imployed.

Sommer now almost halfe spent, and the plague well ceased, the Venetian Admirall weary of expecting of the comming of Auria the Spanish Admirall; gathering together his fleete which he had before dispersed to auoid the infection, sailed to Corcyra, where he met with Venerius, another of the Venetian commanders, who there staid for him, hauing but a little be-
B fore taken from the Turks Cestria, now called Suppoto, a town vpon the sea coast ouer against Corcyra. The whole fleet of the Venetians beeing assembled together, was an hundred and seuenteene saile, amongst which were 12 great galeasses; but all too weake to giue battell to the Turks, as being themselues stronger in shipping than in men. Neuertheless, the Admirall sorie and wearie to see the spoile of the Venetian territorie, & moued with the distresse of the besieged in Nicosia, rather than for any hope he had with that strength to do any good against the Turkes fleet, departed from Corcyra towards Crete, and the twelfth of August landed at Suda, a port of that Island. In the latter end of this month, Columnius the Popes Admirall, and Auria Admirall for the king of Spaine, arriued there also, whom the Venetian Admirall welcomed with great ioy and triumph. The whole fleet of the confederat Princes now at length C met together, consisted of an hundred ninetie two gallies, and twelue galeasses, beside victuallers and other small vessels, laded with munition and other necessarie prouision for the fleete. Of these gallies the Pope had set forth twelue, the king of Spaine fortie two, the rest with the galeasses were the Venetians. In this fleet were imbarked thirteen thousand six hundred threescore souldiers: of whom the Pope sent eleuen hundred, the king of Spaine three thousand nine hundred, and the Venetians eight thousand six hundred and sixty. These three great commanders entring into counsell, what course to take in their proceedings in this war, after long discourse too and fro, at length by the persuasion of Zanius the Venetian Admiral, resolued to go directly for Cyprus, and to giue the Turks battell, in hope thereby to raise them from the D siege of Nicosia. About the middest of September, this great fleet furnished with all things needfull for such an expedition, loosed from Crete, and with a faire gale of winde set forward for Cyprus; in all their course keeping such order, as if they should presently haue met with the enemie. In the middest of these troubles died Petrus Loredanus, Duke of Venice, leauing the rest of the care of that warre to Aloysius Mocenicus, who succeeded him in the Dukedome.

Whilst the Christians thus slowly proceed in their so weightie affaires, Mustapha in the meane time laid hard siege to Nicosia: and diuiding his armie into foure parts, assaulted foure of the bulwarkes of the citie, with greater force than at any time before from the beginning of the siege. The assault was both long and terrible: furie, and the very sight of the warlike Generall, E who was there a present witnesse, and beholder of euery mans forwardnesse or cowardise (a matter of great moment) besides their natural fiercenesse, carried the Turks headlong without any perill or danger. And on the other side, the greatnesse of the danger, the feare to lose both life and libertie, with the hope of reliefe, encouraged the defendants to dare any thing: so that the Turks could not approch the wals, or mount the scaling ladders, but they were presently slain, or together with the ladders thrown to the ground. Many of the Turks were there slain, but especially such as were most forward: and of the defendants were also more lost than stood with the safetie of so small a number: and forasmuch as few or none escaped out of that fight vnwounded, the poore defendants were brought vnto a small number. Many skilful men were of opinion, that the citie might haue bin that day taken, if the assault had by the Bassa bin longer maintained, by bringing still on fresh men: but such was his losse, as that he was glad for F that time to giue ouer the assault, and so with dishonour to retire.

The christians sally out of the citie vpon the Turks.

After this assault, it was by some of the captaines thought good, that they should (whilest they were yet of some reasonable strength in the city) sally forth vpon the enemie: so to make shew, that they had yet some good hope in themselues; and withal by so sudden an eruption to performe something vpon the secure enemie. Of which motion, Dandulus the Gouernor in no

caſe diſcouraged, as loath by ſuch a dangerous piece of ſeruice to diminiſh the number of the defen- G dants, and ſo to giue the enemie an eaſier means to take the citie. Yet ſeeing all the captaines generally of another mind, he yeelded vnto their deſire. So in the hoteſt time of the day, when as the Turks leaſt thought that the Chriſtians would haue ſallied out, certaine Italian companies vnder the conduct of Cæſar Plouianus of Vincentia, and Albertus Scotus, iſſued out by the gate that leadeth to Famaguſta, and vpon the ſudden brake into the enemies trenches: where they found the Turks ſome playing, ſom ſleeping, but fearing nothing leſſe than that the Chriſtians, whom they daily braued, durſt to haue aduentured to come forth. At the firſt entrance the Italians preuailed, brought a great feare vpon that quarter of the Turks army, and ſlew many. But when the Turks awaked with the alarme, came running in on euery ſide, the Italians oppreſſed with the multitude, were glad to retire: in which retreat diuers of them were ſlain, H and amongſt them their two leaders Cæſar and Albertus: ſo that this ſally ſerued to no other purpoſe than to weaken the defendants themſelues, & to cauſe the Turks to keep better watch and ward againſt ſuch ſudden eruptions.

Scouts ſent out of the citie, taken by the Turks and executed.

All hope of long defending the citie now almoſt loſt, and that the defendants could hardly ſtand vpon the wals, or ſhew their heads without preſent danger, they for want of better counſell, rather than for any hope of good ſucceſſe, ſent out certain ſcouts, men skilful of the waies and paſſages of the country (whom they had for great reward induced to vndertake the matter) to craue aid of the country people, that were in great multitude fled into the ſafety of the mountains: and to tell them, that if they came not in time to their reliefe, their wiues & children, whom they had before ſent into the citie, muſt needs in ſhort time fall into the enemies I hand, or periſh with hunger: but theſe meſſengers were by the vigilant enemy intercepted, & in the ſight of the beſieged tortured to death.

Letters ſhot into the citie.

About the ſame time diuers letters were ſhot with arrows into the city, to perſuade the beſieged Chriſtians to yeeld themſelues, for that in ſo doing they ſhould find the Baſſa a mild and mercifull conqueror: wheras otherwiſe if they ſhould by wilfull holding out delay his victory, they were ſure to indure whatſoeuer could be indured or ſuffered. But when Muſtapha had thus in vaine with hope and feare tried the minds of the defendants, he called forth to parley

Muſtapha Baſſa in vain perſuadeth them of Nicoſia to yeeld certaine ſouldiers that were ſtanding vpon the bulwarke called Conſtantius, of whom ſome were by the conſent of the Gouernor ſent forth vnto him: vnto whom Muſtapha by his inter- K pretor complained, That no anſwer was giuen vnto his letters; he ſet forth vnto them the glory, power, and greatneſſe of the Turkiſh empire; and debaſed the ſtrength of the Venetians: then he perſuaded them to yeeld, propounding vnto them the miſeries that would fall vpon them if the city ſhould by force be taken; which he threatned would be far greater than the danger the Turks were to vndertake for the winning thereof; and that therefore it concerned none ſo much as themſelues, whether the city were giuen vp by compoſition, or els woon by ſtrong hand: he ſhewed vnto them the profit that ſhould ariſe vnto them by yeelding of it vp, & offered to them large entertainment, if they would ſerue him: and to conclude, told them, that they ſhould neuer afterwards find at his hands ſo great grace as was at that inſtant offered them. The crafty Baſſa did what he might to haſten the winning of the city, both for that hee doubted the comming of the Chriſtian fleet, & that his great armie was exceedingly troubled L with contagious & grieuous diſeaſes, ariſing of the immoderat heat and drought in that ſo hot a country. But the ſouldiers thinking any thing more aſſured than the Turkiſh faith; anſwered him, That they did not as yet doubt their own ſtrength, & that they were ready to indure any thing that could happen, rather than to prefer the vncertain friendſhip of an vnknowne prince, before the gracious fauour of ſuch worthie princes as they had ſo good experience of.

This anſwer cut off all the Baſſaes hope for taking of the citie by compoſition: wherewith being both grieued & enraged, he commanded all things to be made ready for the aſſault: and the more to encourage his ſoldiers, promiſed vnto them great rewards & honors that ſhould firſt or ſecond mount the wals. After that, he gaue a general aſſault vnto the city with all his power: wherein both he as a moſt worthie captaine, and his ſouldiers, fought moſt fiercely. You M haue to do (ſaid he) with the ſmall and laſt remainders of our enemies, which are ſcarce able to ſtand or hold their weapons in their hands, rather than enemies indeed: ſhall you not then eaſily ouercome them, being both few & feeble, haue vanquiſhed them when they were many & luſty? The end of al your labors is at hand, your hoped rewards approch; onely play

A play you the men, and faint not in this aſſault; the ſpoile of this rich city ſhal be the worthy reward of your labours; the fruit of all your trauell conſiſteth in this one moment. While he thus incourageth ſome, and reproueth others, they mindfull of his promiſes, and theſe of the diſgrace, altogether with their thick ſhot ſuffer no man to ſtand in ſafety vpon the wals, & out of their forts alſo with their great ordnance greatly annoied the defendants. This done, they Nicoſia moſt terribly aſſaulted by the Turks attempted by the ruines of the wall, and in other places by ſcaling ladders to haue entred the citie. Which terrible aſſault was by the cruel enemy maintained, not for ſome few houres, but for diuers daies together without any intermiſſion, freſh men ſtil comming on in ſtead of them that were wounded or ſlain. Yet did the defendants valiantly indure all that ſtorm, and in ſuch B weake caſe as they were, worthily performed what was poſſible for ſo few to doe: yet ſtill in hope (the poore comfort of men in miſery) that reliefe might come by the approch of the Chriſtian fleet. At length, when the matter was brought to this point, that the Turks were in great hope to haue gained the wals, & Muſtapha himſelfe probably gueſſed, That the Chriſti-ans were now weary of the long aſſault, and ſore weakned with wounds & other infinit mife-ries, not to ſeeke in a city ſo hardly diſtreſſed, and was in that his opinion alſo confirmed by certain fugitiue Chriſtians: he neuertheleſſe vpon the ſudden cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, & ſo retiring into his trenches, lay ſtil all the next day without any thing doing. The defendants thinking that he had giuen ouer the aſſault, becauſe of ſome aid that was comming to their re-liefe, became more careleſſe of the enemy, & vpon the vain hope of ſuch aid, with leſſe dili-C gence repaired their breaches and prouided for the repulſing of their enemies. But the Baſſa in the mean time had choſen out of his whole army about 200 of his beſt captains & ſoldiers, all men of approued valour and agility of body, whom the next day after, he ſent early in the morning, to make proofe if they could with ſcaling ladders ſecretly and without any noiſe get vp, get into the foure bulwarkes which hee had before ſore ſhaken with his great ordnance.
Theſe reſolute men leading the way, got firſt vp, after whom followed diuers others, and ſo The Turks gain the bulwarkes and walls of Nicoſia.
tooke the aforeſaid bulwarks: when preſently after, other companies of their fellowes which ſtood ready for the purpoſe, comming on forward, did with their ſcaling ladders in diuers places recouer the top of the wals: for now the matter was not done by ſecret ſurpriſe, but by open force. In euery one of theſe bulwarkes were 70 Italians and as many Epirots, who there D kept watch and ward; theſe men part aſleep, as fearing no ſuch danger, and part lying laſily vp-on the ground, were there ſurpriſed on the ſudden and ſlain: otherſome of them awaked with the ſtrange and vncouth noiſe, betooke not themſelues luſtily to their weapons, but forſaking their ſtations leapt down out of the bulwarks at ſuch places as were next vnto them, ſome for feare ran vnawares into the middeſt of their enemies. Vpon this alarme ſome of the Chriſtian captains came ſpeedily to the walls with their companies, as did Eugenius, who whileſt hee in vain crieth out to ſuch fearefull ſouldiers as he met, that they ſhould not ſo cowardly flie, and ſtaieth others that were flying, was himſelfe ſhot thorow with a ſmall ſhot and ſlaine. Other captains in other places likewiſe labored in vain to haue ſtaid the flying ſouldiers, whoſe perſuaſions, requeſts, and authoritie in ſo generall a feare, nothing at that time preuailed.

Nicoſia taken by the Turks.

E The defendants thus beaten from the wals & bulwarks, gathered themſelues into the market place: but the citiſens ſtealing home to their owne houſes, there ſtood in the entrances of the ſame, fearefully expecting the deſtruction of the country, together were their owne. In the meane time the Gouernor of Aleppo with his regiment ſcoured the wals of the city round about, as he had in charge from the Generall: and without reſpect put to ſword all that he met, armed or vnarmed. At the bulwarke called Barbatus, it fortuned him to light vpon a compa-nie of Italians, who for a while fought deſperatly, but were in the end ouerthrowne and ſlain.
When he had thus cleared the wals, & left ſuch companies as he thought good in places conuenient for the keeping of them, he came downe into the more open places of the city: & ſee-ing them that were gathered together into the market place to haue caſt themſelues into a ring F and to fight as men altogether deſperat, he cauſed certain murthering pieces to be bent vpon them: which they perceiuing, layed downe their weapons, and yeelded themſelues vnto the mercy of the enemy. By and by all the gates of the city were ſtrongly guarded by the enemy, to the intent that no man ſhould go in or out. Dandulus the Gouernor, & Contarenus the Biſhop of Paphos, with the reſt of the nobilitie, & better ſort of the citiſens, had got themſelues into the towne hall, and there ſtood vpon their guard: vnto whom Muſtapha ſent word, that hee would take them all to mercie, if they would without further resistance yeeld themselues. But G messengers run too and fro, the Turkes violently brake in vpon them, and there slew euery man. After the death of these noblemen, the cruell enemy spared none: and ha-main such as they found abroad in the streets, brake into the houses, where they made ha-of all things: yong babes were violently taken out of the armes of their mothers, vir-gins were shamefully rauished, and honest matrons before their husbands faces despightfully A great slaugh-ter. abused, churches were spoiled, and all places filled with mourning and dead bodies: the streets were in all places filled with bloud, for in the city was slain that day fourteen thousand eight hundred threescore persons. Neither was there any end of the spoile, vntill the greedie enemy had carried away the wealth that long peace had heaped vp. It is reported, that the prey there taken, amounted to twentie hundred thousand millions of duckats: 200 of the most H goodly and beautifull youths were chosen out of purpose to be sent to Constantinople for a present for Selymus. In the city were taken also 250 pieces of great ordnance: wher me were by the enemie carried away, and the rest left for defence of the citie. Thus th us citie of Nicosia, sometime the regall seat of the kings of Cyprus, fell into the hands of the Turks, the ninth day of September in the yeare 1570, in whose power it still remaineth.

Mustapha hauing as he thought best disposed of all things in Nicosia, with the very terrour of his name, rather than by any force, brought most part of the rest of the townes in the Island vnder his obeisance; and by faire intreaty and promise of good vsage, brought backe again vn-Cyrene yeelded vnto the Turks. to their wonted dwellings the rude country people, who vp the comming of the Turks were fled with all that they had into the mountaines: them as men not to be feared, he commanded I to till and sow their land as they were woont. The city of Cyrene is strongly scituated, not far from the sea, and was then well furnished of all things needfull for the induring of a long siege. Hither the Bassa sent one of the Sanzackes to summon the citie, more to proue the courage of the defendants, than for any hope he had to haue the citie deliuered vnto him. But Alphonsus Palacius then Gouernor of the city, terrified with the losse of Nicosia, no sooner saw the enemie, but that without any further deliberation or force vsed against him, he deliuered vp the towne vnto the Sanzacke; couenanting only in reward of his cowardise, That he might in safetie depart from thence with all his garrison souldiers: which was easily granted, and the citie surrendred.

Famagusta be-sieged. Not long after, Mustapha leauing a thousand horsemen, and three thousand foot in garrison K in Nicosia, marched with the rest of his armie to besiege Famagusta. And the more to terrifie them of the citie, he by a poore countrey fellow, whom he had for that purpose set at libertie, sent vnto them in a basket the head of Nicholaus Dandulus, late Gouernour of Nicosia, and at the same time sent before him diuers horsemen, who vpon their horsemens staues carried the heads of many of the noblemen slaine at Nicosia, wherewith they rid as in triumph about the wals of the citie. Which thing he did, in hope that they of Famagusta terrified with such a spectacle, and the late ouerthrow of Nicosia, would for feare of like misery yeeld themselues. But Mustapha raiseth his siege. deceiued in this his expectation, he encamped his armie about three miles from the citie. Afterwards hauing taken view of the citie, and well considered of the scituation thereof, he with wonderful celeritie cast vp diuers mounts against the same, and at the same time caused batte- L rie to be laid against the great tower which defended the hauen: he himselfe also in the meane while battering the gate that leadeth to Amathus. But perceiuing by the desperat sallies of the defendants, their great courage, and that it was like to haue much more to do in this siege than he had in the winning of Nicosia, and Winter also now drawing fast on (being about the latter end of September) he thought it best betime to prouide, that by lying there he hazarded not the honour he had with so much labor and danger before gained: and the rather, for that it was commonly reported, that the Christian fleet was at hand: wherefore he rise with his armie, and retired himselfe further off into the countrey, where he shortly after bilited his souldiers in the villages round about for that Winter.

The Turkes at sea aduertised of the comming of the Christian fleet, prepare themselues for battell. The Bassaes at sea, Haly & Pial, lying before Famagusta, doubting the comming of the Chri- M stian fleet, which then lay at Creete, sent out six galliots to discouer the doings of the Christians: who returning with certaine prisoners taken in the iland of Creete, declared vnto the Bassaes what they had learned concerning the Christian fleet, and that it was already vpon the way to Cyprus. Vpon which intelligence the Bassaes put their fleet in order of battell, and set

A forwards towards Limisso to haue met with the Christians: who with a prosperous winde were comming betwixt the Islands of Caprathos and the Rhodes: but there vnderstanding by their espials, that Nicosia was lost, and that the Turks were come to besiege Famagusta; they called a Councell of all the chiefe commanders in the fleet, to consult what were best to do in so dangerous a case. Columnius the Popes Admirall, and then chiefe commander in the fleet, with Zanius the Venetian Admirall, were of opinion, That it were best to hold on their course for Cyprus, and to relieue Famagusta: for that it was like that the Turks proud of their late victorie, were for desire of prey, for most part gon ashore into the Island, and so left their fleet but slenderly manned. Beside that, they alledged, That the Venetian Senat had expresly B decreed, That they should giue the Turks battell. But Auria the Spanish Admirall thinking it, as indeed it was, to be a matter of great difficultie and danger, was quite of another mind, saying, That he could not but maruell, how the Venetian Senators sitting at their ease in counsell, could before they knew their own strength, and power of the enemie, the nature of the countrie, and purpose of their foes, determin what were fit for martial men to do; vnto whose actions no certaine rule could be prescribed. All the shores (he said) were kept with the enemies garrisons; so that what need soeuer they should haue, they could neither come by water or wood, or put into any harbor. Besides that, the enemie would giue them battell at his owne pleasure, & not at theirs: for that they were not of so much power, as to inforce him to fight: And that if the Senate, which vsed to do all things warily, and with great aduisement, did but C see the weakenesse of their gallies, wanting both soldiers and mariners, they would be of another mind. He alledged further, That they were to wage war in the enemies countrey, where there was no port to receiue their fleet, no peaceable place, no confederate Citie, nor King to friend: whereas the time of the yeare grew euery day worse and worse, when as they had neither harbor to put into, neither were able to abide the sea. And now that Nicosia was lost, for the reliefe whereof they were come so far, there was no reason longer for them to stay, the enemie so strongly possessing the Island with his great armie, as that there was not any hope to do any good against him. And that to keepe him from victuall, and so to distresse him, was not possible, lying in a most fertile Island, and in the midst of his owne dominions: whereas they, who were to be still relieued from far, should sooner feele the want than the enemie. He was D victualled (as he said) when he came from home, but for three moneths, in hope to haue made a short dispatch, and had now two thousand miles home. He said moreouer, that he had expresse commandement from the King, to returne to Messana before Winter, and that therefore so soone as the moneth was out he would depart. The Venetian Admirall desiring nothing more, than by battell at sea to ouerthrow the Turkes, and so to relieue the distressed Cypriots, vrged the Spanish Admirall to proceed in the voyage; saying, That so great aid was not sent from the Pope and the King, onely for the reliefe of Nicosia, but to deliuer the whole Island from the danger of the Turke. Of the same opinion with the Spanish Admirall were diuers other great captaines in the fleet; namely Sfortia: who said, That nothing was to be so done, as might rashly expose vnto casualtie or power of the enemie, the publique fortune and majestie E of the Christian commonweale, which was in that fleet greatly hazarded: That longer stay might bring further danger: that in that fleet consisted the whole welfare of the commonweale, wherin more might be lost, if any mishap should chance thereunto, than was good to be gained by the relieuing of Famagusta. The great commanders thus differing in opinions, the Councel was in a heat dissolued, and nothing concluded. Vpon which so foule a disagreement the fleet began now to returne backe againe, but so, that it was not now as before, one, but three Fleets, euery admiral by himself drawing after him his fleet. Auria the Spanish Admiral, who first returned, after he had been two days wonderfully with tempest tossed at sea, came at last to Carpathos, and departing thence, with much ado ariued with his fleet in the Island of Crete: from whence he by a messenger sent of purpose, requested leaue of Columnius the Popes Admirall, F that he might with his good will presently returne home. Whereunto Columnius answered, That he would giue him no such leaue: but rather charged him, in the dutie he owght to the good of the Christian commonweale, not to depart, but to keepe companie with the rest of the fleet vntill it were past Zacynthus, that so with their vnited forces they might more safely passe by the enemies countries: whereas otherwise, if any thing should by his hastie departure fall out otherwise than well, it should be imputed to the dishonour of him that had for-his friends, and not of them that were so by him forsaken. But vnto this Auria answe- G red, that the welfare of the kingdoms of Sicilie and Naples consisted in the safety of this fleet: and that therefore hauing hast home, he could not stay to keepe companie with their heauie galleyes and other ships of burthen, which must oftentimes be towed forward. This he openly pretended for his departure; yet secretly sought (as it was deemed) to finde an occasion whereby to withdraw himselfe (being as he accounted the better man at sea) from the command of Columnius, whereunto he was full sore against his will subiect.

After they had thus a while spent the time with reasoning the matter to & fro, Auria of himselfe without turning hoised saile, & so at length came to Messana in Sicily: neither did Columnius & Zanius in those quarters long after him, but hauing endured much trouble at sea, arriued at last, Columnius in Italie, and Zanius at Corcyra. Thus this mightie fleet, which H had all this Sommer filled the Mediterranian with all the countries thereabout, with the expectation of some great matter, was by the discord of the Generals dissolued, hauing done nothing at all worth the remembrance. In this idle expedition many thousands of riguant men lost their liues, being dead of diuers diseases proceeding of change of diet, and vnseasonablenesse of the weather in that hot climat; amongst whom was the valiant Countie Hieroni-mus Martinengus, sent by the Senat with three thousand souldiers for the defence of Famagusta; who also most of them perished in that voyage. The Venetian fleet was no sooner arriued at Corcyra, but Augustinus Barbadicus was sent from the Senat to discharge Zanius the Admi-rall of his office, and to send him prisoner to Venice: in whose roome was placed Sebastianus Venerius Gouernor of that Iland.

Zanius the Venetian Admiral discharged of his office, and sent in bonds to Venice.

The Turks Bassa's at sea certainly aduertised of the departure of the Christian fleet, were I not a little proud thereof; as by the confession of their enemies, their betters. Yet forasmuch as the seas began then to grow rough, and no enemie appeared, they thought it to no purpose to keepe the seas with so great a fleet, and therefore resolued to leaue Mustapha with his army in Cyprus, the next yeare to make an end of his conquest so happily begun; and seuen gallies at sea before Famagusta, that no reliefe should that way be brought into the citie, and so to depart themselues with the rest of the fleet to Winter in more safer harbours: Piali with the greater part of the fleet to Constantinople, and Haly with the rest to the Rhodes. And because they would for their greater credit prepare some worthie present for their great Lord & Master Selymus, they fraughted a great gallion of Muhametes the chiefe Bassa's, and two other tall K ships, with the richest of the spoile of Nicosia, and the choice of the prisoners there taken. But when they were now readie to hoise saile and depart, as they were carrying out of the gallion, certaine barrels of gunpouder which Mustapha the Generall had commanded for his better prouision to be landed, a noble gentlewoman captiue in the gallion, wishing rather to die with honor, than to liue dishonored, secretly fired the pouder; by force whereof the said gal-lion with the other two ships, were suddenly rent in pieces, and all that was therein blown vp into the aire. Of all that were in those three vessels, none escaped with life but the master of the gallion, and two Christian captiues, but there perished together with the rich spoile. But the Bassa's following their former resolution, departed from Cyprus, and afterwards in safetie arriued at Constantinople: where both then and all the Winter following, such preparation L was in making, as if Selymus had the next yeare purposed some far greater matter than the conquest of Cyprus.

A desperate fact of a woman.

Whilest Sebastianus Venerius (now the Venetian Admirall) yet lay at Corcyra, the rude A-croceraunian people, more famous for nothing than for their theft and want of all things; by trustie messengers promised to deliuer into his power the strong castle of Chymera, kept by a garrison of 300 Turks, if he himselfe with a few gallies and a conuenient number of footmen, would come into the bay of Ambracia: offering him good hostages for the better assurance of their promise. Of which their offer he gladly accepted, and forthwith went to the appointed place with a companie of horsemen, three thousand footmen, and certaine gallies; who were no sooner landed, but that presently a thousand of those rough mountaine people came vnto M them: with which power taking the hill, and repulsing the Turkes garrison comming to the reliefe of the castle, he so discouraged them that were [illegible] Hold, that the next night they let themselues downe with ropes into the valley below, but being descried, were there all either taken or slaine. And so in a verie short time was that strong castle taken by the Admirall, and

A and a strong garrison of Christians put into it in steed of the Turks.

Not long after, Quirinus the Viceadmiral a man of great courage, landed with 24 gallies in Peloponesus neere the bay of Maine, and there vpon the sudden both by sea and land besieged a strong castle, which the Turks but two yeres before had built to trouble the Christians passing that way. Which castle he tooke in fiue houres, and put to the sword fiue hundred Turks which lay there in garrison; and razing it downe to the ground, carried away with him foure and twentie great pieces of Artillerie into the Island of Zacynthus.

At such time as Mustapha before lay at the siege of Famagusta, Bragadinus gouernour of the towne, and Balconius a most expert captaine, from out of the high places of the citie beholding B the great armie of the Turks (which couered the ground almost as far as they could see, with the cunning manner of their fortification, were therwith much moued: and therefore thought it good betime to giue the Senat knowledge thereof, and in so great a danger to craue their aid. And that their request might be of more weight, and haue the better hearing, they intreated Hieronimus Ragazonius Bishop of the citie, a reuerend and deuout man, to take vpon him that charge; vnto whom they ioyned Nicholas Donatus a noble gentleman of Cyprus. The Bishop at the first was very vnwilling to go, as loth in so great danger to leaue his flocke: but at length ouercome with the intreatie of the gouernour, and teares of the besieged, suffered himselfe to be intreated: and embarked in a gally about the going downe of the Sun, loosing out of the hauen, and hoising saile, with a faire gale of wind passed through the Turks fleet, which C then lay at anchor before the city; and by the comming on of the night, and by the great way he made, got him quickly out of sight. After foure dayes sailing he came to Crete, & so at last to Venice: where, as he had before vnto the Admirall, so there vnto the Senat he declared the dangerous estate of the citie, the strength of the enemie, the weakenes of the defendants against so great a multitude, and the want of many things needfull for the holding out of the siege: and to be briefe, that except they sent speedie reliefe, the citie could not be kept. Zanius at that time Admirall, carefull for the besieged, caused foure tall ships to be laded with all manner of victual and a great quantity of gunpouder, and put into them 1700 select soldiers, all which he sent from Crete to the reliefe of them of Famagusta; appointing M. Antonius Quirinus with twelue of the best gallies in all the fleet, to conduct the same thither. This Quirinus was a D most valiant and expert captaine, meanely discended, but by seruice growne to be a man both of great reputation and wealth: and therefore Zanius at his departure to Venice, although hee knew the matter required haste, yet presuming vpon his wisedome and carefulnesse, left it to his discretion, when and how to performe that piece of seruice. Quirinus (not without cause) doubting to set forward, the seas as then full of the Turks gallies, staied vntill Winter was wel spent, and then setting forward the seuenteenth of Ianuarie, kept aloofe from the ships, which with a prosperous wind came directly before Famagusta; in hope that the Turks gallies which lay in the mouth of the hauen, might so be drawne farther into the sea, in hope of some good bootie, he himselfe staying with his gallies in place conuenient out of sight. Neither had the euent deceiued his expectation, had not his fierce nature hindered the same: for the Turks vp-E on the dawning of the day descrying the ships, made hastily toward them: but Quirinus not able longer to stay himselfe, and before desirous to fight with them, shewed himselfe too soon in the open sea, before the enemie was come neere the ships: whom as soone as the Turkes had seene, and that there was no hope to withstand him, they staied their oares, and with all speed retired. But Quirinus following faster vpon them, they were glad for safegard of their liues, with all the power they could to run three of their gallies aground, and to run to shoare themselues: which three gallies, Quirinus did with his great ordnance beat all to pieces, and sore gauled the other foure. The hauen thus cleered, he returned againe vnto the shippes, and brought them with the supplie in safetie to Famagusta: vpon whose arriuall was great reioycing both amongst the garrison soldiers and the citizens: for the Turks thought nothing lesse, F than that the Christian gallies durst at that time of the yere haue put into those dangerous seas: which Quirinus well knowing, came forth againe with his gallies, and roaming vp and downe at his pleasure, tooke two of the enemies ships richly laded comming to the camp; with which booty he inriched his soldiers: & further incited by occasion, landed his men in diuers places alongst the sea coast in Pamphilia, and there did great harme. So hauing filled the Countrey with the terrour and fame of his name, he returned againe to Famagusta; where he notably encouencouraged the garrison soldiers, persuading them to remember their wonted valor: and fil- G led them with hope that the Christian fleet would be with them in the beginning of the next Summer, to deliuer them from their enemies, and to raise the siege. So hauing in twenty days dispatched that he came for, and done what good seruice els he could, he departed from Famagusta: and within fiue daies after arriued at Crete.

Negligence severely punished by Selymus.

Not long, but Selymus had knowledge of this late supplie put into Famagusta, and of the hauen done by Quirinus; wherewith he was so highly displeased, that he commanded the gouernour his head to be strucke off, and the gouernour of the Rhodes to be disgraced, whose charge was to haue kept those seas, so that nothing should haue been conueied into Famagusta. Neither spared he Piali Bassa, but depriued him of his Admiraltie, and placed Partau Bassa Admirall in his steed, for that he had not the yeare before discomfited the H Christian fleet at the Island of Crete, as it was supposed he might haue done.

From the beginning of this war, the Venetians, with Pius Quintus then Pope, who greatly fauored their cause, had most earnestly from time to time solicited Philip king of Spaine to enter with them into the participation and fellowship of this war; which their request standing indeed with the good of his State, he seemed easily to yeeld vnto: and therefore sent Auria, his Admirall the last yeare, with his fleet to aid them, but with such successe as is before declared. As for to ioine with them in perpetuall league and confederation (as it was termed) against the common enemy, that he referred vnto the discreet consideration of the two Cardinals, Granuellan and Pace, and Io. Zunica his Embassador, sent for that purpose to Rome: promising to performe whatsoeuer they should on his behalfe agree vpon or consent vnto. At the same time, I and for the same purpose lay also Surianus the Venetian Embassadour at Rome: vnto whome the Pope ioined Cardinal Morone, Aldobrandinus, and Rusticucius, with certain other of the chief Cardinals, as men indifferent to both parties, to moderat and compose such differences & difficulties as should arise betwixt the aforesaid Commissioners for the King and the Venetians, concerning the intended league. But these gentlemen, sent from so great Princes about so great a matter (as well there could not be a greater) were no sooner met together and set in consultation, but that forthwith they began to jar about the capitulations of the league. Necessarie it was thought that a league should be agreed vpon against so puissant and dangerous an enemie, but to find the way how the same might be concluded to the contentment of all parts, seemed a matter almost impossible. Oftentimes these commissioners sat, but the oftner the farther off: K if one difficultie were by the discretion of some appeased, in stead therof at the next meeting arise three others. The chiefe command of the army to be raised, the proportion of the forces, the manner of the war, with many other like circumstances incident to so great actions, made great differences among them: but most of all, the indifferent proportioning of the charge, the Spanish commissioners seeking to turne the greatest part thereof vpon the Venetians, & the Venetians vpon them: which was done with such earnestnesse & study of euery man towards his own part, as if they had all there met for the bettering of the particular state from which they were sent, rather than for the common good: For the Spaniard, who in former time was glad to keepe the frontiers of his large dominions in Italie, Sicilie, Sardinia, Corsica, Majorca, Minorca, yea and of Spaine it selfe, with strong garrisons for feare of the Turke; now that the war L was risen betwixt the Venetians & him, & the danger therof translated far off into other mens territories; enioied now in his own an vnwonted quietnes, to the great content of his subiects, and easing of his owne charge in maintaining of so many garrisons as before: whereof many were now thought needlesse. Besides that, he by the Indulgence of the Pope raised such great summes of money vpon his Clergie, as was thought by many, sufficient to discharge the charge of the war: For which causes he cared not for entring in any further league with the Venetians, but as it were in courtesie to send them a yearely aid, to maintaine a defensiue lingering warre, and so to keepe the Turkes busied vpon the Venetian, a farre off from his owne Territories. But the Venetians, in whose Dominions the fierce Enemie dayly raged, as well in Dalmatia as in Cyprus, were euen for the same reasons mooued to hasten and shorten the war, M that the Spaniard was to protract it: for beside the neerenesse of the danger, and the infinite calamities by them sustained, their yerely reuenues arising for most part of their customes, were greatly impaired, and their traffike (the maintenance of their state) almost quite cut off: which caused them more earnestly to confederate themselues with the Spaniard. But hard it was

A to ioine in one, States so far differing in respect of their particular profit, and almost by nature contrarie. Thus was all the last yeare, and a great part of this also, spent by the aforesaid Commissioners in turbulent and fruitlesse conferences, but nothing was as yet concluded concerning the league: which troubled the Venetians not a little, being of themselues too weake for so mightie an enemie as was Selymus, and yet no other certaine strength from their friends to rest vpon. But whilest they stood thus doubtfull of the league with Spaine, and quite out of hope of any attonement with Selymus; vpon the sudden when they least expected it was by good fortune laied as it were in their laps, to make choice whether they would (as they had before most earnestly desired) ioine in league with the Pope and the King of Spaine, or els fall to agreement with Selymus: and that by this meanes.

B Muhamet the chiefe Bassa, a secret friend vnto the Venetians, of whom he had been of long time honored, had no great liking of the prosperous successe of Mustapha in Cyprus, & therefore deuised night and day, how to crosse the rising of him, the competitor of his honor; and withall to helpe the Venetians, vnto whom he was much beholden. He by secret messengers had before oftentimes sounded the mind of the Venetian Embassadour, and put him in hope, that if suit were made vnto Selymus for peace, it would vndoubtedly be granted; and further promised, to be himselfe a helper and intercessor for the same. But finding the Embassadour to cast many perils, and to giue small credit vnto their talke, who had before by trusting them deceiued him: he did not so giue ouer the matter, but referring the further tempering with him vnto a more fitter time, for the present he tooke opportunitie to enter into discourse with Se- C lymus himselfe concerning the Venetians; and told him that it was reported, That they weary of the long altercation they had had with the Spaniards concerning the league, & now destitute of all hope & aid, would now haply of their owne accord grant him that which they had before to him denied. And perceiuing him not vnwillingly to heare so of them, he proceeded further in the matter, to know his pleasure what he would haue done therein; cunningly by the way of good counsel persuading him vnto that which he most wished himself to be done. Immediatly after, he secretly aduertised M. Antonius the Venetian Embassador, That there was great hope of peace, & that therefore the Senat should vnder the colour of exchanging of prisoners, and redeeming of merchants goods, send some fit man to Constantinople, with whome he would in secret confer of al such matters as might farther the pacification. This vnexpected D newes from the Embassador brought to Venice, was wel heard of the Senat: for they thought it much to concerne their State, to haue a way opened whereby vpon tolerable conditions to make peace with the mightie tyrant, if that the league betwixt them and the king of Spaine could not be concluded. Hereupon they made choice of one Iacobus Ragazonius to goe about the matter to Constantinople. This Ragazonius was a man of great spirit and dexterity of wit to take any matter in hand, and of a great reach and deepe iudgement in the managing therof; and withall exceeding rich, and of so good carriage of himselfe, as that he was therefore famous: all which things were thought of great moment to win the fauor of that couetous and barbarous nation. The Senat, although they had not yet made proof what men thought of the matter, yet doubted they not, but that vpon the report of the sending of this notable man, men E would thereof diuersly diuine, euery man according to his owne fantasie; and that many of the wiser sort would indeed surmise, as the truth was, that he was sent for to intreat of peace, although the exchange of prisoners, and redemption of merchants goods, were the only things were openly pretended: & the Senat, although they thought it not amisse to haue it so vnderstood, because such a suspition was like enough to stirre vp both the Pope and the Spaniard to accept of such conditions of the desired league, as they had before reiected; yet left the hope of the league (which they for many causes thought good to cherish) therby cut off, might cause the Pope and the Spaniard both to be cold in the matter, they certified both them and other Christian Princes, of the sending of Ragazonius; yet of purpose concealing the secret drift of his going. Ragazonius thorowly instructed by the Senate, was in a gallie conducted to Ragusi-F um: which Cassan-beg (the great Bassa Muhametes son, gouernor of Liburnia) vnderstanding, met him vpon the frontiers, & told him, That he was sent by his father, both to meet him and safe conduct him: which the martial man, contrary to the manner of the Turks, courteously performed, honorably entertaining him, and afterward sending him with a safe conuoy vntill he was out of all danger. Ragazonius comming to Constantinople, was there by night secretly receiued to the city, and at first is brought into a little base lodge, and a guard set ouer him that he G speake with no man. But after three dayes he was removed to a much better place, and ted with diuers kinds of dainty dishes of sundrie kinds of meats. The effect of his mesas, to try the Turks minds, and after conference had with the Embassador, to entreat of at length hauing accesse to the great Bassa Muhamet, after he had deliuered vnto him (as h charge) his message concerning the exchange of prisoners and merchants goods; Muhama n, If he had nothing in charge from the Senat concerning a pacification to be made? answered, that he had, but that he must first speake with the Embassi-dor, without whom e and counsel he was not of himselfe to do any thing. At that first in-counter, the Bassa to terrifie the messenger, declared vnto him the innumerable multitude of the Turks horsemen and footmen, which no nation (as he vainly boasted) was able by force or H policy to withstand: also his great and inuincible fleets at sea, with whom all the power of the Christians ioined together, was not able to encounter; and much other such like strength and wealth of his: and that the Venetians were now no more able to withstand Selymus, y were in times past to resist his father and his ancestors. Yet he discoursed of this matter in such sort, as not thereby to cut off the hope of the pacification: but said, That the Venetians should best haue prouided for the safetie of their state, if at the first they had listned vnto him, friendly & faithfully aduising them not to haue entred into armes, in which doing they shewed more courage than power: and that yet, as the case now stood, and that Selymus was in a most assured hope, in short time to become lord and master of the whole Island, it should be to their great I good, to prefer the fauor and good will of the Turks before war, & by the voluntary yeelding vp of Cyprus, gaine vnto themselues perpetuall peace and tranquilitie. As for the Isle it selfe, it was not now worth the hazarding of so many dangers, being destitute of inhabitants, which were almost all either slaine or fled, the cattel driuen away, the townes ransackt and burnt, and the whole countrey, of late most pleasant and beautifull, now so spoiled & vnpeopled, that it could not of long time yeeld vnto him that should haue it, any profit or commodity. Ragazo- nius being a coole and aduised man, and without perceiuing that the Bassa was not to be contra-ried in his talke, so tempered his answer, as that he shewed no token of feare, neither let any word fall that might offend his eares, saying, That he was right glad that he had found so much fauor in his sight, as to haue accesse and leaue to talke with so great a prince, who for wisdome K and grauitie excelled all the rest of the princes of the great Emperours court: who so far as he might with his loyalty towards his soueraigne, had alwaies most graciously fauored the Venetian state: who also not ignorant of the vncertaintie of worldly things, knew of all others best, that on both sides were both men & armes, and that most mighty princes had oftentimes with small forces bin ouerthrowne, the euent of things neuer deceiuing men more than in matters of warre: no power vpon earth being sure, which could not within some bounds containe the strength of it selfe: and that therefore he was in good hope, that he so worthy a man knowing best what belonged both to peace and war, would deuise some such course as might sort to the good and quiet both of the Venetian State and Turkish empire; in which doing hee should find sufficient matter for his eternall praise and glory, if by his discreet wisdome a pacification L might be made. Such talke hauing passed at their first meeting, Ragazonius had leaue to speake with the Embassador, who then lay at Pera vnder safe keeping. In passing ouer to Pera, Raga- zonius might see a fleet of Turkish gallies encountring one with another in manner of a fight at sea, which the Turks had of purpose prouided to shew vnto him as a strange sight. Wherat Ra- gazonius smiling, said vnto the Turks that were present with him, That it was a pretty childish sport for him that had neuer seen the like before: but not to the Venetians, who were acquainted with these matters in earnest; as the Turks should wel know whensoeuer they had a mind to make proofe what they were able to do at sea. Ragazonius comming to the Embassador, had conference with him at large, & resolued with him what to do in his negotiation. And so returning to Mahamet, easily dispatcht with him for the exchange of prisoners & merchants goods: but when they came to talke of the capitulations of a pacification to be made, at the first they M were so far off, as if they would neuer haue met: but after much and often conference, somtime the one yeelding, and somtime the other, the matter w ought to some conformity, so that there was no such great difference betwixt them, b at they were like enough to haue agreed. Pius the Pope d Philip the king of Spaine, adu tised of the sending of Ragazonius

A to Constantinople, began to imagine as the truth was, that he was sent about some treatie of peace, what colour soeuer the Senat pretended to couer the same. And therefore doubting lest the Turkish Emperor hauing once made peace with the Venetians, should turne his great forces already prepared, vpon the one or both of them, they thought it good for troubling of that peace, now with all speed to hasten the league, which they had so long before delayed. For which purpose the Pope sent the noble Columnius to Venice: who admitted into the Senat, declared at large how matters had passed at Rome concerning the league: and afterwards, what profit might arise of such a league concluded, & what harmes might ensue of the same, neglected. And to hasten the matter, set as it were before their eies, how much it concerned the B common good, but them especially, to haue the same with speed confirmed. As for to giue any trust vnto the Turks, was (as he said) not beseeming their deep wisedome & iudgement, seeing they so often had bin by them rather deceiued than vanquished. In conclusion, he requested them, That for his Holinesse sake, moderating in some part their hard demands, they would with speed ioyn with him & the king in a most firm & Christian league. Although this speech of Columnius had much moued the minds of the Venetians, so that many inclined to the league, yet were there many doubtfull thereof, and could not be resolued whether it were better to embrace peace with the Turke, or the league with the Pope and the king. Peace pleased them, neither did the league displease them: it seemed a matter most difficult, whether to resolue vp- on. They were fearefull of the league either receiued, or reiected: the hope of victory, the in- C constancie of the Turks, their owne strength at sea, the large promises of the Christian Prin- ces, the certain hope of the league, & vncertainty of the peace, perswaded them to embrace the league. On the other side, the bad successe of the yeare before, their forces shaken, and almost spent in Cyprus, the suspected & doubtful faith of their confederats, with the vncertaintie of the successe, induced them to prefer the hoped peace before the league. So the Venetians in suspence betwixt both, gaue the embassador daily more doubtful answers than other: neither by promise binding themselues, neither by flat denial cutting off the hope of the league, by ex- amples and arguments rather retelling what was by others alleadged, than any way declaring what they themselues thought. Somtime they alledged such things as might make a man be- leeue, that they were willing to ioyne in league, and by & by again they would seem neither to reiect nor accept of the same. In which doubtfulnesse many daies passed. At length the matter D being propounded in the Senat, there found not vnlike disposition of minds that it had among the meaner sort: for some of the Senators inclined to the league; whose reasons were groun- ded not vpon profit only, but vpon credit and honor also, which they wished to be chiefly re- garded: declaring also, what great security, honor & glory, should redound vnto them, by en- tring into such an honorable league. But the remembrance of former losses, the strength of the Turke possessing a great part of the world, compared vnto their own, the terror of the enemies name, the feare of euill successe, the small hope of preuailing, induced others to like better of peace: whose opinion was also confirmed by this, That the confederation with those Christi- ans, was of no more assurance or continuance than the Turks peace: beside that, they alledged, E That leagues were therfore of lesse assurance, for that confederations & amities were seldome or neuer sincerely & faithfully kept on both sides, euery man commonly seruing his own turn, without care of other men. They also set as it were before their eys what great occasions, euen small suspitions might giue princes to breake their leagues, what strange effects the feare of losse of goods, or some part of their territory might worke. After this so weighty a matter had bin thus with great contention thorowly debated on both sides in the Senat, it was at last put to voices: & so by the consent of the greater part, the league was as more honorable receiued, and the Turks peace reiected; and a decree of the Senat to that effect made. Ragazonius by se- cret letters from the Senat vnderstanding of al these matters, began to deale more warily with Muhamet the great Bassa in matter concerning the pacification, & more hardly to yeeld to his F demands, and propounding many difficulties of purpose deuised, requested of him, That hee might by his good leaue returne to Venice, to be resolued of many things by the Senat, wher- of he was not able himselfe to iudge, and so to return to him again with more certaine instru- ctions: assuring him, that the Senat would vpon knowledge of the conditions of the peace doe and deuise many things for the furtherance of the same: which could not so well be done by letters, as if he were there himselfe present to resolue them vpon euery particular. This his re-obtained, he with great speed got him out of Constantinople: but was scarcely got out G the gates, when report of the league which the Venetians had made with the Pope and the K. of Spaine, was brought vnto the court, and had in short time filled the citie: which made a new way as he trauelled more troublesome, and frustrated that also which was before concluded concerning the exchange of prisoners and merchants goods. Ragazonius being come to Venice declared at large in the Senat the drift and purpose of the Turke, and what conference he had had with the great Bassa, and in what forwardnesse the peace was: for which his discreet carriage of the matter his wisedome was highly by the whole Senat commended, and he himselfe afterward honourably rewarded.

A perpetuall league concluded betwixt the Pope, the K. of Spaine, and the Venetians.

In the meane time the Commissioners at Rome after long consultation concluded a league, H which they would haue to be perpetuall, as well for inuasiue as defensiue warres against the Turke: and was by solemne oath confirmed by the Pope, the king of Spaine, and the Venetian Senat the 24 day of May, in the yeare 1571. For the execution of which league, it was agreed vpon, That the sea and land forces should consist of two hundred gallies, an hundred ships, tie thousand footmen, and foure thousand fiue hundred horsemen; with a proportionat quanti-tie of great artillerie, victuals, and other things necessarie, to be euery yeare ready in March, or at fartheast in Aprill, to meet together at such place in the East, as should be vnto them for that purpose appointed; to be imploied as the Admirals saw cause, & as the present state of things should require. For maintenance of which charge it was agreed, That the king of Spain should defray the one halfe, and the other halfe to be diuided into three equal parts; whereof the Venetians should beare two parts, and the Pope the third; which if it should be too heauie for him, then that remained by him vndischarged, to be diuided into fiue parts; whereof the king I was to discharge three, and the Venetians two. The charge thus proportioned, they tooke order also for the prouision of victuals, to be at a reasonable price taken vp in any the confederats dominions, where the army or fleet should chance to stay: yet so, that it should be at the King of Spaine his discretion, out of his kingdomes of Naples and Sicilie, first to take his prouision for the victualling of Guletta, Malta, and his owne armie. It was also agreed, That if the king of Spaine should at any time, when as the confederats had no common war, inuade Algiers, Tripolis, or Tunes, that then the Venetians should of their owne charge, aid him with fiftie gal-lies well appointed: as also, that the king should in like manner and with like forces aid them as oft as they should by the Turks be inuaded. But if it should fortune the Roman territorie to K be inuaded, that then the aforesaid princes should be bound with all their forces, to the vttermost of their power, to defend those places, and the person of the Pope. And that in managing of the confederat war, the three Admirals should conferre together of all matters, and what soeuer the greater part should agree vpon, that to be reputed as agreed vpon by them all: That Don Iohn of Austria, Charles the fifth his naturall sonne, and brother to the king, should haue the chiefe command of the forces both at sea and land: but not to display his owne ensigne, but the common ensigne of the confederats: Also, that such places as should be gained from the Turke by the confederat armie, should be diuided amongst the confederat princes, exceptting Tunes, Algiers, and Tripolis, which should remaine onely to the king of Spaine: That all controuersies arising amongst the Generals should be decided by the Pope, vnto whom the L Venetians should lend twelue gallies, furnished of all things sauing men and victuals, which the Pope should of his owne charge supplie: Which gallies at the end of the warre hee should againe deliuer, in such case as they then were: That an honourable place should bee left for Maximilian the Emperour, the French King, the King of Polonia, and the King of Portingall to enter into this league, whome with the rest of the Christian Princes, it should beseeme the Pope to stir vp in so good a quarrell: and that it should not be lawfull for any the aforesaid confederat Princes to intreat of peace, or enter into league, without the knowledge and consent of the other confederats. And for the better proceeding of al things, it was agreed, That euer in Autumne the confederate Princes should by their Embassadours at Rome consult of the next yeares warres, and according as the time and occurrents should require, to M determine, whether their forces were to bee increased or diminished. This League thus at length with much adoe concluded, was not long after in Iune with great pompe and triumph openly proclaimed in Rome, Venice, and Spaine, to the great ioy of the greatest part of Chri-stendome.

Whilest

A Whilest these things were in doing, the Venetians the more to intangle the Turke, thought The Venetians the more to trouble the Turke, seeke to stir vp Tamas the Persian king to take vp armes against him.
it good to make proofe, if they might by any meanes stir vp Tamas the Persian king to take vp armes against him: who as he was a prince of great power, so did hee exceedingly hate the Turks, as well for the difference betwixt the Persians and them about matters of their vain superstition, as for the manifold iniuries hee had oftentimes sustained. There was one Vincent Alexander, one of the Secretaries for the State; who hauing escaped out of prison at Constantinople, was but a little before come to Venice, a warie wise man, and of great experience, who for his dexteritie of wit, and skilfulnesse in the Turkish language, was thought of all others most fit to take in hand so great a matter. He hauing receiued letters and instructions for the Senat, and furnished with all things necessarie, trauelling through Germanie, Polonia, and the B forrests of Mœsia, in Turkish attire, came to Moncastron, a port towne vpon the side of the Euxine or blacke sea, at the mouth of the great riuer Boristhenes: where he embarked himselfe for Trapezond, but was by a contrarie wind driuen to Sinope, a citie of great traffique; from whence hee trauelled by rough and broken wayes to Cutay, keeping still vpon the left hand, because he would not fall vpon any part of the Turks army (which was then marching towards Cyprus through all those countries) neuertheless he fell vpon a part thereof, from which he with great danger rid himselfe, being taken for a Turke, and by blind & troublesome wayes, through rocks and forests, arriued at length at Erzirum, a strong city of the Turks, then vpon the frontiers of the Turks dominions toward the Georgians. This iourney of Alexan- ders was not kept so secret, but that it was vented at Constantinople by a spie, who vnder the C color of friendship, haunting the Venetian embassadors house at Pera, had got certain knowledge of the going of Alexander into Persia. Whereupon certaine courrors were sent out with all speed to beset the three straight passages into Persia, whereby it was supposed he must of necessitie passe, with certain notes also of the fauor of the man, of his stature, and other markes, whereby he was best to be knowne. But he in so dangerous a country doubting all things, and fearing such a matter, leauing his company behind him, with incredible celeritie posted from Erzirum to Tauris, and was a great way gone before the Turks currors came into those quarters: who yet hearing of him, followed after as far as they durst, but could not ouertake him.
Alexander comming to Tauris, vnderstood that the court lay at Casbin, about twelue dayes iourney farther vp into the countrey; comming thither, the fourteenth of August of this yere D 1571, he chanced to meet with certaine English merchants, with whom he had before beene acquainted: by whose help he not onely got to speake with Ayder Tamas the kings third son, but learned of them also the manners and fashions of the Persian court, and how to beare himselfe therein. The Persians by reason of the intollerable heat do most of their businesse at that time of the yeare by night. Wherefore Alexander about midnight brought in to Aider, declared vnto him the cause of his comming: and the next night admitted vnto the speech of his aged father, deliuered his letters of credence, and in the name of the Senat declared vnto him, with what perfidious dealing Selymus the Turkish Emperour was about to take away Cyprus from the Venetians, with what greedinesse and pride he had set vpon the Christians, and that discharged of that war, he would of all likelyhood set vpon the Persians; hauing the selfesame E quarrell vnto the Persians that he had vnto the Venetians, that is, an ardent and insatiable desire of soueraignetie: a sufficient cause for the greedie Turke to repute euery King the richer that he was, the more his enemie. After that, setting forth to the full the prowesse of the Christians, the wonderfull preparation they had made both at sea and land, he perswaded the King with all his powet to inuade the Turke, now altogether busied in the wars of Cyprus; and to recouer again such parts of his kingdom as Solyman the father of Selymus had taken from him.
Warres he said were more happily managed abroad than at home: that sithence he alone (the Christian princes all then at quiet) had withstood the Turks whole force and power, he needed not now to doubt of his most prosperous successe, the Christian princes now ioining with him. That he was much vnmindful of his former losses & wrongs, if he thought he inioyed an F assured peace; which he should find to be nothing els but a deferring of war vnto more cruell times: and that the Turke if he should ouerrun Cyprus, would forthwith turne his victorious armes vpon him: The end of one warre was (as hee said) but the beginning of another: and that the Turkish Empire could neuer stay in one state: and that hee would obserue not the Turkes wordes, but his deeds; and how that the Othoman Emperours according to the oppor-

...ie of the times, vſed by turnes, ſometime force, ſometime deceit, as beſt ſerued their pur- G ...poſes: That no princes had at all times by diſſembled peace and vncertaine leagues more de-...ceiued ſome, vntill they had oppreſſed others. He wiſhed alſo, that at length this his cunning
...dealing might appeare vnto the world: and that Princes would thinke, that being combined
...together, they might more eaſily ouercome the Turk, than being ſeperated, defend their own:
That in former times ſometime will, ſometime occaſion, was wanting to them to vnite their forces: That therefore they ſhould now combine themſelues for their common good againſt the common enemy: That it concerned no leſſe the Perſians than the Chriſtians, to haue the power of the Turke limited: and that this taking vp of arms, ſhould be for the good of the Per-ſian king howſoeuer things ſhould fall out; if well, he ſhould then recouer what he had before loſt, with much more that was the Turks: if otherwiſe, yet by voluntarie entring into arms to H countenance himſelfe, and to giue the Turks occaſion to thinke that he feared him not: which was (as he ſaid) the onely way to preſerue their common ſafety, which would be vnto all the confederat princes eaſie enough, if they themſelues made it not more difficult than it were of the enemy. The ſpeech of the embaſſador was willingly heard: wherunto the King anſwe-red, That he would conſider therupon what he had to do: and in the mean while, a faire houſe was appointed for the embaſſador and his followers, & bountiful allowance appointed of the kings charge. He was alſo many times ſumptuouſly feaſted by the noblemen, whom he ſtil requeſted to be mediators to the king, to take that honorable war in hand. The king had at that time a ſon called Iſmael, a man of a great ſpirit, whom he then kept in durance, for that he with I too much inſolencie made roads into the frontiers of the Turks dominions, to the diſturbance of the league his father had before made with the late Turkiſh Emperour Solyman: vnto him Alexander hauing acceſſe, was of him courteouſly heard; who fretting & languiſhing for verie griefe of reuenge vpon the Turks, wiſhed, that either the king his father had his mind, or hee himſelfe the power of a king: and ſaid, That if euer it were his good fortune to obtaine the kingdome, he would indeed ſhew what he then ſtood and thought. But of him more ſhal be ſaid hereafter. Whileſt this matter went more ſlowly forward in the Perſian court than the Embaſſador would haue had it, newes was brought vnto the court, of the great victory which the Chriſtians had much about that time obtained of the Turks at ſea: vpon which occaſion the embaſſador ſolicited Tamas more earneſtly than before, to make himſelf partaker of the victo- K rie of the Chriſtians, by entring into confederation with them, & by taking vp of arms, rather than to hold vncertain friendſhip with the Turks in their miſeries, by whom he had bin ſo often wronged. This he ſaid was the only time for the Perſian king to recouer his former glory, the like offer wherof would neither often chance, neither long ſtay: & that if he ſuffered ſo fit an oportunitie to ſlip away, he ſhould afterwards in vaine wiſh for the ſame, when it were too late. This ſo wholeſome counſell was well heard, but preuailed nothing to ſtirre vp the aged king: who then troubled with rebellion in Media, or weary of the former warres he had had foraſmuch as the Chriſtian Princes had made a perpetuall league amongſt themſelues, hee would for two yeares expect the euent, and afterward as occaſion ſerued, ſo to reſolue vpon L peace and war. This improuident reſolution of the king, brought afterward vnprofitable and too late repentance vnto the whole Perſian kingdome; when as within a few yeares after, all the calamities which the Senat had by their embaſſadour (as true prophets) foretold, redounded vnto the great ſhaking thereof. For the Cyprian war once ended, & peace concluded with the Venetians, Amurath the ſonne of Selymus, ſucceeding his father in the Turkiſh Empire, inuading the Perſian king, tooke from him the great countrey of Media, now called Siluan, with a great part of Armenia the Great, and the regall citie of Tauris, as ſhall be hereafter in due place declared. At which time the Perſian, who now refuſed to take vp armes, or ioyne in league with the Chriſtian princes, repented that he had not before hearkened vnto the wholſome counſell of the Venetians: and taught by his owne harmes, wiſhed in vain, that the Chri-ſtian Princes would againe take vp armes and ioyne with him againſt the Turke.

Muſtapha Baſſa returneth to the ſiege of Famaguſta. Muſtapha the great Baſſa and Generall of the Turks armie, furniſhed of all things that could M bee deſired for maintenance of his ſiege; and ſouldiers in great number dayly repairing vnto him out of Cilicia, Syria, the Leſſer Aſia, and the countries thereabout, beſide great ſupplies brought vnto him by Haly Baſſa from Conſtantinople; inſomuch, that it was thought

A thought he had in his army two hundred thouſand men: began now that Winter was paſt, in the latter end of Aprill, to draw neerer vnto Famaguſta, and with incredible labour to caſt vp trenches and mounts againſt the city, of ſuch height, that the defendants from the higheſt places of the citie could ſcarcely ſee the points of the Turks ſpeares, or tops of their tents, as they lay incamped: which was no great matter for the Baſſa to performe, hauing in his campe fortie thouſand pioners alwaies ready at his command.

The deſcription of Famagoſta. The citie of Famaguſta is ſcituat in the Eaſt end of the Iſland, in a plain and low ground betwixt two promontories, the one called S. Andrews head, and the other the head of Græcia. It is in circuit two miles, and in forme foure ſquare; but that the ſide toward the Eaſt, longer and B more winding than the reſt, doth much deforme the exact figure of a quadrant: it is almoſt on two parts beaten vpon with the ſea, the other parts toward the land are defended with a ditch not aboue fifteen foot broad, a ſtone wall, and certaine bulwarks and parapets. Vpon the gate that leadeth to Amathus ſtandeth a ſix cornered tower: other towers ſtand out alſo in the wal, euery of them ſcarce able to containe ſix pieces of artillerie. It hath a hauen opening toward the Southeaſt, defended from the iniurie of the weather by two great rockes, betwixt which the ſea commeth in by a narrow paſſage about fortie paces ouer, but after opening wider giueth a conuenient harbor to ſhips, whereof it cannot containe any great number, and was now ſhut vp with a ſtrong chaine. Neere vnto the hauen ſtandeth an old caſtle with foure towers, after the antient manner of building. There was in the citie one ſtrong bulwarke, built after the C manner of the fortification of our time, with paliſadoes, curtaines, caſemets, and ſuch like, in ſuch manner, as that it ſeemed almoſt impregnable. All which, although they made ſhew of a ſtrong and well fortified citie, yet for that there wanted many things, it was thought too weak long to hold out againſt the great power of the Turke: but what wanted by reaſon of the ſci-tuation and weake fortification, that the Gouernor and other noble captaines ſupplied in beſt ſort they might, with a ſtrong garriſon of moſt valiant ſouldiers, the ſureſt defence of ſtrong places. There was in the citie two thouſand and fiue hundred Italians, two hundred Albanois The number of the defendants of Famagoſta. horſemen, before entertained by the Gouernor; and of the Cypriots themſelues were muſtered two thouſand and fiue hundred moe, all men reſolutely ſet downe to ſpend their liues in defence of their countrey.

Muſtapha with wonderfull celeritie hauing brought to perfection his fortifications, planted D his batterie of 64 great pieces; amongſt which were foure great baſiliskes of exceeding big-neſſe, wherewith he continually without intermiſſion battered the wals of the city in fiue places, but eſpecially that part of the wall that was between the hauen and the gate that leadeth to Amathus. And with great morter pieces caſt vp huge ſtones, which from high falling into the city, with their weight brake down the houſes they light vpon, & fell oftentimes through their vaults, euen in the bottom of their ſellars, to the great terror of the beſieged. The wals in Famagoſta aſſaulted & notably defended by the Chriſtians. diuers places ſore ſhaken, and the houſes beaten down, he began to aſſault the city: which the detendants (their forces yet whole) valiantly repulſed, and not only defended their wals and draue the Turks from the breaches, but furiouſly ſallied out vpon them, and hauing ſlaine and wounded many, wonderfully diſturbed their fortifications, & abated their courage: neither did E the enemy with greater fury maintaine the battery or aſſault, than did the Chriſtians the defence of the city, ſtil ſending their deadly ſhot into the thickeſt of that great multitude; inſomuch that in few daies the Baſſa had loſt 30000 of his men: and the captains themſelues wondering at the valour of the defendants, as if they had not now to doe with ſuch Chriſtians as they had before ſo oftentimes ouerthrown, but with ſome other ſtrange people, began to deſpaire of the winning of the city. The Turks thus doubting, and almoſt at a ſtand, the Chriſti-ans in the mean time made vp their breaches with earth, baskets, wool ſacks, and ſuch like, not ſparing their very beds and bedclothes, cheſts, carpets, & what ſoeuer els might ſerue to fill vp the breach. Among many wants they feared, the greateſt was the want of pouder, which with continuall ſhooting began greatly to be diminiſhed: wherefore to reſerue ſome part thereof F againſt al extremities, they thought it beſt whilſt yet ſome ſtore was left, to vſe the ſame more ſparingly, and to ſhoot more ſeldome. But the Turks ſtill drawing neerer and neerer the city, and caſting vp mounts higher than the wals of the city, with earth & fagots filled vp the ditch: Famagoſta againe aſſaulted by the Turkes.
which done, they of the broken ſtones made wals on either ſide, to ſaue themſelues from the flankering ſhot of the Chriſtians, then giuing a freſh aſſault, they vſed not only their ſhot and

...dants, that euery man requested to haue the places of most danger, and from thence

...maintaining the assault, not only by day, but by often alarmes in the night also,
...kept the Chri... ...inually in doubtfull suspence and readinesse, as if they should haue re-ceiued a present a...: and as soone as it was day, with fresh men that had slept their fill, desperately assailed the Christians almost spent and maigre for lacke of sleepe and rest. Force not preuailing, the restlesse enemie leauing nothing vnattempted, by a queint deuise was like to H haue taken one of the gates of the citie: there was growing in the Island great plentie of a kind of wood much of the nature of the Firre or pitch tree, easie to be set on fire, but hard to be quenched, but differing in this, that in burning it gaue forth such a noysome smell, as is not by any man well to be indured: of this kind of wood the Turks brought a wonderful quantity to one of the gates called Limosina, which once set on fire, could not by the defendants by any means be quenched, although they cast whole pipes and tuns of water at once into it, but most terribly burning close vnto the gate by the space of foure daies, with the vehemencie of the heat and loathsomnesse of the smell, so troubled the defendants, that scarce any of them could indure to stand vpon the wall, but forsaking the same, were euer and anon like to haue giuen I the enemie leaue to enter.

Bragadinus encourageth the defend...

Bragadinus the Gouernor, more carefull of the common safety than of his own danger, ceased not still to be going about from one place to another; telling the Italians, That now was giuen the fittest occasion they could desire, for them to shew their valor in, & to gaine great honor of their barbarous enemies: that it would be to their eternall glory, if by their only means without any other help, the city so far off from ... reliefe of the Christians might be defended, and the great power of the Turks defeated: this (he said) was the onely time wherein it stood them most vpon to play the men; for if they could keep that little was left, the rest of the Island would be easily recouered: and although the Turks armie exceeded far in number, yet did they ex... ell them in prowesse and valor; whereby a few, and as it were but an handfull of K men, had oftentimes preuailed against most infinit multitudes: now all the eyes of the world, as well friends as foes to be fixed vpon them, so that if they held out against so great a power, both their enemies would admire their valour, and all Christendome extoll their inuincible courage and prowesse; and that they themselues should thereby reape both great profit & honour: neither that any thing could be alledged, why they should not be compared with the worthy knights of Malta, who to their eternal fame had deliuered themselues out of the mouth of the Turke, & left vnto the world a most faire example for men valiantly to stand in so good a quarrell vpon their owne defence: Nicosia (he said) was lost rather by the cowardise of the defendants, than by the valour of the enemie. He also praised the fidelitie and courage of the Græcians, who for any feare or danger could neuer be remoued from the Venetians, or induced to submit themselues vnto the Turks gouernment: and persuaded them, with the same resolution to defend their owne city, that they saw in the Venetian souldiers, fighting for them, and for their owne honour to striue with the Italians, in defence of their State, their countrie, their wiues, and children, against the tyrannie of the Turks; forasmuch as aid would in short time come, and set them free from all danger. The Senat also in like manner had sent letters to Famagusta, willing them to be of good cheere, and yet a while to hold out the siege, and that they should be in short time relieued. Baleonius also Generall of the garrison souldiers, himselfe in armes was present at euery skirmish, carefully foreseeing what was in euery place and at all times to bee done; and by incouraging of his souldiers, and aduenturing of his person, shewed himselfe to be both a worthie commander, & valiant souldier. Neither did the soldiers alone, but euen the women also what they might, striuing aboue the power of the strength M both of the minds and bodies; some bringing meat, some ... weapons vnto the defendants, and others stones, beds, chests, & such like stuffe to make vp the breaches. But victuals beginning now to wax scant, 8000 of the vulgar sort of people were turned out of the citie, who all in safetie were suffred to passe thorow the midst of the Turks army, to seeke their liuing in the country.

Baleonius a valiant captaine.

Thus

A Thus whilest open force preuailed not according to the Turkes desire, they began in foure places to vndermine the citie, in hope to haue found entrance: but the defendants doubting such a matter, by diligent listening, and great vessels set full of water neere vnto the walls, and drums laid vpon the ground, by the mouing thereof discouered their workes, and with counter mines frustrated those of the enemy: yet in so great a stir and hurly-burly all things were not possibly to be discouered; wherby it came to passe, that whilest the defendants were altogether busied in defending the walls, a mine not perceiued was suddenly blowne vp ... ere vnto the tower standing vpon the hauen; by force whereof a great part of the wall thereabout was in a moment with a most horrible noise ouerthrowne. With the fall thereof the Turkes thinking the city as good as taken, with an horrible shout and outcrie mounted the wall, and in B the breach set vp their ensignes; Countie Peter, who had the charge of that part of the wall, being not now able to defend the same, so suddenly ouerthrowne: which Nestor Martinengus quickly perceiuing, came speedily from his owne station, to repulse the enemy now readie to haue entred. The fight became there most fierce and terrible, on the one side hope, on the other desperation, enraged their minds: the Turks were in hope, that if they forced themselues but a little they should forthwith win the city; and the defendants propounding nothing vnto themselues but shamefull death and torture, fought as men altogether desperat. The Turkes trusted to their multitude, and the Christians to their valour: In the meane time, Andreas Bragadinus with certain great pieces aptly placed, out of the castle slew a number of the Turkes as they were comming to the breach. Baleonius hearing of the danger, came in haste with a com-
C panie of couragious soldiers, to relieue them that were fighting at the breach, and cheering vp his followers, thrust himselfe with the formost into the face of the breach; and there not only appointed what was to be done, and with cheerefull countenance encouraged his soldiers, but with his owne hand hauing slaine many, tooke one of the Turks ensignes, when as he had before slaine the bearer thereof, and tumbled him headlong into the ditch. With the sight wherof others incouraged, both on the right hand and on the left, made there a notable battell, ... men fighting for their last hope. In fine the Turkes were glad to retire, leauing behind them foure thousand carkases of their slaine fellowes in the towne ditch, with fourteene of their ensignes, which were brought into the city. Neither was this victorie gained without some losse of the Christians; about a hundred were slaine, among whom were Robertus Maluetius, Dauid D Nocius, Celsus Feto, Erasmus Firmo, all captaines.

The Turkes seeke to vndermine the citie.

The breach is notably defended.

For all this, they in the citie tooke small rest, the Turks great shot still thundring in amongst them; and that in such furious sort, as that in one day (which was the eight of Iune) were numbered about fiue thousand great shot, shot into the citie. With which continuall batterie, one of the round bulwarkes of the towne was so shaken, as that a part of the front thereof was fallen downe into the ditch, and another part stood leaning readie to fall, in such sort as that it was not longer to be defended: which the Christians perceiuing, presently vndermined the same bulwarke, and in the mine placed certain barrels of gunpouder. The Turks comming to assault the place they had so sore battered, the defendants after some small resistance, feigned themselues to retire for feare, so to draw the enemie the faster on; who was no sooner come to the E place desired, but that fire being put to the mine, blew vp the bulwark with all them that stood thereon; of whom some were ouerwhelmed with the earth it selfe, other some were blowne vp into the aire, and falling downe againe, miserably perished; and other some, shot as it were out of a gun, fell downe a great way off, and so were rent in pieces: which was vnto the defendants a most pleasant sight. About six hundred of the Turkes perished at this assault, amongst whom were Mustapha Generall of the voluntarie soldiers, and Feregates a man of great marke amongst the Turkes. But by the hastie firing of the mine, there perished also about an hundred of the Christians, ouertaken in their owne deuice, amongst whom were also some of great account.

The Turks inflamed with their losses, were more inraged with the speeches and persuasions F of Mustapha their Generall; who most earnestly exhorted them, with one consent to assaile their enemies, now driuen into a corner of the Island, spoiled of all their country, trusting more vnto the strength of the place, than of themselues, entreating for nothing more, than with their liues to depart thence. But what place (said he) is there impregnable for the Turks? Nicosia, Zigeth, and such other strong Townes woon, what are they but the monuments and testimonies rise of the cowardise of the Christians, and the prowesse of the Turks? This day (said he) will C confirme your former labors and victories; which you before vndertooke for honor, but here you haue honor mixt with gold, and prey sufficient to make you all rich. The Turks encouraged with this speech of their General, as men forgetful of al dangers, began a more terrible than euer before; & hauing with incredible labor made three great mines, & blowing them vp, ouerthrew a great part with the wall of the castle, the notable defence of the hauen: whilst time, they with all their force oftentimes assailed the city, as if it should haue bin their last labor; neither ceased they so to do night or day. At which time also that part of the city which is beaten vpon with the sea, was assaulted by them in the gallies also.

Famagusta hardly assaulted.

The poore Christians spent with deadly wounds, continual labor, perpetual watching both H night and day, and now brought to smal number, hardly withstood the furious enemy, assailing them in so many places at once, and held out that tempest rather with courage than strength. In the meane time the enemies armie increased daily, the Turks in hope of the like fr[illegible] they had at Nicosia, continually repairing out of the countries round about, vnto the can[illegible] The Christian captaines seeing their men with continuall assaults sore spent, (insomuch, that how many soeuer they seemed to be, there was not aboue three hundred sound men left) but seuen barrels of pouder remaining, want of all things daily increasing, hope of aid still decreasing, and the Venetians (their onely comfort) so far from them; the captaines (I say) themselues began to quaile in courage: and the rather, for that such reliefe as was sent from Venice, could not possibly be brought vnto them, but staied at Crete; the Turks gallies still lying before Fama- I gusta, so that nothing could in safetie be brought thither. This feare of the captaines themselues could not long be hid or dissembled, but that it was by the citizens perceiued: who hauing neither power to hold out the siege, neither place left to flie vnto, ouercome with necessitie, came flocking to the Gouernour, crauing of him aid and comfort, and with aboundance of teares besought him in this common desperation to take compassion on them, their wiues, and children, a people that had alwaies so well deserued of the Venetian State. Their walls (they said) were beaten downe, their bulwarks ouerthrowne, the few souldiers that remained, spent with wounds, watching, and famine; the enemies strength increasing daily, so that they must needs in short time all perish with the sword, if the citie were by force taken: wherefore they besought him, that yeelding to necessity, which no power was euer able to withstand, he would K at last, while time yet serued, prouide for the safetie of so faithfull and kinde a people, and not to refuse any conditions, how hard soeuer.

The citizens of Famagusta require the gouernour in time to yeeld vp the citie.

The requests and teares of the citizens of Famagusta, with the due consideration of the de-sperat state of the citie, moued Bragadinus to compassion; who comforting them in best sort he could, perswaded them to be of good cheere, for that he had care both of them & their state, & would so prouide for them, as that they should neuer repent themselues of their fidelity and loialty to the Venetian State. He in the meane time considering the greatnesse of the danger which presently hung ouer all their heads, propounded the matter in a generall counsell called together for the same purpose: wherein after a little debating of the matter, they all agreed to yeeld: only Baleonius at the first dissenting, as doubtfull of the Turkes faith; but afterwards L yeelding vnto the opinion of the rest. So an herauld being sent vnto the Bassa, a truce was taken for certain days to parley in, and hostages on both sides giuen, during which time not so much as a dart was throwne, or an arrow shot from either side. After a few days parley the conditions were agreed vpon, whereupon the city should be yeelded into the power of the Bassa, which were these: First, That the inhabitants of the city yet aliue, should in safetie enioy their liues, libertie, and goods, with the free exercise of the Christian religion: That the Gouernor with the rest of the captains and soldiers might in safetie depart with bag and baggage, and their departure to take with them fiue great pieces of ordnance, and three horses, which soeuer it should please them to make choice of, and that the Turkes should safely conduct them into Crete, finding them both victual and shipping. All which things were with more kindnes promised, than with fidelitie performed. Yet all these matters agreed vpon, and conceiued into M writing, as also by solemne oath on both sides confirmed; the Gouernour sending a messenger before, requested that he might haue leaue to come to see the Bassa, and to deliuer vnto him the keyes of the citie. Leaue being granted, Bragadinus the Gouernour, Baleonius, Andreas Bragadinus, Laurentius Theupolus Earle of Paphos, Io. Antonius Quirinus, Aloysius Martinengus,

A parley betwixt them of Famagusta and the Turker.

A tinengus with a great sort of other captaines came into the campe: but before they entred into the Bassa's pauilion, they were commanded to deliuer their weapons, which they all did. At the first meeting Mustapha entertained them courteously, and with many glorious words, as if it had been in admiration, extolled their worthie valor and courage: saying, That he was glad now to know them by face, whose valiant minds he had before knowne by their most valiant deeds. Now prowesse and valour seemed not only in safetie, but also honored of the enemie: when after a long discourse the false Bassa reuolued vnto the mischiefe and treacherie he had before resolued vpon; complaining that certaine of his men taken at the siege, had been afterward against all reason and order slaine. Which the gouernor and the rest vtterly denying, he start vp as in a rage, and with high words and sterne countenance vrging the fact, commanded B them all to be forthwith cast in bonds; and so bringing them out of his pauilion, in the sight of the army, contrary to his oath and promise, caused them all to be slain. At which time Bragadinus & Theupolus were oftentimes commanded to lay down their heads, to haue had them strucke off: yet was their execution deferred, and their liues reserued, not to saue them, but with more exquisit punishment and torture to satisfie the barbarous cruelty of the faithles and vnmerciful tirant. The next day after, Bragadinus hauing his ears before cut off in despight, was brought forth to be wondred at, and tortured with the most extremest kind of torture that ty-rannie it selfe could haue deuised: for dispoiled of his jewels and attire, and a basket laid vpon his shoulders filled with earth, he was inforced oftentimes to cary the same, to repaire the ram-piers that were ouerthrowne; and euer as he passed by, the proud Bassa insulting vpon him to C fall downe and to kisse the ground at his feet: and so buffetted with the Turks fists, and spurned as a dog with their feet, was in great derision & despight asked, Whether he hoped that Christ his God would come to help him or not? Which indignitie of it selfe bitter & miserable, the dignitie of the man made much more miserable: whose comely and stately countenance, with his long and reuerend beard, euen in that extreame miserie added vnto him a certaine majestie and grace. In this so foule a sight of vertue troden vnder foot, the poore Christians could neither wel stay their tears, nor let them fall, for feare of the displeasure of the Turks. But the forsworne Bassa, not only forgetfull of all humanity, but inraged rather with extreme cruelty, caused that noble and worthie Bragadinus to be set in a chaire, & his skin to be flaine off from him quicke: a punishment vnworthie of him that suffered it, but most worthie him that inflicted the D same. Yet in so great & horrible a torture he was not heard to let fall any word not beseeming a faithfull Christian and the honor of his country: only he called vpon God for mercie, & de-tested the Turks perfideous trecherie, and so breathed out his life. But the tirant, worthy eternal infamie, not satisfied with the torture of the liuing man, caused the head to be cut off from the dead bodie, and vpon the point of a speare to be set vp on a high place for all men to looke vpon. His skin also stuffed with chaffe, he caused to be hanged vp at the yards arme, and so to be carried about; not so true a trophy of his victory, as a testimonie of his perfideous and Turkish cruelty. Two dayes after, Countie Theupolus after he had bin most shamefully intreated, full of the marks of the Turks cruelrie, was (to make an end withall) shamefully hanged in the market E place. With what cruelty the Bassa had tyrannised vpon the nobility, with the same he also raged vpon the meaner sort of the citizens, of whom some he slew, some he chained in the gallies, & carried away the rest into bondage. Three hundred Christians, some soldiers, some citizens, which came forth with the gouernour to see the Turks campe, were there also all slaine. Nestor Martinengus a famous captaine escaped the tyrants hands, being hidden by one of the Bassa's Eunuchs, who by the helpe of a Greeke fisherman got to Leptis, and from thence to Crete, and so afterwards to Venice, where he faithfully reported to Aloysius Mocenicus the duke, the whole processe of that war, with the losse of the city; and that in the space of threescore and ten days there was aboue a hundred and forty thousand great shot discharged against the city. Such noblemen and gentlemen as escaped out of this so general a slaughter, banished their country, and in miserie, dispersed without hope of returne, led afterward a miserable & vagrant life, though F some of them euen at this day (as I haue bin credibly informed) are by the Venetian State right well maintained. The countrey people and artificers were generally by the Turkes spared, for the peopling of the Countrie. This was the fatall ruine of Cyprus, one of the most fruitfull and beautifull Islands of the Mediterranian: the losse whereof, not without cause, grieued manie Christian princes, as sometime a kingdome of it selfe, but now a prouince of the Turkish Empire:

The forsworne Bassa tyrannizeth vpon the dead bodie of Bragadinus.

Theupolus hanged.

Nestor Martinengus by good fortune escapeth.

Cyprus lost.

hileſt Muſtapha yet lay at the ſiege of Famagusta, the other two great Baſſa's, Partaw and ing of the ſea, that no reliefe ſhould be ſent by the Venetians to Famagusta; and further as o ſerued to infeſt their dominions) about the midſt of May arriued in Eubœa with two hu and thirtie gallies; whither Vluzales Viceroy of Algiers, with diuers other the Turks not rts, reſorted vnto them with their gallies. With this fleet departing from Eubœa, and ſai ngſt the coaſt of Myſia, Ionia, Caria, and ſo directly toward the Rhodes, they were met wi thirtie gallies moe of the Turks aduenturers. After that, hauing left certain galies for to lie before Famagusta, they directed their courſe for the Iſland of Crete, & the H 13 of Iune put into the bay of Amphimalea, now called Suda, and there landed 12000 men.

The Turke arriue in Crete with a great fleet.

The deſcription of Crete.

The Iſland of Crete, now called Candia, is greater than Cyprus, but leſſer than ia or Sardinia: but for fertilitie comparable with any of the Iſlands of the Mediterranian. s in antient time famous for many things, but eſpecially for an hundred cities which therein ſtood, as witneſſeth amongſt others, Seneca: (Vrbibus centum ſpecioſa Creta) but at this time it hath only three; Candia a Colonie of the Venetians, whereof the Iſland now taketh name, Canea, and Rhetimo. The circuit of the Iſland is fiue hundred & twenty miles, full of hils; for which cauſe the people of the countrey are much delighted in hunting. In it is no nauigable riuer, or venomous beaſt. It is now moſt famous thorow a great part of the world, for the good Malm-ſey which there groweth, and is from thence in great abundance ſent into many far countries. I Therin alſo growes great plentie of Cypreſſe trees, ſeruing for the vſe of ſhipping. It is at this day ſubiect to the Venetians. The Turks being landed, and ranging vp and down the country, did what harme they poſſibly c , burning and ſpoiling all as they went; vntill that at laſt they were vpon the ſudden en ed by Franciſcus Iuſtinianus, who but a little before their landing was come into the Iſland wit diers; and now joining with the Iſland people, notably charged them, being a gether diſperſed and ſeeking after prey; and hauing ſlaine many of them, inforced the reſt to retire to their gallies. The next day the Turkes landing againe in great number, burnt diuers townes, and ranſacked Setia and Rhetimo, where they tooke a rich prey, and carried away many priſoners: but loded with their bootie, diſper-ſed and fearing nothing leſſe than to beat that time ſet vpon, they were aſſailed by Lucas Mi- K chael a valiant captaine, two thouſand of them ſlaine, and with the loſſe of their bootie and priſoners, glad to retire vnto their gallies. Thus repulſed from Crete, they tooke their courſe to Cythera, Zacynthus, and Cephalenia, Iſlands ſubiect to the Venetians: where beſide other harmes by them done, they carried away with them ſix thouſand poore Chriſtians into moſt miſerable captiuitie.

The Turkes driuen out of Crete

Departing thence, and ſailing alongſt the coaſt of Epirus, they came to Suppolo an hauen towne in Epirus, which Venerius in the beginning of theſe wars had taken from the Turks, but was now againe by them recouered. After that, they came to Dulcigno, which the Turks had but a little before beſieged by land, for that the Gouernour thereof, and of Antiuari (another towne of the Venetians vpon the frontiers of Dalmatia) had compacted with three hundred L Epirots, to ſtirre vp the countrey to rebellion, and to reuolt to the Venetians: for the effecting whereof, the Epirots requeſted of the Venetians ſix thouſand ſoldiers to make head, which the Venetians promiſed to ſend them. Whereupon the aforeſaid Epirots forthwith tooke arms, and raiſed moſt part of Epirus into rebellion: vnto whom was ſent at the firſt one captain with an hundred Italians from Catora. But when the Epirots vainly expecting the promiſed aid, ſaw themſelues on euery ſide hardly beſet with their enemies; deſpairing of any good ſucceſſe, they yeelded themſelues to the mercie of Achmetes Baſſa, Selymus his great lieutenant in Græcia (who to repreſſe that ſo dangerous a rebellion, was come thither with an armie of foureſcore thouſand Turks:) ſo was a moſt faire occaſion loſt, whenas the reſt of the Epirots, inflamed with the hope of libertie, were readie to haue come vnto their friends, alreadie in armes, M and by their example like enough to haue raiſed all Græcia into rebellion. But now deceiued of their expectation, bewailed their miſery, and truſting t the promiſes of the Venetians, they had caſt themſelues and all theirs into moſt manifeſt dan They of Dulcigno ſeeing themſelues hardly beſet both by ſea and land, ſent to Partaw Baſſa, and couenanting with him, that

A they might in ſafetie depart, deliuered vnto him the towne: and ſo Sara Martinengus Gouer- Dulcigno, Antiuari, & Budua, ſtrong townes of the Venetians vpon the coaſt of Epirus and Dalmatia, yeelded to the Turk.
nor of the towne, with the garriſon ſouldiers, were in foure ſhips conueyed in ſafetie to Ragu-ſium: as for the citiſens, promiſe was kept with them after the Turkiſh manner. In the ſame hurley the Turks tooke alſo the townes of Antiuari and Budua. Antiuari was both by ſituation and fortification ſtrong, and furniſhed with a good garriſon: neuertheleſſe Alexander Do- natus Gouernor thereof, a man of no experience in martial affaires, ouercome with the preſent feare, and deſpairing to be able to hold the towne, cowardly yeelded the ſame vnto the enemie. Which his beaſtly cowardiſe the Senat ſuffered not vnpuniſhed, but confiſcating his Cowardiſe puniſhed.
goods, and remouing him from the Senat, caſt him into exile. From Antiuari, the Turks follo-B wing their good fortune, departed with their fleet into the bay called Rizonicus, but now the bay of Catharo, and both by ſea and land laid hard ſiege vnto the ſtrong towne of Catharo, called in antient time Aſcriuium: againſt which they caſt vp two great bulwarks, and planted thereon nine great pieces of artillerie, wherewith to haue battered the towne and the caſtle: but the defendants as reſolute men ſallying out, put them from their ordnance, and inforced them againe vnto their gallies.

Whileſt theſe things were in doing, Vluzales and Caracoza, both men of great account and name among the Turks, got leaue for ten dayes of the Admirall, with 60 gallies to ſpoile the Iſlands neere thereabouts ſubiect to the Venetians. Who comming to the Iſland of Curzola, about eightie miles Eaſtward from Raguſium, landed their men, with purpoſe to aſſault the towne of Curzola, of the ſame name with the Iſland. Which Anthonius Contarenus the gouer-C nor thereof perceiuing, in the dead time of the night fled for feare out of the towne, into the rocks and places of more ſafetie, after whome the townesmen followed alſo: ſo that in the Curzola forſaken by the men, is defended by women.
towne were not left aboue 20 men, and about 80 women, who with weapons in their hands, after the reſt were fled, came to the walls, as wiſhing rather there to die, than to fall into the hands of the barbarous enemie. But at ſuch time as the Turks began to approch the town, and the women with ſtones, fire, & ſuch weapons as they had were beating them off, & with greater courage defending the place, than was to haue bin in their ſex expected, by the goodnes of God a great tempeſt aroſe ſuddenly out of the North, which ſo outragiouſly toſſed the gallies, that Vluzales & Caracoza were glad to giue ouer the aſſault, & to get them thence into a place of more ſafetie. Sailing alongſt the coaſt, they by the way ſpoiled Lyſna, Bracia, and Liſſa, D little Iſlands vpon the coaſt of Dalmatia, out of which they carried away with them 1600 poore Chriſtians into captiuity. Theſe arch pirats at their pleaſure roaming vp & downe the ſea, fortuned to light vpon a ſhip of the Chriſtians, bound from Meſſana to Corcyra; which they tooke, and in rifling thereof found certaine letters directed to the gouernour of Corcyra, Selymus aduertiſed of the league lately concluded betwixt the chriſtian Princes. certifying him of the league, then but lately concluded among the Chriſtian Princes: which letters they ſent in poſt to Selymus, to giue him knowledge thereof: who thereupon writ to his Admirals, with all hoſtilitie to infeſt any of the dominions of the Chriſtian confederats.

The Turks fleet thus raging and raigning in the Adriatique, brought a great feare not onely vpon the coaſts of Dalmatia, Iſtria, and the Iſlands thereabouts, which were by them moſt afflicted; but alſo vpon the ſea coaſts of Apulia, and all alongſt that ſide of Italie; yea and vpon E the citie of Venice it ſelfe: inſomuch that they were glad to fortifie as well the Citie as the frontiers of their dominions, with new fortifications and garriſons; as did alſo the King and the Pope in Italie: for why, no ſhip or gallie could now looke out of any port, but it was pre-ſently ſurpriſed and taken by the Turks: which with the ſundrie calamities before receiued, ſo confounded the Venetians, that they in their aſſemblies and conſultations ſeemed rather to quake for feare, than after their wonted manner, grauely to conſult how the enemie was to be repulſed. Yet for the more ſafetie of their citie, and for feare leſt the Turks fleet ſhould forcibly breake in vpon them, they ſtrongly fortified the paſſages through the rock or banke which defendeth the city from the ſea, and kept continually twelue thouſand men in readineſſe in the citie for the more aſſurance thereof.

F All the Turks fleet being againe met together, Partaw and Haly departed from Aulona the 26 of Auguſt, and ſailed directly to Corcyra: which little Iſland ſeemed to be compaſſed in round with the great enemies fleet. Partaw Baſſa at his firſt arriuall there, landed 800 horſemen and a thouſand foot, who ranging vp and downe the Iſland, did great hurt and burnt the verie ſuburbs of the citie: at which time the garriſon ſoldiers ſallying out vpon them with a thouſand

horsemen and fiue hundred foot slew a great number of them, and amongst the rest one Rays a man of great name. Thus the Turks fleet hauing done wonderfull harme in the territorie, as well in the Islands, as vpon the frontiers of Dalmatia, inriched with the spoile of those countries, and carrying away with them fifteene thousand most miserable captiues, departing from Corcyra, arriued all in the bay of Corinth (now called the gulfe of Lepanto), where we will for a while leaue them to ride in safetie.

The Turks put into the bay of Lepanto.

At the same time as this great fleet (the terrour of that part of Christendome) first put into the Adriatique, the Venetian Admirall then lying with fifty gallies at Corcyra, and fearing if he stayed any longer, to be inforced with so small a power to fight against so strong an Enemie, or els so to be shut vp, that he could not ioine his forces with the Spanish fleet, which was dayly expected; vpon the comming of the fleet departed thence to Messana, there more commodiously and more safely to attend the comming of Don Iohn of Austria General of the Spanish forces. At his comming, Columnius met him with twelue gallies (which the Great duke of Florence had sent in the aid of the Confederats) and three gallies of Malta, who onely were yet come thither, and with great honor receiued him. Not long after, M. Antonius Quirinus and Antonius Canalis came thither also with sixty and two gallies, before appointed by the Venetians for the reliefe of Famagusta, but now called backe againe to ioyne with the rest of the fleet: and in short time the gallies of Sicilie arriued there also. At last after long expectation, in the latter end of August came Don Iohn with the Spanish fleet, a man then about foure and twentie yeares old, in whom wanted no honorable parts, his mothers blemish only excepted: who although he was most deere vnto his father Charles the fifth, yet left he him nothing by his will, but only at his death commended him vnto his son Philip, as his brother. The Venetian and the Popes Admirals hearing of his comming, went to meet him, and that with such triumph and ioy, that all the former beaumes before conceiued of his long staying, was turned into gladnesse, with most assured hope of triumphant victory: their doubled forces, and two great fleets ioined in one, encouraged their enterprise, filling all the West with the expectation of some great matter. The Venetian fleet consisted of an hundred and eight gallies, six galleasses, two tall ships, and a great number of small galliots. Vnto them were ioined twelue gallies of the Popes, of whom Columnius was Admirall. And with Don Iohn the Generall, and Auria the Spanish Admirall, came fourescore and one gallies, of whom three were from the knights of Malta. In this fleet, beside mariners, were reckoned to be twenty thousand fighting men: an army not onely beautifull for shew, as consisting of most choice bodies; but indeed most strong and puissant, old beaten souldiers almost throughout it, in euery place intermixed with others of lesse skill: many knowne to be men of great experience, rich and lustie bodies, were by name called forth to this so honorable seruice; and diuers other of great nobilitie, as well old men, as young and lusty gallants, for the naturall hatred they beare vnto the common enemie, came, and as voluntary men cheerfully thrust themselues into that religious war: euery of which noblemen, as they were greater by birth or power, so had they drawne after them a greater number of their fauorits and followers, strong and able bodies, of their owne charge brauely armed; who fought for no other pay for their paines and danger, but by some norable victorie to eternise their names, or honorably to spend their liues in so iust a quarrell, as for the defence of the Christian faith and religion. Amongst these most honourable and resolute men were three of greatest marke, Alexander Farnesius Prince of Parma, in time to be the honor and glory of Italie his natiue country, whose vntimely death in the Low-countries euen his honorable enemies lamented; and being dead, is not without cause and worthy desert accounted amongst the most politique and famous leaders of our age. The second was Franciscus Maria Prince of Vrbin, a yong man honorably discended and of an inuincible courage: and the third Paul. Iordanus Vrsinus, an honorable gentleman of the familie of the Vrsini in Rome.

Don Iohn of Austria.

Alexander Farnesius Prince of Parma.

All the power of the confederat Princes thus met together at Messana, and all things now in readinesse, a counsel was called by the General, to resolue what course to take in those most dangerous wars against so puissant an enemy: vnto which counsel were admitted only Don Iohn the Generall himselfe, and Aloysius Rechezenes, of some called Requisenius great Commendor of Castile, the Generals Lieutenant, or rather director of his actions; Sebastianus Venerius the Venetian Admirall; and Augustinus Barbadicus Generall Proueditor, of equall authoritie and reputation with the Admirall; and one Secretarie: Marius Anthonius Columnius the Popes Admirall, Admirall, with Pompeius Colonna his kinsman. The chiefe point whereon these great commanders were to resolue, was, Whether they should aduenture the generall fortune of a battell against so strong an enemy, or onely seeke to defend the frontiers of their owne dominions? Which question (as all other of like sort) was of diuers diuersly phantasied; euery man pleasing himselfe with his owne reasons. Requisenius (Don Iohn his chiefe counsellor, without whom he willingly did nothing, and vndoubtedly a man of great valor and experience) speaking first, said, That the enemies strength was necessarily to be knowne, before they committed all to the fortune of a battell: and that therfore delay was to be vsed, lest improuident hast ouerthrew all. Matters of war that were to be decided by the sword, were (as he said) with great & sound aduise to be administred, for that the errors of battel, whereby al was to be put in hazard, were not to be againe amended. He highly commended the aduise of Scipio Africanus, who counselled great commanders, not to fight with the enemie but vpon some great aduantage, or else thereunto forced by necessitie. But as things now stood, what opportunitie could be ministred, or aduantage taken; the enemie keeping himselfe close within the bay of Corinth, and no apparant means how to draw him out from thence? Neither that he for his part was of so great spirit, as within the harbor in place of disaduantage, without hope, to set vpon an enemy in common estimation stronger than himselfe: for what dishonour should they incurre, if hauing receiued some notable losse, they should be inforced with shame to giue ouer the enterprise begun? And to besiege Oricus, Dirrachium, or Castrum Novum, frontier townes of the Turks, so to draw them out to battell; what were this other than to shew a certaine feare and distrust in themselues, and to discourage the minds of the souldiers? for as well the enemy, as the common souldier, would forthwith deeme such a poore attempt to proceed of a meere feare, as to make a vain shew of something doing, when as they durst not incounter the enemy in his full strength. As for the other reason drawne from Necessitie: what necessitie had they, so desperatly to set vpon the enemie: who vpon the approch of Winter must needs in short time lay vp his gallies; and being already in safe harbor, would neuer be drawn to the hazard of a battell, especially like hope, like strength, and like danger appearing on both sides? Wherfore, it were best (in his opinion) only to make a great shew of their forces, so to terrifie the barbarous enemy: but in no case to hazard the hope of the whole Christian common-weale, vpon the fortune of a battell. He farther also propounded vnto them, the vncertaine euents of things, the common chance of war, the strength of the enemie, as wel by sea as by land; with whom they themselues were not (as he said) indeed comparable: then, what an infinit heap of miseries was like to ouerwhelme the Christian common-weale, if they should in any thing miscarrie: and that therefore, safe aduise was in this case to be preferred before that which was attended vpon with greater danger.

On the other side, the Venetians, who thought all delay both infamous and dangerous to their State, were farre of another opinion. Wherefore Venerius and Barbadicus not onely vehemently persuaded, but most instantly requested the Generall & the rest of the great commanders, that so soone as opportunity serued, they would commit the matter to the trial of a battel, & not to make that counsell, which their couragious minds might make most glorious & fortunat, by declining of battell to become dishonourable or frustrat. If desire of honour (said they) moue vs not, shall neither these things moue vs? the losse of so great and chargeable a preparation, the spoiling of our frontiers, & the insolencie of our enemies, which we encrease by delay? We defend our selues and ours, we inuade not them: we go not about to driue the Turke out of his empire; but that we our selues be not by him driuen out of our owne countries. Wherefore we ought so much the more readily & speedily to thinke of battell, by how much the necessity of him is greater that repulseth a danger, than of him that offreth the same. What, are our weapons blunt, or our hands benummed? shall the Turkes so often prouoke vs, and we still be vnreuenged? shall we alwaies shew our weapons, & neuer fight? one fortunat battell is able to blot out the infamie of former time, and to fil vs with the hope of future happinesse: if nothing elfe, let the verie indignitie of the matter stirre vs vp to battell. And what doubt is there, but that the enemy swelling with pride, will come forth with his fleet, and giue vs battell? Thinke you that a small discredit will insue to our honour & reputation, if contented with a vain brag, hauing not once skirmished with the enemy, or so much as seene him, we shall return home, to the general shame of all Christendome? See how many pestilent inconueniences

...iences will enſue, if we ſhall take this courſe. This manner of proceeding will fill all mens ...ds with deſpaire: the people will murmure, That they are to no purpoſe oppreſſed with ...ctions and tributes: the confederat princes (carefull of this war) will ſay, that they haue in vain wearied themſelues with often embaſſages and care therof: the proud enemy will de-...ur departure, or declining of battel, for a manifeſt victory. The next yere we may look for him again with a greater and a ſtronger fleet, which will not only make a more heauie war, but doth ouerbeare downe all before it: at which time, who can aſſure vs that the Chriſti-ans ſhall haue the like preparation, if we ſhall now delay to fight? What labour is to be taken, what coſt to be beſtowed, to ſet forth again ſo great a fleet? Vnto theſe cauſes which impoſe vpon vs a neceſſitie and force to fight, is adioined not onely a ſingular regard of our honor, but a moſt notable opportunity alſo offered: we neuer had a greater fleet, nor better furniſhed with men, munition, & all things elſe to be required for the gaining of a notable victory: and who knoweth not, that the Chriſtian gallies are far ſtronger than the Turks? beſides that, the ...a-teſt part of their beſt ſouldiers are in hope of prey gone into Cyprus, who there ſeeking after the ſpoile, and forgetfull of the enemy, without controlment glut themſelues with the plea-ſures of that rich Iſland; whereby their fleet is ſo much the weaker. All which things, as they promiſe no hard victory, ſo do they propound vnto vs honor, glory, fame, and moſt honorable rewards; and open vnto vs the way both for the defence of the preſent, and recouerie of that hath been before loſt. What then ſtand we ſtill looking for? or why do we not in Gods name ioyne that battell, which is vnto vs not onely neceſſary, but profitable alſo.

Thus much ſaid; they began to intreat and beſeech the Generall and the reſt, not longer to ſuffer the Chriſtian common-weale to receiue loſſe vpon loſſe, but to repoſe their onely hope in the good ſucceſſe of one worthy battel: and neuer to look for the like opportunity, if they let ſlip the preſent. This matter of ſo great conſequence, thus throughly debated amongſt the greateſt commanders, they thought to heare alſo the opinions of other notable captaines, of no leſſe experience than ...he fleet) before they would conclude any thing. Amongſt the reſt, Anthonius Cornea, and Gabriel Serbellio, both Spaniards, & for their great wiſedome and valour had in generall reputation of all men; being demanded their opinions; with moſt ſubſtantiall reaſons, declared the neceſſitie of giuing battell, and that it was not ſo dangerous, as to be therefore ſhunned or delaied: forſomuch as that violent enemy was far eaſier to be dealt withall at ſea than by land; where he muſt fight without his huge multitude of men, the Turks chiefe hope, and only means wherby they haue obtained ſo many victories againſt the Chriſtians. And ſo concluded their opinions, with an effectual perſuaſion to ſet forward to Corcyra, and without delay as occaſion ſerued to giue the enemy battel. Which their opinion being generally well liked, was ſhortly after by the Generall and the reſt approued, & a reſolution ſet downe for the giuing of battell: which was no ſooner known, but there was a general reioicing through the army, euery man cheerfully preparing himſelfe to lay down his life in the publicke defence of the Chriſtian common-weale, and that with ſuch an earneſt de-ſire of battell, that euery day ſeemed now nothing elſe, but a delay of a moſt aſſured victorie.

Yet before they ſhould come into the ſight of the enemy, the three Admirals thought it good to bring forth the fleet into the ſea, and there to martiall the ſame, in ſuch ſort, as if they ſhould euen then preſently haue ioyned battel: to the intent, that by ſuch orderly diſpoſing of their fleet, & by appointing vnto euery man his place he was to keep, they might ſo acquaint them with the order of the battell, as that they ſhould when time ſerued, of themſelues without farther direction, martiall themſelues, and ſo more readily enter into battell. The next day the Admirals brought forth their fleets into the open ſea: in the right wing (which conſiſted of three and fifty gallies) was Auria placed: in the left wing was Auguſtinus Barbadicus with the like number of gallies alſo: and in the middle battel ſtood the Generall with ſeuenty gal-lies: on the right hand of the Generall ſtood Columnius, and on the left Venerius, his aſſociats.
Thus with equall front the fleet ſet forward, as if they ſhould euen preſently haue ioyned battell. Betwixt the wings and the middle battell, was left no more ſpace but for three gallies to row: in the rereward behind the Generall, followed Requiſenius, the great Commendor of Caſtile, with his gallies: after Columnius followed the ...mirall gallie of Genoa, wherin was Alexander Farneſius prince of Parma: and behind Venerius came the Admirall gally of Sauoy, and in her the Prince of Vrbin: in the ſpace betwixt the ...iddle battel and the left wing, was placed

Cornea & Serbellio perſuade the giuing of battell.

The confederats put their fleet in order of battell.

placed Paulus Iordanus: and betwixt the middle battell and the right wing, was Petrus Iuſtinianus with the gallies of Malta: vpon the left wing attended Anthonius Canalis: and Quirinus on the right. About halfe a mile behind all the reſt, followed Aluarus Bacianus Marqueſſe of Sancrace, and Admirall of the Neapolitan fleet, with thirtie gallies; a man of great experience in matters at ſea; and now ſo placed, to be at all times readie to relieue this or that part of the fleet, as the fortune of the battel, or impreſſion of the enemie ſhould require. The Chriſtians had repoſed great hope in ſix galeaſſes; which furniſhed with great ſtore of ordnance & certain ſelect companies of moſt reſolute ſouldiers, ſeemed rather like caſtles than ſhips. Theſe galeaſſes conducted by Franciſcus Dodus, a moſt expert captaine, were placed about a mile before the fleet; two of them before each wing, and the other two before the middle battell: ſo farre diſtant one from another, as that with equall ſpace they anſwered the whole breadth of the front of the fleet, which was almoſt the ſpace of fiue miles, & ſerued the ſame in ſtead of moſt ſtrong bulwarkes. The gallies throughout the fleet kept not cloſe together, but ſuch a conuenient diſtance one from another, as might ſerue for them at libertie to diſcharge their ordnance when time ſhould require. In the wings, as alſo in the maine battell, were the Popes, the Kings, and the Venetian gallies indifferently intermixed; that by the equalitie of the danger they ſhould haue more care to relieue one another, than if they had ſerued apart. Ioannes Cardenius, a moſt valiant captaine, with 8 gallies of Sicilie and two galiots, was appointed to go ten miles before the fleet to deſcrie what hee might, of the enemies doings, and in his returne to ioyne the one halfe of his gallies to the one wing, and the other halfe to the other.

Six galeaſſes.

The Chriſtian fleet departeth from Meſſana, and ioine the Turks battell.

In this ſort they departed from Meſſana, with purpoſe to ſeeke out the enemie: and not long after came to Paxo, where, of a ſmall broile at the firſt, was like to haue riſen a great miſchiefe: for the next day, whileſt Don Iohn ſtaied there to take a view of the Venetian gallies, and how they were furniſhed both of men and munition, he finding them but weakly manned for ſupplying of that want, appointed foure thouſand Spaniards and a thouſand Italians to be put aboord into the Venetian gallies, where moſt need was.

Amongſt theſe ſouldiers, was one company vnder the command of Mutius Tortona their captaine, a man of an vnquiet and furious nature: who going aboord the gallie of Andreas Calergus, firſt fell to words with the captaine of the gallie, and after much ſtir, into plain fight; ſo that in a trice they were altogether by the ears, as well the ſoldiers as the captains: of all which ſtir, Mutius was the onely author. Venerius being not far off, and hearing of the matter, ſent the captaine of his own gallie to appeaſe the tumult: who thruſting himſelfe into the midſt of the furious multitude, was by Mutius in his fury fouly intreated, & diuers of them that came with him ſhrewdly beaten. Which thing Venerius (himſelfe alſo of an hot nature) taking as done in diſgrace of the Venetians, and therewith exceedingly moued; to the terrour of others, cauſed Mutius & his enſigne-bearer to be hanged vp at the yards arme of the ſame gallie, to the great offence of all the Spaniards. The Generall alſo taking this execution in euill part, full of choler and indignation, grieuouſly complained, That he himſelfe as Generall, was therein not a little wronged, and that it became euery commander, to know what belonged to his place, and not to incroach vpon his betters: ſo ſhould the conditions of the league be the better kept, if euery commander could keep himſelf within the bounds of his own authority. Venerius he ſaid, (whoſe authority was inferiour vnto his) could not of right without his command determine any thing againſt Mutius a Spaniſh captain: And that therin his honor was empaired: for which if he had not a publique and honorable amends, he threatned by force of arms to redreſſe his wrong, and the league being broken, to carrie away with him the kings gallies. Neither wanted there ſome, who fauouring Don Iohn his quarrell, and angrie with the Venetians, layed ſtill more coles on the fire that was alreadie too great. Hereunto Venerius ſent word vnto the Generall, That he ſhould do well to moderat his anger, and at leiſure to aduiſe himſelfe, & better to vnderſtand the matter, ſo ſhould he plainly ſee, that there was neuer more iuſt or wholſome execution done vpon any, than vpon thoſe mutinous perſons: But if he, carried away with the heat of youth, ſhould attempt any more violent courſe than ſtood with the common quiet, it were not to be maruelled if hee afterward repented. He (as hee ſaid) was alſo in armes, and readie to ſhew himſelfe a man. The matter was growne to that heat, that it was not onely not farre from the breaking off of the league; but euen at the point to haue ſet all on a broile, and to haue put the whole fleet in danger: had not Columnius the Popes Admirall, againſt this

Mutius Tortona & his enſigne-bearer hanged.

Diſcention betwixt Don Iohn and Venerius the Venetian Admirall.

th[e] tempest oppoſed himſelfe: he with all his power laboured to cure the wounded mind of G th[e] Generall, and to appeaſe his anger: telling him, That the common enemy would hardly br[e]ſt withſtood by them al, being at vnitie and concord amongſt themſelues; but if vnto the forrai[ſ]ed anger were alſo ioyned domeſticall diſcord, then were the Chriſtian common-wealth vn[d]one. But if he would moderat his anger, and more regard the honor and credit of the Venetian Admirall, than the puniſhment of a ſeditious man, euen they which were vnto him friends, but enemies vnto the Venetians, would highly commend his moderation and ſtayed-neſſe: yea, whatſoeuer the matter was done, it could not be now vndone. But whatſoeuer Venerius had done was in his opinion iuſtly done: That it was alwaies ſo accounted and obſerued, that when many princes ioyned their forces together in matters that concerned the common managing of the war, nothing was to be done without the command of the Generall: but H in matters belonging to the priuat gouernement of euery mans regiment, euery Generall had power of life and death ouer them that were vnder his command: which to be ſo, was hee ſaid hereby to be vnderſtood. King Philip was king of many kingdoms, & that he might long ſo be, he heartily wiſhed: now if any Millanoies had committed any capitall crime within death in the kingdome of Naples, ſhould the iudgement of that crime be of right to be referred vnto the king himſelfe, as the chiefe ſoueraigne? or vnto the Gouernor of Millaine, where the offender was borne? or rather to the ciuill magiſtrat of Naples, in whoſe iuriſdiction the fault was committed, and ſo of right there to be executed? What difference was there then, but that Mutius might rightly ſeeme to haue beene iuſtly puniſhed by Venerius, who although I he were a Spaniſh captaine, had yet raiſed a mutinie in a Venetian gallie, which was vnder the command of the Venetian Admirall. Beſide that, the diſcipline of war ſometime required a ſeuere and exemplarie kind of puniſhment: for which cauſe it was both notably and truly ſaid of Clearchus, That a Generall ought more feared of his ſouldiers, than the enemy: and that amongſt the antient Romanes it was a cuſtome, euen for priuate men with more ſeuere puniſhment to reſtraine the fact of a friend, than the moſt cruell enemy: that the fact was not ſo much to be regarded, as the intention of him that did it: That it was the dutie of commanders to withſtand the madneſſe of the mutinous. The author of ſedition and tumult he ſaid had ſuffered but condigne puniſhment to his fact: who if he had eſcaped vnpuniſhed, would but haue bin the more diſordered; but now by his exemplarie puniſhment, would deter others from the like inſolencie. Beſides that, the externall danger was ſuch, as ought to reconcile K them, were they neuer ſo much enemies: That ſuch men as they were, ſhould aboue al things regard what might profit or hurt the common cauſe; in contemplation whereof all priuat iniu-ries were to be remitted: and the rather, for that the honor and diſhonour of the good or bad ſucceſſe of ſuch an important action ſhould redound vnto themſelues, but eſpecially vnto the Generall. His owne duty he had as he ſaid diſcharged, in dealing ſo plainly and faithfully with him, and could no more but pray vnto God, with mercifull eye to behold the troubled Chri-ſtian common-weale in ſuch a moſt dangerous time.

Don Iohn ſtill beareth a grudge againſt Venerius.

Thus was the mutinie at Paxo by the great labor of Columnius hardly appeaſed: neuerthe-leſſe Don Iohn could not afterwards indure to participat vnto Venerius his counſels, or ſo much as to come in his company: all was done by Barbadicus the Venetian Proueditor. This Barba- L Barbadicus the Venetian Proueditor a notable man.

dicus was not inferiour to Venerius in courage and valour, but far beyond him in diſcretion; a tall and goodly perſonage, well coloured, his beard grizie, though not for age, for why he was not aboue fiftie yeares old: beſides that, in his eyes and countenance appeared a viuacitie or liuelineſſe of ſpirit; in his very gate and comely motion of his bodie, hee carried a certaine grace and maieſtie: his talke and ſpeech was alwaies calme and temperate, his counſell graue and ſound; ſo that hee was both greatly honoured and beloued of all men: his chiefe endeauour alſo was, to further the hope of attonement betwixt the Spaniards and the Venetians, ſo well begun by Columnius. And ſo all things brought into ſome reaſonable tearmes, The Chriſtian fleet at Cephalenia.

they departed from Paxo, and came to Corcyra; the ſpoile whereof well declared the enemies late being there. From thence they departed to Cephalenia: where they by Letters M from Paul. Contarenus, Gouernour of Zacynthus, were aduertiſed, That the Turkes fleete of three hundred and three and thirtie ſaile, of one ſort or other, lay in the gulfe of Corinth, now called the gulfe of Lepanto. Whereupon they ſhortly after remooued, with purpoſe to haue gone to Petala, an hauen oppoſite ouer againſt the Iſlands (or rather rockes) called Echinades,

A Echinades, but now Corzulares, and ſo to the Bay of Corinth, to draw the enemie forth to battell: but ſtaied with contrary windes, they put backe againe into the valley of Alexandria, another Port in the Iſland of Cephalenia: from whence they afterward departed to the Iſlands Corzulares, where by the way they vnderſtood by letters out of Crete, That Famagûſta was loſt: with which bad newes they were no whit diſcouraged, but rather inflamed with the deſire of reuenge. From the Iſlands they went to Galanga, a good harbour, where they ſtayed one night, purpoſing the next day to haue gone to the mouth of the gulfe of Lepanto, there to dare the Turks to battell.

The Turkes Baſſaes Partau and Haly, who then lay in good ſafetie within the gulfe, hearing B of the approch of the Chriſtian fleet, began to conſult with the reſt of their moſt expert captains, Whether to giue the Chriſtians battell, or to keepe themſelues ſtill within their ſafe harbour: vpon which doubt they were amongſt themſelues of diuers opinions. Amongſt the reſt Chiroche a man of great yeares and authoritie, and withall a moſt noble captaine, exhorted the Baſſaes, in no caſe, when no need was, vpon a vaine glorie to aduenture all to the fortune of an vncertain battell: it was (as he ſaid) the part of wiſe and worthy commanders, to moderat with reaſon their happy fortunes, for that thereunto were incident many accidents whereby their former felicity might be diſgraced: they had already run alongſt the enemies coaſts, ſpoyled the frontiers of his countries, and were with much honor & greater ſpoile in ſafety returned, hauing increaſed the Turkiſh empire with many ſtrong townes of the enemies: the Iſland of C Cyprus was with wonderfull good fortune brought vnder the Turks obeiſance, the enemies great prouiſion at ſea fruſtrated, in ſuch ſort, as that hauing loſt diuers of their gallies, they were neuer yet able to draw their ſwords: they had with their fleet at their pleaſure romed vp and downe the Adraticke, & diſplayed their victorious enſignes almoſt vnto the very citie of Venice. What could they then deuiſe or wiſh for more honourable or glorious, than with the ſafety of their fleet, yea without any loſſe at all, to haue performed ſo great matters? Now the three generall commanders of the enemies fleet to be ſo at diſcord among themſelues, as that they were ready to fall in ſunder of themſelues; who now vpon the approch of Winter, & for want of victuall, muſt needs in few daies return home with their fleet, neuer after to meet again with the like ſtrength at ſea: and therefore to what purpoſe were it, by force of armes and vn-D certaine battell, with danger to ſeeke for the ſoueraigntie & command of the ſea, which would forthwith of it ſelfe without any danger fall vnto them? Neither ſhould they by the doubt-full victorie ſo much increaſe their honour, as by the vncertaine euent of a battell blemiſh the fame, if any thing ſhould fall out otherwiſe than well. And that therefore they ſhould do well to take heed, that in ſeeking to augment their former victories, they hazarded not their honor already gained; but wholeſomely delay the war, and keep themſelues in ſafety with their fleet within the gulfe, and not to goe out at the enemies pleaſure, but when they ſhould ſee good themſelues, at ſuch time as the enemy was not ſo well prouided: ſo ſhould they (as hee ſaid) without any great labour or danger attaine to the full of their owne deſires.

Chiroche diſſuadeth the Baſſaes from giuing battel vnto the Chriſtians Partau Baſſa ſtandeth indifferent for giuing or not giuing battell.

Partau Baſſa was of opinion, That the Chriſtians would not at all offer him battell: which E opinion the Chriſtians had alſo of him: and in this queſtion, for giuing or not giuing of battel, ſeemed neither to approue nor diſſlike that Chiroche had ſo gravely ſpoken, but as a man indifferent & loth to incurre any blame, ſhewed himſelfe ready either to ſtay or to ſet forward, as ſhould be thought beſt by the greater part. But Haly Baſſa, a man of an hoter ſpirit, and the great champiõ of the Turks, could not indure to heare of any delay, but of preſent battel. The plea-ſure of Selymus, the hope of victory, the remembrance of the diſpleaſure Piali Baſſa had the laſt yeare incurred, for not giuing the Chriſtians battell, induced him now in no caſe to refuſe bat-tel, but forthwith to go out of the gulfe, & to accept therof, if it were offred. In which his opinion he was the more confirmed by the relation of Caracoza a famous pyrat, and of great account among the Turks: who in a ſwift galliot taking view of the Chriſtian fleet, had reported F it to be much leſſe than indeed it was; deceiued as was afterward thought, by not taking full view therof, by reaſon of his poſting haſt; or els blinded by the Iſland, which lying behind the fleet, ſuffered him not perfectly to deſcry the ſame. Vpon which report there was great reioycing, amongſt the Turks, who now after their accuſtomed manner dreamed of nothing but victory & ſpoile. So that Haly, vainly perſuaded that his fleet was both the greater and ſtronger, would now needs fight, in hope that the Chriſtians vpon firſt ſight of the Turks fleet would

The right wing was by the appointment of the Bassa's command... Mahomet Bey with fiftie six gallies, with whome were also many worthie Captaines; and in the left wing was Vluzales the old Arch-pyrat, but now the Vice-Roy of Algiers, with ninetie fiue Gallies, accompanied with Caraiolo and Arabey his two sonnes, with a multitude of pyrats, men of his owne profession, but most valiant and expert souldiours. In the reereward came Amurates Dragut, with thirtie Gallies, and diuers other small vessels.

The great and notable battell betweene the Turks and the Christians, commonly called, The battell of Lepanto.

Now was the day well spent, when both the fleets were readie to giue battell; the Enemie still comming on almost in the same order that the Christians did: for their middle battel came directly against our middle battel, and their wings against ours. So the signal of battel on both sides giuen by the shooting off of certain great pieces: the Turks after their manner comming on with an hideous cry, first light vpon the six galeasses, which lying at anchor almost a mile before the fleet, as most strong bulwarks, out of their forecastles poured out their murthering shot vpon the Turks, now come within their danger; and in their passing by so plagued them, by discharging their whole broad sides, first the one, and eftsoons the other vpon them, that hauing receiued great losse, and diuers of their gallies sunke, they were inforced to breake their order, and to fall further off. Which so much the more troubled the Turkes, for that they had before supposed, those great c... ...nseruiceable ships (as they accounted of them) to haue caried little or no great ordnanc... ...after the maner of their gallies: for the vse of the galeasses was not vnto the Turks k... ...ll how that they had receiued from them most notable harme: which as it was the beginning of their misery, so was it vnto the Christians of greatest importance for the gaining of the victorie. At which time also the wind, which al that day had much fauoured the Turkes, was now (God no doubt fighting his owne battell) come about to the West, and with a pleasant gale in the time of the fight carried the smoke of the great ordnance vpon the Turks, to their no small disaduantage. Yet for all this losse and disorder in their fleet, the fierce enemie with wonderfull pertinacie passing by these galleasses, quickly repaired again to their places, & made good their disordred squadrons, and with al their force assailed the Christian fleet. The trumpets, drums, & other instruments of warre had scarcely wel sounded, when all shook with confused cries, flames of fire, thundring of artillery, and other noise of the mariners & seamen: wherwith many were so astonied as if they had bin both deaf and blind, hauing vpon the sudden almost lost the vse both of their sight & hearing. At which very instant a man might haue seen the whole showers as it were of arrows and darts mixt with the deadly shot, flying from the one fleet to the other; the masts broken, the saile-yards strucke downe, the tackles rent, and all confused with horror and feare. Haly beholding the Admiral gally (which was easie to be known by the flag) & vsing the surpassing cheerfulnes of his mariners & rowers, ran vpon her with such violence as if he would haue presently stemmed her: but being with like force incountred by the Admiral, they met together with such violence, that both their beaks were with the seaze broken off, and so fel into the sea. There began a most cruell fight betwixt these two great commanders, who had before drawne vnto them the strongest gallies in their fleets, and the choisest men in their armies. In the Admirall gallie of the Christians were 400 select men pickt out of the whole army, most of them Captains & Antients, men of approued valor; who not only valiantly repulsed the furious enemies, but with greater courage inforced them to shrinke backe, and pressing hard vpon them, entred the gallie euen to the main mast; where the enemy strengthned with new supply, fought courageously, repulsed the Spaniards, and cleered again their gallie. Many were there wounded on both sides, and many slain. Don Iohn seeing his men gi... ...way, sent in new supply; wherewith the other encouraged, bestirred themselues more lus... ...an before, and hardly charge the Turks, who with like hope and like courage encounter them. The battell was like vnto the ebbing

A ebbing and flowing of the sea: thrice the Turks were driuen euen vnto the maine mast, and thrice strengthned with new supplies, they with great slaughter repulsed the Christians back againe.

Venerius perceiuing the danger of the General, was about to haue assailed the poupe of Haly his gallie, so to haue indangered her, being set vpon both before and abathe: but in comming thither he was incountred by Partau the other Bassa, who with a companie of gallies opposed himselfe against him, and that with such celeritie, that hauing made shew as if he would haue charged him afront, he by and by set vpon his side. Which vnexpected manner of fight so suddenly fashioned, at the first much troubled the Christians; who afterward gathering courage, notably defended themselues. Venerius (vpon whose valor the Venetian State rested) gallantly B armed, not only incouraged his men, one while with intreating, another while with threatning, but was himself in the midst of them fighting; whose great honor much moued the mindes of his soldiers, but his reuerend yeres more; to see him (being aboue 77 yeres old) to performe all the parts of a braue youthful commander, in the very face of the greatest danger. The fierce enemy hauing slaine many of the Christians, pressed on more furiously, & fighting close together, entred the prow of Venerius his gally now bared of defendants, and with their multitude rather than true valor oppressed the Venetians: who had there no dout bin ouercome, had not Ioannes Lauretanus and Catherinus Malipetra, two valiant captains, and lying not far off, speedily come to their reliefe. By whose comming in, the fight was in the turning of an hand quite al- C tered; so that they which a little before fiercely assailed the Venetian gallies, were now glad to defend their owne: so for a space the fight stood indifferent, but in processe of the battell, those two worthie captaines, whilest they also performe the parts of most resolute souldiers, were both slain; shot through with smal shot. The fall of these notable men did rather enrage than discourage the minds of their soldiers; so that blinded as it were with fury, and suddenly become other men, they desperatly pressed in vpon the Turks: so that whilest they on the one side kill and wound them, and Venerius more hardly chargeth them on the other; the terrour of the battell was turned from them that were euen at the point to haue been vanquished, vpon the victors; and our men after great slaughter of the Turks, tooke two of their gallies: Partau the Bassa in a long boat escaped the danger, and so got him out of the battell. Not farre off D thence, Columnius the Popes Admirall, as a valiant Chiefetaine hardly assailed other of the Turks gallies, and made amongst them great slaughter: one singled from the rest, he tooke, and disordred the other. Lignius the Admirall of Genoa with like courage thrust himselfe into the thickest of the enemies, and there made a notable fight. Many an enemie fell about the Prince of Parma, Rueres, Vrsinus, Cornea, and Iustinianus; who for their present honor, and future fame, fought most couragiously.

Lauretanus & Malipetra slaine.

At which time Chiroche or Sirocke (of some called Mahomet Bey) with his right wing with great confidence came forward against the left wing of the Christian fleet; but falling before he was aware into the danger of the galleasses, was from out of them miserably beaten with the great ordnance, hauing many of his men slaine, and diuers of his gallies sunke and torn, few E of the hugie and deadly shot falling in vaine into the sea, by reason of the thicke standing of the Turks gallies: where also diuers of the enemies were burnt with pots of wildfire cast into their gallies out of the tops of the galeasses. Chiroche to auoid the danger of the galeasses, & to shun the dangerous shelfe betwixt him and the main (which the riuer Achelous running betweene the borders of Acarnania and Ætolia, and there falling into the sea, maketh) sent a great part of his gallies vnder the conduct of one Alis a notable renegat of Genoa, to cast about aloofe vpon the right hand, and so to come vpon the backe of Barbadicus the leader of the left wing of the Christian fleet. Which he perceiuing, forthwith turned his gallies, and with their prows receiued the first onset. The great ordnance first on both sides discharged, diuers of the gallies grapled fast together, in such sort, as that they incountred one another not with their missiue weapons onely (as with their small shot, arrowes, and darts) but with their drawne swords foot to F foot. Amongst the rest, the fight of two of the Christian gallies was most notable; in the one was Barbadicus himselfe, in the other Marcus Ciconia, vpon whom fell six of the enemies Gallies, and vpon Barbadicus fiue: who although they were on euery side distressed with a most doubtfull and dangerous fight, yet did they most valiantly with worthie resolution endure the same. In the furie of this battell, Barbadicus encouraging his souldiers, and fighting himselfe euen there where most danger was, was hit in the left eye with an arrow, and so strucke into G [illegible] vine almost through the head: wherewith falling presently downe, he was taken vp for d[illegible] howbeit he died not thereof vntill three dayes after. The supposed death of this worth[illegible] much troubled the Christians, and both the armies felt his fall (such force there is in the [illegible]r of one worthie man) for the Turks now as conquerours lustily boorded the galley, troubled with the losse of the Captaine; and the Venetians as men discouraged gaue way: the galley had there vndoubtedly beene lost, had not Federicus Nanius and Sylutius Porcia with their gallies speedily c[illegible]me to her relefe: by whose comming in such an altoration was made, as that the galley be[illegible]alfe taken, was not only cleered, but diuers of the Turks gallies also boorded, and som[illegible]hem taken, not without the great slaughter of the Turkes. In this so hard and mortall a conflict, Sylutius was grieuously wounded in the thigh and in his right side. H The death of Barbadicus. It is reported of Barbadicus, That lying that euening at the point of death, the battell then ended, he like another Epaminondas, asked which part had got the victorie: and being told that the Christians had got it, and that the Turkes fleet was most part taken, and the rel[illegible] or burnt; he with his eyes cast vp to heauen, gaue vnto God immortall thanks therefore, [illegible] not long after joyfully departed this life, to liue in blisse for euer.

Ciconia hardly beset, and in danger to haue been lost, is relieued. Ciconia in the meane time hardly beset with six of the enemies gallies, (as we haue before said) was himselfe sore burnt with wild-fire and hurt in the face; and hauing endured a long and terrible fight, was now euen at the point to haue been lost; when sudden relefe comming in, he was now contrarie to all hope saued, and therewith so much encouraged, that with his wearie and wounded souldiers, as men from death reuiued, he afresh charged the enemie, and I tooke one of his principall gallies, with one of the Turks faireſt ensignes, which in the Venetian Armorie is yet there to be seene: of his worthy valour, his honest wounds in his face and the fore part of his bodie, were m[illegible] certaine and vndoubted witnesses.

A hard fight betweet Io. Contarenus and Chiroche. Not far off, in the same wi[illegible] Contarenus [illegible]honourable and valiant gentleman, did with his great shot exceeding grea[illegible] ong[illegible] Turkes gallies: which Chiroche perceiuing, and therewith inraged, ran so [illegible] [illegible]e of Contarenus his gallie, that with his beake he had wel neere stemmed her; & presently [illegible]apling fast with her, was like to haue borded her: whom neuertheleſſe the Christians notably repulsed, with greater slaughter than was thought possible for so small a number to haue made: neither did the enemies fal vnreuenged, but all imbrued with the bloud of the Christians. Seldome hath bin seene a more cruel fight, K or more resolute Captaines to incounter hand to hand. But after the battell had of long time stood doubtfull, the hope of the Christians increased vpon two causes, for which the courage of the enemy quailed: first for that many of the Turkes being slaine or wounded, they were brought to a smal number; then for that both parties saw Chiroche himselfe slaine: from which time the enemy, aswel destitute of a leader to conduct th[illegible], as of fresh supplies to relieue them, began to be cut down right, or taken. Which their danger was the more increased, because the gally bulged with the great shot, was now leake, & in danger to sinke: wherefore the Turks in that wing ouercome with dispaire, began to thinke rather how to saue themselues by flight than by fight, reposing their trust in nothing more than in the neernes of the main. But as they were turning about toward the shore, they were preuented by the Christians: who entring the L thing, but halfe dead; and seeing smal hope of his life, with fresh wounds made an end of him.

A hard and doubtfull battell. Diuers and doubtfull was the whole face of the battell: as fortune offered vnto euery man his enemy, so he fought; according as euery mans disposition put into him courage or feare, or as he met with mo or fewer enemies, so was there here and there sometime victorie, and sometime losse. Many fights were in sundrie places seene mingled together: some gallies whiles they run to stem others, are themselues by others stemmed: some, which you would thinke were flying away, falling by fortune vpon one victorious gallie or other, suddenly take them: other some, as if they had been of neither part, row vp and downe betwixt the battells.
The chance of war in one place lifteth vp the vanquished, and in another ouerthroweth the vi- M ctorious: all was full of terror, error, sorrow, and confusion. And albeit that fortune had not yet determined which way to incline, yet the Christians at length began to appeare much superior both in courage and strength: and the Turks seemed now rather to defend themselues, than to assaile their enemies.

A Bacianus in the rereward intentiuely marked all the whole fight, and euer as need required, sent in present aid, without respect whether they were the Popes gallies, the king of Spaines, or the Venetians, that were distressed. In this long and terrible fight it chanced, that the Turks seeing the Christian Generals gallie hardly charged on the prow by Haly Bassa, to be almost bared of defendants in the poupe, all the soldiers hauing their hands full before, were about to haue boorded her abathe, and to that purpose were fetching a compasse about her: Which Ba- cianus quickly perceiuing, glistering in bright armour came speedily in with certaine gallies, and by opposing of himselfe against them, staied their course. In all the battell was not seene a more cruell fight; for hauing discharged many volleys of shot, and arrowes and darts without number, they grapled at length together, and came to the sword, where with the formost, Baci- B anus not only with words, but with his presence and valour wonderfully encouraged his soldiers, hauing receiued in his targuet of proofe two small shot. Many were on both sides slain.
The Spaniards attempting sundrie times to haue entred the Turks gallies, were with great losse repulsed: but not giuing it so ouer, neither giuing the enemie leaue to breath, or so much as to looke behind him, valor was vanquished by pertinacie, and the Spaniards hauing ouerthrown and slaine their enemies, enioyed their gallies.

A terrible fight betwixt Haly Bassa and Don Iohn. Now had Don Iohn with like courage and strength, but with doubtful victory, fought three houres and more with Haly Bassa: when after so dreadfull and dangerous a fight, and many a deadly wound on both parts giuen and receiued, our men began to faint, and brought to the vttermost of their deuoire, were in danger to haue bin ouercome, had not Don Iohn betaken C himselfe vnto his onely and last refuge. He had (as is before said) reserued vnder the hatches 400 of his best and select soldiers, for their valor chosen out of the whole army against all the euents of so long and dangerous a battell: these men attentiuely attending euery becke of Don Iohn, vpon signe giuen, as was before appointed, suddenly start out, and with a terrible crie and desperat onset assailed the enemie, before almost spent with labor and wounds. This fresh and vnexpected company so suddenly grown vp, first astonned, and afterwards confounded, & with Haly Bassa slain a great slaughter vanquished the Turks, and possessed the gallie. The Bassa deadly wounded in the head with a shot, and all imbrued with bloud, was taken, and as a joyfull spectacle brought to Don Iohn; who seeing him readie to breathe his last, commanded him to be dispoiled of his armor, and his head strucke off. Which presently set vpon the point of a speare, he for a space D held vp aloft with his owne hand, as a trophie of his victorie, as also with the sight thereof to strike a terror into the minds of the other Turkes, who in the other gallies fast by fought yet right valiantly: neither was he therein deceiued; for the Turks beholding the knowne countenance of the Bassa their late General, and a flag of the crosse set vp in the top of his gally, and The Turkish mid-dle battell discomfited. the noise of the Christians, crying Victorie, running thorow the army; were therewith so discouraged, that confounded with feare they turned their gallies and with might and main made toward the land, which was not much more than a mile off. Which Canalis and Quirinus, yet breathing with the late slaughter of the Turkes, perceiuing, with their gallies hardly pursued the flying enemie, and sunke and tooke diuers of their gallies. Partaw his son by the staying of the rest got time to run his gallie on ground, and so forsaking her, saued himselfe and his men E by running ashore: so did also diuers others run themselues aground and forsake their gallies, which presently became a prey vnto the Christians. In this hot conflict Caracoza the famous Caracoza the famous pyrat slaine. pyrat (who abiuring the Christian religion, had turned Turke, and of long time done exceding much mischiefe vpon the coasts of the Christian countries) valiantly fighting, was slaine by Buzzacharinus of Padua, by whose death many were deliuered of a great feare.

Haly Bassa had brought forth with him his two sons Achmat and Mahomet, the one 23 yeares old, and the other 13, the nephews of the great Emperor Selymus, by his sister married to Haly; them their father had placed in a great gallie, with a strong guard of the Ianizaries: who seeing the discomfiture of the maine battel, with the danger now drawing neere vnto themselues, were exceedingly affraid, and therefore to saue themselues, thought it best with all speed to F make toward the maine. But in so doing they were preuented by Requisenius the great Commendor, who with his furious Spaniards bourding the Turkes, alreadie dismaied and running away, slew of them a great number; and after a great fight and much cruell execution done, tooke the gallie, and that which pleased him more, the two sonnes of Haly both aliue: in the time of which fight, the poore Christians who fast chained in the gallie, had as slaues long serued

ed in great misery; now perceiuing the Christians to preuaile, brake off their gyues, loosed G r other, and with such weapons as first came to hand lustily laid about them, and notably the victorie.

ithstanding all this good successe, the fortune of the battell stood yet doubtful in the right wing. There stood in either battell two of the most noble chieftains one against another: on the Christian part Iohn Andreas Auria the Spanish Admiral; and for the Turks Vluzales: both most valiant & expert commanders, wel known the one to the other, for that they had of long vsed the same seas, ec all for their military discipline, as also for their noble acts, but far vne-quall for number of gallies: for the Turks had of one sort & other almost twice so many.
The doubtfull dying of Iohn Andreas Auria with the right wing of the Christian fleet. Auria, whether it wer or that he would in the beginning of the battel warily decline the dan- H ger, and not hazard his gallies, wherein his chiefe honor would be also indangered; or else affraid lest the enemy, who far exceeded him in number of gallies, should extend his wing at large, and inclose the Christian fleet behind; vpon the signall of battell giuen, shrun ther off from the rest of the battel: but whether vpon policy, that it might be at his choise ner to fight, if the rest of the army preuailed; or to retire if they should be ouercome; or that he vpon martial policy declined the force of too strong an enemy; diuers men diuersly glosed: but what the cause was indeed, the wisest could not surely tell. Howsoeuer the matter stood, it seemed his purpose was by policy to counteruaile what he wanted in strength. This his falling off seemed vnto the Turks most strange, to whom his quick departure seemed at the first in maner of a flight. Neither was Auria content with that space he had first seperated himself from the ar- I mie; but the second time fell off further, and there staying & houering aloofe off, seemed to await some good opportunity to take the enemy at some aduantage: hauing in the meane time one of the galeasses of Pisa lying before him, as it were in stead of a bulwark, which with often shot much troubled the enemy ales also extending his wing, tooke such a space, as that he seemed able to haue compassed in ded Auria; yet offered not battel, but rather lay as expecting if any aduantage should be m! he Christians, than rashly or vnaduisedly Twelue of the Venetian gallies taken by Vluzales. to offer himself or his galies to any desper ger. He had not long so lien, but that according to his desire, 12 of the Venetian gallies, which had withdrawn themselues from Auria, & without any order or direction romed to and fro, fell into his danger: these gallies cut off from the rest, Vluzales with wonderfull celerity inclosed, and with the multitude of his gallies bording K them one by one, slew the defendants, and tooke the gallies. In this fight many of the knights of the Order of S. Stephen most valiantly fighting were slain. Benedictus Superantius a noble Venetian, seeing most part of his men slain, himselfe mortally wounded, and his gally now almost taken; resoluing rather presently to die, than to fall into the hands of his enemies, desperatly put fire to the store of pouder he had in the gally, and blew vp himselfe, his soldiers that were left, with a great number of the enemies together. The report of the great ordnance, and noise of the battel in that part of the fleet being heard, they which had now in the middle battel got the victorie, together turned their gallies thitherwards to aid Auria, but not in one squadron A notable fight of the Knights of Malta. together, but comming along one after another, as euery man had sooner or later cleered himselfe of his enemie: amongst the rest, Petrus Iustinianus (Admirall of the gallies of Malta) com- L ming formost, was incountred with three of the Turks gallies, with whom he with his knights had a great and most terrible fight. Which Vluzales beholding, and aboue all others hating the knights of the Order, speedily sent in other three gallies to helpe their fellows. So Iustinian hardly beset with six gallies, and oppressed with the multitude of his enemies, had lost fiftie of his most valiant knights, with one of his ensignes, and with much adoo hardly defended himselfe. But being now brought to the last cast, and the gally in the iudgment of all men giuen for lost, lo two other of the gallies of Malta, who had so valiantly fought with other three of the enemies gallies, that they were now vpon point to haue taken them all, seeing the danger of their Admiral, forsooke their vanquished enemies, & with all speed came to rescue him: where they found him yet aliue, but shot in with three arrowes, and still fighting couragiously at the decke of his gally, with those few he had yet left, beset round with their enemies: but by the M comming in of these two gallies, as if it had bin by help sent from heauen, the Turks were no-Vluzales flieth. tably repulsed, and the Admiral with his gally rescued prey out of the mouth of the greedie Lyon. Vluzales vnderstanding that the maine batte right wing of the fleet was ouer-throwne by the Christians; for feare gaue ouer the fight, and leauing the gallies he had taken
and

A and hoising saile, was the first in that wing that fled. Which Cardonius perceiuing, who was come in before the rest, suddenly shewed himselfe at his backe, and by assailing the hinderm ost gallies, did what he might to stay their flight vntil the rest of the victorious gallies were come in. But whilest he so eagerly pursueth the flying enemy, fifteen of the Turks captaines inraged with such an vnwonted disgrace, and mindfull of their wonted prowesse, staid their flight, and contrary to the expectation of the Christians, turned themselues and renewed the battell.
What minds they bare, the euent shewed; for in a trice almost all Cardonius his souldiers and mariners were slaine: nothing letted the taking of the gallie, but that Vluzales seeing Don Iohn, Columnius, and Venerius neere at hand, and making towards him, and Auria also comming fast B on, was afraid longer to stay, and therefore gluing ouer the fight, fled as fast as hee could: yet carrying away with him one gallie of Cyprus, and one ensigne of the knights of Malta, as testimonies of his own valor when he should appeare before Selymus. The Christians although The christians hardly pursue the flying enemy.
weary of the long fight which they had almost by the space of fiue houres indured, yet so long as they were in any hope so ouertake any of their flying enemies, hardly pursued them in chase: but when they perceiued it preuailed not to follow farther, and that it was more than time to see to their wearie and wounded souldiers and mariners, they staied from farther pursuit, for why the night came now fast on, vnder the couert whereof the craftie old pyrat flying for life with sailes and oares, escaped with thirtie (or as some write, fortie) gallies againe into the bay of Lepanto.

C It was a right horrible spectacle to see, how in this battell the sea stained with bloud, & co-uered with dead bodies, weapons, and the fragments of the broken gallies; besides the great number of them that were slain, & beaten into the sea: many of the Turks blinded with feare, casting away their weapons, to escape the fury of the enemy, threw themselues headlong into the sea; but finding no hope to recouer the land, laboured againe to come to the gallies; or els fainting by the way, were miserably drowned. Others, either halfe dead, weake, and vnskilfull of swimming, or ouercharged with their armour, the sea also deuoured: yea many that could well swim, wearied and wounded, sunke for feare. Others vpon plankes and the pieces of the broken gallies, fought to saue themselues, and not knowing what to follow or what to shun, wofully perished. Other some swimming, and pitifully intreating their enemies, rather to take D them prisoners than to kill them, were (as it often times chanceth where things are done vpon choler, rather than vpon discretion) without compassion slaine: in which doing, the Christians thought they did rather reuenge former iniuries to them done, than to do them any wrong: with some mercie more preuailed than wrath; who remembring the common chance of war, chose rather to take the Turkes prisoners (wofully crauing nothing but their liues) than without mercie to kil them. The number of the Turks lost in this most famous battell, could hard-be known, by reason that many of them were drowned. Antonius Guarnerius writing the histo- The number of the Turks slain in the battell of Lepanto, diuersly reported.
rie of this war, reporteth two & thirty thousand to haue perished: but they which write more sparingly thereof, reported not past halfe so many to haue bin slaine: of whom these were of greatest name: Haly Bassa the Generall, Mahomet Bey (otherwise called Chiroche or Sirocus) E Gouernor of Alexandria, Cassanes the sonne of Barbarussa, with his sonne Malamur Gouernour of Mytilene; Gider Gouernor of Chios, Cassambeius Gouernour of the Rhodes, Proni Aga captaine of Nauplium, Mustapha Zelibi the great Treasurer, Caracoza the famous pyrat; with many others, whom but to name were tedious. The chiefe prisones there taken, were Achmat & Ma- homet the sonnes of Haly Bassa, both afterwards sent as Presents to the Pope, of whom the eldest died by the way at Naples; the younger presented vnto the Pope by Columnius at Rome, was there honorably kept prisoner: and Mechmet Bey, Gouernor of Euboea; and about three thousand fiue hundred others were in that battell taken also. The chiefe of them that escaped by flight, were Partau Bassa, who seeing all go to wracke, fled in time in a long boat to land: and Vluzales, who (as it was afterwards certainly knowne) but with fiue and twentie gallies, and ten tie sunke or burnt: and of galliots and other small vessels were taken about sixtie. The Admi-rall gallie then taken amongst the rest, was so goodly and beautifull a vessell, that for beautie and richnesse scarce any in the whole Ocean was comparable vnto her. The decke of this gally was on both sides thrice as great as any of the others, & made all of blacke Walnut-tree like histories. There was also in her diuers liuely counterfeits, engrauen and wrought with gold, G with so cunning hand, that for the magnificence thereof it might well haue bin compared vnto the princes palace. The cabbin glistered in euery place with rich hangings wrought with gold and set with diuers sorts of precious stones, with certaine small counterfeits most cunningly wrought. Besides this, there was also found in her great store of the Bassaes rich ap-parell, wrought with the needle, so curiously and richly embossed with siluer and gold, that his great lord and master Selymus himselfe could hardly put on more royall or rich attire. His casket there also found with six thousand duckats in it, with a yerely pension of three hundred duckats, was giuen in reward to a Greeke, borne in Macedonia, which slew the Bassa, and was therefore also knighted by Don Iohn: who had also giuen vnto him the Burrell of the Turkes standerd, which at his returne to Venice (where he had of long time before dwelt, and serued H in the Arsenall) he sold vnto a goldsmith: whereof the Senat hauing intelligence, redeemed it of the goldsmith, paying for euery ounce a duckat, and layed it vp amongst the trophees of that most famous victorie. It was all of massiue siluer, guilt & engrauen round about with turkish letters. On the one side was written, God doeth conduct and adorne the faithfull in worthie enterprises: God doth fauour Mahomet. On the other side, God hath no other God, and Mahomet is his Prophet.

The Greek that slew the Bassa, honourably rewarded.

This notable victorie thus happily obtained, Don Iohn the Generall, with Venerius and Co- lumna, the other two Admirals, came together; whom the Generall friendly embraced, but especially Venerius, calling him father, & attributing vnto him the greatest part of the victory.
Afterwards, all together with their hands and eyes cast vp towards heauen, they vpon their I knees gaue immortall thanks to Almightie God. So did also the rest of the captaines and masters, commending one another for their braue and good seruice: but especially theirs, who for their religion and countrey had there honourably spent their liues; which were in number about 7566. Amongst whom, the chiefe men that were slaine, were Iob. and Bernardinus, of the honourable familie of Cordona in Spaine, Horatius Caraffa, and Ferantes Ballus. Virginius, and Horatius, noble Romanes, of the honourable Familie of the Vrsini. Of the Venetian Nobilitie, Augustinus Barbadicus, Benedictus Superantius, Vincentius Quirinus, Ioannes Lau- retanus, Marinus Contarenus, Catherinus Malipetra, Georgius and Anareas Barbadicus, Mar- cus Antonius Landus, Franciscus Bonus, Hieronimus Contarenus, Antonius Paschaligus, Hieroni- mus Venerius, all of the order of the Senatours. Besides diuers other honourable Gentlemen, K who well deserued to be enrolled in the eternall monuments of Fame. Of the knights of Malta were also many slaine, amongst whom of the Germane Nation these were chiefe: Ioachim Spart, Commendour of Moguntia and Franckfort, Ro. of Hambergh, Commendour of Hemmendorf, and Fra. Droit. Of them that were wounded, these were of greatest name: Don Iohn the Generall, Venerius the Venetian Admirall shot through the foot, Paulus Iordanus, Troilus Sauell, and Mar. Molinus, with diuers others of lesse fame, to the number of almost seuen thousand.

The number of Christians slaine in the battell of Lepanto.

Great was the ioy conceiued of this victory, but to none more welcome, than to the poore Christians fast chained to the Turks gallies, of whom twelue thousand were thereby deliue-red from most miserable thraldome, and contrary to al hope restored to their antient liberty. L Two daies after this victorie, Venerius sent Humfredus Iustinianus with newes thereof vnto the Senat at Venice: who comming in at the Adriaticke port about noone the 19 of October, by shooting off of certain great pieces, gaue warning vnto the city of his comming, which at that time hung in a great suspence betwixt hope and feare. The citizens generally awaked with the report of the great ordnance, came flocking by heapes to the port, euery man longing to heare the first newes. There they might see Iustinian comming a far off with his gallie, but when he was come neerer, they might perceiue all the mariners attired like Turkes, & foure of the Turkes enfignes hanging behind at the poupe of the gallie, which filled their mindes with the hope of good newes, deeming it to be (as indeed it was) part of the spoyle of the enemie. But after that Iustinian was landed (which he had much to doe for the preasse) and was M gone to the court, with a world of people following after him, crying out for newes; and had there deliuered his letters, and at large discoursed of all the successe of the battell (which was forthwith blowne into the Citie) and that the messengers also after his departure had reported the victorie, and that the enemy was in a great battell ouerthrowne: good God, how

A generall reioycing, especially in Venice, for the victorie.

A the people as men ouerioyed, ran vp and downe the streets, doubling and redoubling the ioyfull name of victory. The Senatours also reioycing together, gaue thanks to God with publick praiers and ioyfull hymnes in euery Church: and afterwards by ringing of bels, peals of ordnance, bone-fires, and other such like things, shewed al the tokens of ioy possible. And to make this ioy the more generall, all prisoners were set at libertie, and all debts that exceeded not the summe of fiue and twentie crownes, payed out of the common treasurie; which was generally done through all the Venetian seigniorie: and a decree made, That that day wheron the victory was gotten, which was the seuenth of October, dedicated to the memoriall of Iu- stina, should for euer be kept holy day: and for the perpetuall remembrance thereof, a great masse of money was coyned, with the impression of Iustana vpon it, and an inscription decla-B ring the victorie. Many also their neighbor Princes sent their Embassadors congratulatorie to Venice; namely, the Dukes of Sauoy, Florence, Ferrara, Parma, Mantua, and Vrbin, and the Knights of Malta. In which so publicke ioy no man was seene to put on any mourning garments, or to shew any token of heauinesse, although many had lost their deerest friends & nee-rest kinsmen; whose liues they reckoned not lost, but giuen vnto the Christian common weale.
The like reioycing was also made in Rome, in Spaine, Naples, Sicilia, and Malta; especially at such times as Embassadors from their neighbor Princes, came to ioy them of this victorie: yea and afterwards in other countries further off was like reioycing and signes of ioy, as with vs here in England.

This is that notable battell, commonly called the battell of Lepanto, fought neere vnto the C Iland Curzolari, the seuenth day of October, in the yeare 1571, the like whereof was neuer fought at sea against the Turke, wherein he lost his chiefe strength at sea, with most of his best sea captains: and might thereby well perceiue what he and his successors were to feare, if the Christian Princes at vnitie amongst themselues, all discord set apart, should in zeale of their religion ioyne their inuincible forces against them.

A wittie and fit comparison made by a Turke to shew that the losse of Cyprus was greater than the losse of the battell at Lepanto.

In the middest of all this ioy, generally conceiued of the late victory, one of the chiefe prisoners of the Turks, hearing it compared with the losse of Cyprus (for that Selymus had therin lost his fleet, his best men of war, with great store of ordnance) by a fit comparison shewed it not to be so, saying, That the battell lost, was vnto Selymus as if a man should shaue his beard, which would ere long grow again; but that the losse of Cyprus was vnto the Venetians, as the D losse of an arme, which once cut off, could neuer be againe recouered. Declaring thereby the great inequalitie of the losse.

The spoile of the enemy diuided amongst the confederats.

The rich spoyle taken from the enemie in this most glorious victorie, was thus diuided amongst the princes confederat. Vnto the Pope were allotted 19 gallies, two galliots, nine great pieces of ordnance, two and forty lesser pieces, and fourescore and one prisoners. Vnto the king of Spaine eight and fiftie gallies and an halfe, six galliots and an halfe, eight and fifty great pieces and an halfe, eight great murthering pieces & an halfe, an hundred twenty eight lesser pieces, and a thousand seuen hundred and thirteen prisoners. Vnto the Venetians were assigned for their share, nine and thirty gallies and an halfe, foure galiots and an halfe, nine and thirtie great pieces and an halfe, fiue great murthering pieces and a halfe, fourescore and six lesser pieces, E and a thousand one hundred threescore and two prisoners. The rest were bestowed vpon such other princes as had giuen aid, or otherwise well deserued in that seruice.

The ioy conceiued of this victorie was not so great amongst the Christians, but that the sorrow thereof was amongst the Turks far greater. Selymus himselfe was then at Hadrianople, where eight dayes after the battel, news was brought vnto him, That his fleet was ouerthrown and almost all taken or sunke by the Christians. Which so soone as he heard, he was stricken with exceeding griefe: and ouercome with melancholy, would not that day suffer any man to speake with him. And the rumor of the ouerthrow still increasing, had in short time filled all places with feare, teares, mourning, and heauinesse: some bewailing their parents, some their children, some their husbands, some their friends or kinsmen, there lost. But that which most F grieued the Turkish Emperor, was the losse of so many worthy & expert captains, of so many skilfull masters and notable souldiers; who brought vp all their liues at sea, were not thought inferior to any then liuing: besides the perpetuall ignominie and vnwonted disgrace, thereby inflicted vnto him and his posteritie for euer. Wherefore full of wrath and indignation, he was about to haue commanded all the Christians in his dominions (in number infinit) to be put to death:

death. Doubting indeed nothing more, than that they wearie of the Turkish thraldome, and C desirous of innouation, should with weapons put into their hands, rise vp against him, and take with the other Christians his enemies. But whilest the other Bassaes (as men dismaid with the greatnesse of the command) stood all silent, Muhamet Bassa for his former deserts in great fauor with the tyrant, thought it good to make proofe if his fury might by reasonable persuasion be mitigated, and some better course taken, both for the honor of Selymus himselfe, and the common good of the State: yet well knowing how full of danger it was, in that tyrannicall gouernment, openly to speake any thing contrary to the good liking of the wilfull Emperour, he durst not apertly contradict him: but leaning as it were to his opinion and pleasure, by little and little to draw him from himselfe; & so before he were aware, to lead him into his owne deuise, and by delay mollifie the rigour of his former fury. To which purpose, he cunningly H set vpon him in this sort.

Muhamet Bassa cunningly dissuadeth Selymus from so rigorous a resolution, by filling his head with most necessary considerations.

Your anger (said hee) most magnificent and inuincible Emperour, against the Christians is most iust: and in this my desire exceedeth all others, That they should endure and suffer such punishment as they haue of right deserued. Yet it behooueth vs so to satisfie our wrath, as men better regarding their owne good, than the hot desire of reuenge. And forasmuch as I am for your many and vndeserued fauours, in all loyaltie bounden vnto your highnesse aboue others; I reckon it in part my dutie, so much the more franckely to deliuer my opinion, such as it is, in matter of so great importance. Neither will I attemper my speech in any respect to the comforting of your grieued minde: for how can it be that you, who following the worthie examples of your noble progenitours, haue alwayes heeretofore shewed your most heroicall and couragious minde, contemning all the chances of Fortune; should not for euer after shew your selfe to be rather dreaded of all men, than dreadfull of any? Let others, whose King-domes built vpon vncertaine earthly foundations are subiect to the reuolution of time, and change of Fortune, yeeld vnto their euill haps: as for you, whose Empire is founded by the mightie hand of the most Highest, and compassed about with an impregnable wall, and are your selfe by the power of God appointed King and Commander of Nations and people, a nu[illegible]; Fortune may well a little pricke you, but neuer ouerthrow you. As for this late mischance, [illegible] must needs so fall out, as proceeding from some immutable and eternall cause; must it be therefore alwayes fixe and permanent? Onely those miseries and mischiefes which the cowardise or foolishnesse of men bring vnto themselues, haue their firme K and certaine calamities: other common euents comming from other causes, haue also their common and sudden changes: but how this late mishap at sea may be amended, and your former glorie there-againe recouered, is hereafter to be considered. Now for the present (in mine opinion) this one thing, as of all others most necessarie, to is be prouided. That the weake and worst fortified places of your Empire, most subiect to danger, may be presently strengthened with strong garrisons; and that by your present repaire to the imperiall Citie, you cheere vp the mindes of your heauie and dismayed subiects: which done, what shall let, but that you may at your pleasure be reuenged to the full of the Christians?
For there is no cause why we should feare the Christians, six hundred times and more before ouerthrown: both our enemies and we are the same men we haue been for many ages, we beare the same minds, the same bodies, the same strength, the same weapons, wherewith wee haue gotten infinite victories, both of them and others. And although such be the state of man, as that hee cannot otherwise but sometime or L other taste of the worst tunne; yet I thinke this present misfortune to be rather imputed vnto some fa-tall cause to vs vnknowne, than to the valour of the Christians. Besides that, we may well enough oppose one ouerthrow against our so many and infinite victories: yea wee are to giue immortall thankes vnto almightie God, that we haue by force of armes subdued the rich and famous Iland of Cyprus, and that your high designes haue in that point sorted to your hearts desire. And hard it is in mine opinion to iudge, whether this late vnfortunat battell shall more hurt vs, or the Christians: for besides that the multitude of the Turkes hath no feeling of so small a losse, they will not as men discouraged, giue themselues to mourning and vaine lamentations, but with greater courage and furie come forth againe into battell, and reuenge this losse with the infinit calamities of the Christians: who after this their good hap, will according to their woonted manner giue themselues to excesse, pleasure, carelesnesse, and ease, vnto M their owne farther confusion. Thus haue I in briefe faithfully declared mine opinion: yet with that submissiue loyaltie, as that whatsoeuer shall proceede from the mouth of your imperiall Maiestie, shall be of me deemed most wisely and magnificently considered of.

The

A The Bassa was in such grace and authority with Selymus, that his opinion in counsel preuailed, & the tyrants wrath by his persuasion was well asswaged. But by the comming of Vluzalet to court, the remainder of his former griefe and melancholy was fully quieted: who after he had excused himselfe of the late ouerthrow, & declared what he had himselfe done in the battell, and in testimony thereof, presented him with one of the ensignes of the knights of Malta; told him also, how that he had left the Christian fleet so rent and torn, as that it could not possibly be made seruiceable against the next yeare: which newes was both of Selymus and the rest gladly heard. In the mean time Selymus placed this Vluzales in the stead of Haly Bassa that was slain: & straitly commanded the great officers which had the charge of his naute, to build new shipping night & day: and further inioyned euery Gouernor out of his prouince hee had Selymus repai-reth to his naute with all diligence possible.
B in charge, to haue in readinesse one gally or two against the next Spring, as wel for the defence of his own dominions, as to reuenge the losse he had so lately sustained: whereunto also many of his great men put to their helping hands, & cheerfully furthered his desire. New supplies of soldiers were also presently raised, & put into his frontier towns, great store of new ordnance cast, weapons and armor prouided, and whatsoeuer els the necessity of the present time required. So with the Turks stood reason & industry, rather than with the Christians, who (as some note) rather wanted discretion how to vse the victory, than valor to gain the same: which whether it chanced for that prosperity begetteth negligence, or that men ioying in their present blisse, regard little the time to come, I leaue it to the iudgement of the wiser to determine.

After this so memorable a victory, the three great commanders of the fleet sat in counsell The christian fleet dissolued.
C to consult, what farther course they were best to take. But forasmuch as Winter began now to approch, and that they could not much doe vntill their fleet were new furnished and manned, they all resolued for that time to dissolue the fleet, and the next Spring in the beginning of Aprill, to meet together againe at Corcyra. Whereupon Don Iohn and Columnius returned to Messana, where they in safetie arriued in Nouember; and departing thence, and taking their leaue the one of the other, arriued, Don Iohn at Naples, and Columnius at Rome: where they were in both places with great ioy and triumph receiued.

The Venetians for all that grieued with the losse of Cyprus, gaue not so ouer, but repairing their nauie with thirtie gallies, wherein were imbarked six thousand souldiers, woon a castle in Epirus called Margarita: and also recouered the towne of Suppoto, which the Turkes had Suppoto against recouered by the Venetians.
D that Sommer before taken from them; but now hearing of this ouerthrow, did vpon the ap-proch of the Venetian fleet, againe forsake it. The gallies also of Crete conducted by Canalis, intercepted many of the Turkes vessels laded with captiues and the spoiles of Famagusta, as they were passing thence to Constantinople.

Although vpon the late obtained victorie, a certaine reconciliation had bin made betwixt Don Iohn and Venerius, yet of the former dissention remained an inward heart-burning of one of them against the other: for which cause, the Spaniards requested the Venetians to appoint another Admirall in his place. Venerius was now indeed a man of great yeres, and his strength far spent; yet for that in his aged body rested great wisedome & courage, & that they thought him for his great deserts worthy all honor, they were wonderfull loth, and vnwilling therein E to gratifie the Spaniard: for why, they well knew there was no other cause of the Spaniards proud hatred, but that he had stood against them vpon the honour of the Venetians: and farther, they liked not that the Spaniard should so presumptuously prescribe vnto them, whom they should place or displace, in or out of their honorable offices. Neuertheless, not forgetting what commoditie came by concord, & what euils of discord, and that they might not against so mighty an enemy wel spare the help of the Spaniard, they resolued to make choice of some other; who succeeding Venerius, might with one consent manage their wars together with Don Iohn and Columnius. There was then one Iacobus Fuscarinus their chiefe Gouernor in Dalmatia, who but a little before had notably fortified Iadera and the other frontier townes, and for the space of foureteene moneths had notably represssed the furious incursions of the Turks: of F him then absent and not desirous of the place (as of a man of worthie desert) the whole State by generall consent made choise for their Admiral & General by sea against the Turke: which most honourable place he receiued not with all the solemne ceremonies thereto belonging, at Venice, as the manner was, but at Iadera: from whence he in the Admirall gallie sent for that purpose by Aloysius Grimanus his successour in Iadera, sailed ouer to Corcyra: where he found nd the old Admirall Venerius, with no leſſe care prouiding for all things, than if he ſhould G uſelfe haue ſtill continued the war. Of which great care Fuſcarinus at his comming eaſed n, by taking it wholly vpon himſelfe.

Caſtra nouum in vain attempted by the Venetians.

ſt Fuſcarinus thus lay making his preparation againſt the next Spring at Corcyra, Sal- ra Martinengus, who had the charge of the Adriaticke (by the counſell of Venerius, who was now returned to Venice) vpon the ſudden landed his men, & beſieged Caſtro Novum, a ſtrong towne of the Turks in the borders of Iſtria, where at his firſt comming he tooke the ſuburbs, and had in ſhort time brought the towne to great extremitie. But in the height of his hope to haue woon the town[illegible]aring that the Beglerbeg of Græce was with great power comming thither, he was glad to [illegible] his ſiege, and with all ſpeed to get him againe to ſea. The Turkes H in like manner, to diſtreſſe the ſtrong towne of Cataro, holden by the Venetians in the borders of Dalmatia, built a great and ſtrong fort vpon the paſſage from ſea to the towne, wherein they placed great ſtore both of men and artillerie: in hope by keeping them of the towne [illegible]mall reliefe by ſea, at length to gaine the towne which they had many times in vaine attem[illegible] by force; for by land it was alreadie enuironed with the cruell enemy, poſſeſſing the country round about it. Iacobus Superantius the great Prouidetor, then lying at Corcyra with the Admi-rall, vnderſtanding how Cataro a towne of no ſmall importance, was thus both by ſea & land by the enemie diſtreſſed: with twentie gallies manned with the moſt choice ſouldiers could be pickt out of the whole fleet, tooke vpon him the raſing of the fort, and relieuing of the I towne. Superantius with this ſelect company, and certaine other gallies which met him by the way, came by night before the mouth of the bay of Cataro, and there diuiding his fleet, left the one part therof at anchor before the fort, and with the other himſelfe courageouſly paſſed by the fort, further into the bay: at whom the Turks out of the fort made diuers ſhot, but (by reaſon it was darke) to ſmall pu[illegible]. In paſſing by, Superantius tooke ſuch view as he could of the fort, and by and by began on[illegible]ro batter the ſame; as did alſo the other gallies on the other ſide: and withall, landed the[illegible]on b[illegible]ſides; who vpon ſignall giuen, ran reſo-lutely to the fort, and by plaine force enter[illegible]g the [illegible]ne, preuailed vpon the fearefull Turkes, and put them to the ſword euery mothers ſonne; ſo that of all that great garriſon, was not one left aliue to carrie newes of the ſlaughter. This fort was in length fiue hundred paces, but not ſtrong towards land, from whence no ſuch feare was doubted. In it was taken ſeuenteen great K pieces of ordnance, with much faire armour, and great abundance of victuals: and ſeuen galli-ots which lay at anchor vnder the fort. Cataro thus relieued, Superantius with victorie returned againe to Corcyra.

Superantius re-lieueth Cataro, and taketh a great fort of the Turks.

1572 Fuſcarinus the Venetian Admirall with all things in readineſſe, hauing long lien at Corcy-ra, expecting the comming of the confederates, as was before appointed; ſent Superantius the Prouidetor with fiue and twenty gallies to Meſſana, to haſten the comming of Don Iohn, and to attend vpon him by the way. But comming thither, and thinking to haue found a great fleet and a ſtrong power in good forwardneſſe to haue ſet forward, he found ſuch ſmall preparaon, as well ſhewed the Spaniards ſmall care for repreſſing of the Turke, and that they would not be very forward in the ſeruice intended. Which filling him with griefe and indignation, L cauſed him to complaine vnto himſelfe, of their vnfaithfulneſſe, and to bewaile the ſtate of his countrey, with the whole Chriſtian common-weale: for Don Iohn had before ſolemnely pro-miſed vnto the Venetian Embaſſadour, that all things ſhould be in readineſſe againſt the appointed time: but now a great part of Sommer was paſt, when ſcarce ſome few companies, & about fiftie gallies were met together at Meſſana; and when Auria would come with the reſt, no man could tell. So that the carefull Prouidetor ſtood now no leſſe in doubt of the Spaniards delay, than of the Turks fury.

Selymus (after the great ouerthrow he had receiued at the Iſlands Corzulares, for feare hee ſhould be driuen quite out of the ſea, was aboue all things carefull for the renewing of his na-uy: and hauing partly new built, partly repaired two hundred gallies, commended them to the conduct of Vluzales; with expreſſe charge, That by how much things had fallen out worſe the M laſt yeare, he ſhould with ſo much the more care now beware the like danger; and not to goe out of the bounds of the Archipelago, or to aduenture b[illegible]ll but vpon aduantage, or at leaſtwiſe vpon an euen hand.

Selymus ſendeth out Vluzales with two hundred gallies.

This Vluzales (otherwiſe called Occhiali) was an Italian borne in Calabria, who in his youth

A youth taken at ſea by the Turks, and chained in the gally, and afterwards renouncing his faith; by many degrees grew vnto the higheſt preferments among the Turkes, & ſo became an exceed-ding plague as wel to his own country as all other of the Chriſtians bordering vpon the Me-diterranian. He now Admiral for the Turke, after the manner of the proud Barbariane, threat-ned with fire and ſword to be reuenged vpon the Venetians: which knowne at Venice, much troubled them, as wel acquainted with the furie of the old Archpyrat. Beſide that, Ant. Barba- rus their embaſſador, al the time of this war kept in ſafe cuſtody at Conſtantinople, had by letters certified them, what a great fleet, & what a ſtrong army Selymus had prouided againſt them: and that he himſelfe told 250 ſaile of gallies when they ſet forward from Conſtantinople, be-ſide ſome other that were to meet with them at Calipolis: and that therefore they ſhould be-B ware how they incountred with the Turks fleet but vpon equal ſtrength. It was alſo at the ſame time commonly reported, That king Philip chiefe of the Confederats, careleſſe of the warres againſt the Turke in the Eaſt, was about to turne his forces vpon the kingdomes of Tunes or Algiers, neerer vnto him; as indeed he did the yeare following. The Venetians intangled with ſo many difficulties, were euen at their wits end, & day by day the Senat ſate from the riſing of the Sun to the ſetting of the ſame, conſulting how all theſe mitchiefs were to be remedied. But for as much as the greateſt danger was to be feared from the Turks fleet, as then ho-uering euen ouer their heads; they by Letters commanded Fuſcarinus their Admirall, That whether the confederats came vnto him or not, he ſhould forthwith take his courſe toward the Eaſt, and there according to the enemies deſignes, and his owne diſcretion and valour, to doe C what he ſhould thinke beſt to be done for the common good of his country: and not to refuſe to joine with the enemy in battell, if he ſaw any good hope of victory. Neither ceaſed they at the ſame time, both by their Embaſſadors and letters, earneſtly to call both vpon the Pope and the King, to haſten their forces to incounter the enemy before he ſhould come out of his own ſeas; and to carry the terror of the war home to his o[illegible]vne doores, rather than to receiue it at their own. The like meſſage was alſo done to Don Iohn, putting him in minde what his place, what the time, and what the danger of the time required; intreating him (if it were poſſible) of himſelfe to adde ſomething vnto that haſt which the neceſſity of ſo important a cauſe required. Who neuertheleſſe, for all the meſſengers and letters to him ſent (which were many) wont ſtill on faire and ſoftly, delaying from day to day; telling, That he would by and by D come, and that the Spaniards would alwaies be ſo good as their word. Which was ſo far from his thought, that afterwards finding one excuſe after another, he not only ſtaied his comming, but called backe againe Requiſenius alſo, whom he had ſent before with twenty gallies to Corcyra. Now were two moneths (fitteſt for the wars) vainly ſpent, when Superantius grieued to ſee time to no purpoſe ſo ſlip away, & fearing leſt the reſt of the Sommer ſhould to as ſmall effect in like maner paſſe alſo, with great inſtance importuned him to haſten his journy. Then at length Don Iohn anſwered, that the Venetians requeſted but reaſon, neither that he wiſhed for any thing more, than to ſatisfie their deſires; but that a greater care hindered the leſſe, which was firſt to be preuented: He was aduertiſed (as he ſaid) that the French king pretending the ſuppreſſing of certaine pirats, had aſſembled a great fleet at Rochel, with purpoſe indeed to in-E uade Spain, now that the king was buſied in theſe wars againſt the Turk: and that therfore they muſt pardon him if he preferred the regard of Spain before others, being expreſſly commanded from the king, not to depart from Meſſana vntil he had other commandement from him. But whether this excuſe by France proceeded of a true feare or otherwiſe, the Venetians much doubted; and the rather, for that the French king vnderſtanding thereof by the Venetians, was therwith (as reaſon was) exceedingly offended: proteſting, that he was euer ſo far from that purpoſe of hindering any the confederat princes in that their religious war, that if the troubles of his own country would haue ſo permitted, he would gladly haue giuen them aid therein. Many there were alſo that thought, Ennie the antient enemy of vertue and valor, to haue had a great power in this delay; doubting whether the Spaniards would more reioyce of the victorie well F hoped for, if they ſhould joine with the Venetians; or grieue if the ſame ſhould by the Venetians be obtained without them. Superantius wearie of diſcourſes and long expectation, and almoſt out of hope of any helpe in time from the Spaniard; how vntowardly ſoeuer things went, thought better yet warily to moderate his griefe, than in ſo dangerous a time to giue any occaſion for the Spaniard to fall quite off. Yet ſpake he not fauningly or flatteringly of the matter, ter, but with a certaine modeſt grauitie declared, That he had thought heauen would ſoo- C haue fallen, than that Don Iohn would not at the appointed time haue come to Corcyra.

A[illegible]l beſought him, and wiſhed him to beware that he brought not the common State in[illegible] great danger: if they had to do with ſuch an enemy as might be delaied with, then he ſaid he could eaſily abide delay; but now for that the war and the enemy was ſuch, as wherein, or with whom neuer any Generall had delaied without loſſe, to what end did he longer defer or triſle out the time? or what other fleet did he expect? If they ſhould diuide their forces, then were th[illegible]ll too weak, but vnited together, ſtrong enough to defend the common cauſe. The neerer th[illegible]mie came, the more haſte were to be made to joine with the Vene-an fleet. And what co[illegible] (as he told him) more honorable or glorious, than for him a noble yong gentlemen royally diſcended, of whome the world had conceiued a great hope, that he would in martiall honour exceed the glory of his moſt famous anceſtors, againe to vanquiſh the proud Turke, the greateſt and moſt mightie monarch of the world; to fight [illegible] battell of the Higheſt, to aſſure the Chriſtian commonwealth againſt ſo puiſſant an enemy, [illegible] purchaſe vnto himſelfe immortall glorie and renown. As for the French, there was no ſuch thing to be feared as was pretended, who with ſuch ſlender preparation, not worth the name of a fleet, was not ſo vnaduiſed as to ſet vpon a kingdome of ſuch ſtrength and power as Spaine.
Furthermore he ſaid, that it concerned not the Venetians more than the king himſelfe, to haue the Turks repreſſed: whoſe kingdoms of Naples, Sicilia, & Spain, were no leſſe than their ter-ritorie, expoſed to danger by ſea. The good ſucceſſe of their affairs in the East would open the way to the conqueſt of Affrick: but if the Turk ſhould preuaile, then were they to deſpaire, not of Affricke, but of all Italy, Sicilie, yea and of Spaine it ſelfe. The time (he ſaid) and neceſſitie of the war, with the extremiti[illegible] of the danger of the whole and common State, required that he ſhould with all his power and [illegible] poſſible, take vpon him the defence of the common cauſe, or to ſay more truly, of the Chr[illegible] monwe[illegible], then ſo dangerouſly impugned. Theſe reaſons drawne from the common go[illegible] and the [illegible] it ſelfe, much moued the Generall: but the kings pleaſure was to be preferred before a[illegible]ſons or dangers that could be alledged.
But hearing afterward, what reſolute command th[illegible] Venetian Senat had ſent vnto their Ad-mirall, he became exceeding carefull: for hee feared leaſt if the Admirall ſhould without his helpe fight the battell and gaine the victory, he would conuert all the glory thereof vnto him- K ſelfe, but if he ſhould chance to be ouerthrowne, it would turne to his vtter reproch and perpetuall infamie, that in ſo neceſſarie a time he had withdrawne himſelfe from the common cauſe. Wherefore as a man perplexed, and in doubt what to do, he ſtood for a while as one at his wits end: yet at laſt, he vpon deliberation reſolued to take a middle courſe, and ſo neither without the command of the king (by whoſe preſcript order all was to be done) to depart with the fleet from Meſſana; neither altogether to fruſtrate the Confederates of the expected ayd.
He ſendeth Lilly of Andrada, with 22 gallies. And to that purpoſe ſent two and twentie gallies vnder the conduct of one Lilly of Andrada (a noble gentleman) to the Venetian Admirall at Corcyra; with whom went alſo Columnius with the Popes fleet. Now was Pius Quintus the late Pope dead, and Vgo Boncompanius, by the name of Gregorius Decimus Tertius, Pope in his ſtead; who vpon the ſame conditions with L his predeceſſour, had entred into the league, and liking very well of Columnius, kept him ſtill for his Admirall.

Long had Fuſcarinus expected the comming of the confederats, & albeit that the yere was far ſpent (Auguſt being then come) and no ſuch aid ſent, as he had expected; yet deſiring to do ſomthing worth the remembrance, and beſeeming their honor, he earneſtly perſuaded Colum- nius and Lilly to ſet forward with him toward the Eaſt, and with their vnited forces to giue the enemy battel: telling them, That if they were al of like courage, they ſhould go not only to the glory of the preſent battel, but to the great honour and aduancement of the whole Chriſtian commonweale. After that, he extenuated the power of the enemy; ſaying, That he could not but maruell, from whence ſuch a number of gallies as was reported, could ſo ſuddenly be gathered, or whereupon ſo great confidence & boldneſſe was growne vnto them, ſo lately ouer- M thrown & put to flight: the enemies fleet (he ſaid) was the yere before ouercome & diſperſed, the captaines and mariners ſlaine; and that therefore it was not credible, that ſo many [illegible]s could with ſuch celeritie be built, and ſuch a number of mariners and maſters as was nec[illegible] in ſo ſhort time prouided: That the prouiſion of the enemy was by flying fame made [illegible]e greater

Iohn in poiether to ſend aid to the Venetians or not.

A greater than indeed it was or poſſibly could be: for why, they might eaſily gueſſe what the Enemy was able to do, by the Chriſtians themſelues, who could not without much ado & great labor build their fleets, and traine vp their mariners and maſters: and that therfore letting fame flie, which commonly maketh things greater and more dreadfull than they are; he was verily perſuaded, that the enemie was glad to vſe moſt vnskilfull & ignorant as well mariners maſters as ſoldiers; who ſuddenly taken vp in the inland countries, and put into the gallies, knew not ſo much as the very names of the topes and tacklings, and other equipage: and then thoſe gal-lies which they had were like enough to be but weake, as of them which were the laſt yeare rent and bruiſed, and now againe botched vp; or in haſte built of greene timber, could not be nimble or greatly ſeruiceable. Wherefore he exhorted them, as valiant men to ſet foreward B againſt the enemie; and that with the greater courage, for that the laſt yeares victory had opened vnto them the way for the gaining of another. Which if it ſhould ſo fall out, as good hope there was, they ſhould thereby take from the proud enemie both power and hope (but in long time) to be able to recouer his ſtrength at ſea: ſo that they in the meane time without feare, might at their pleaſure take the rich Iſlands in the Archipelago. Now if the Turkes declining battell, ſhould retire themſelues into the Helleſpont, then might they with fire and tword ſpoile all the frontiers of their dominion on this ſide the ſtraits, and open a way vnto the Chriſtians to do great matters.

Hardly were Columnius and Lilly perſuaded by the Admirall: neither did they therunto giue their conſent, vntil it was decreed, That they ſhould not in any caſe joine battell with the ene-C mie, but with their gallions & galeaſſes firſt placed in the front of the battel, in whom conſiſted the greateſt hope of the victory. So ſetting forward toward the enemy, & come to Commentitia, letters were brought vnto them from Don Iohn, certifying them, That he was now by letters from the king commanded to come towards the Eaſt, and to joine his forces with the con-federats; but yet that for certain daies he could not come, vntill he were better prouided of all things neceſſary: & that therefore they ſhould in the mean time carefully look vnto all things, promiſing ſo ſoone as he poſſibly could to come vnto them. Vpon theſe letters, Columnius and Lilly began to doubt, whether to go on further, or to expect the comming of the General: yet foraſmuch as he had not expreſſly written any thing concerning their ſtaying, and Fuſcarinus vrged them forwards, on they went, with their fleet diuided into three battels. The whole fleet D conſiſted of 155 gallies, ſix galleaſſes, and twenty tall ſhips: in the right wing was Superantius; The number & order of the chriſtian fleet. in the left wing Canalius; and in the middle battel, Columnius, Fuſcarinus, and Lilly; and in the rereward followed Querinus. Before each battel went two of the galeaſſes ſtil in readines for preſent battell. In this order they came firſt to Zacynthus (commonly called Zanto) and ſo to Cerigo: the next day after to Colubraria (commonly called Dragonaria) ouer againſt Cerigo.
Here Angelus Surianus a valiant gentleman, ſent before to diſcouer the enemy, & what ſtrength he was of, returning vnto the fleet, declared vnto the Admiral, That the Turks fleet, conſiſting of 160 gallies, ſixty galliots, and foure great ſhips, lay about Maluaſia, in the enterance of the bay called Sinus Argolicus, vpon the borders of Peloponeſus, about fifty miles off from the Chriſtian fleet. Shortly after, the ſame fleet was againe diſcouered making for Malea: where-E upon the Chriſtians, before reſolued to fight whereſoeuer they ſhould meet the enemy, forthwith put themſelues in order of battel, and ſo with their galeaſſes in the front, made with what ſpeed they could toward him. Theſe two fleets were thought for many reſpects almoſt equal: the enemie was in number moe, but inferior in ſtrength. The Chriſtian fleet by reaſon of the The chriſtian fleet and the Turkes almoſt equall.
heauines of the galleaſſes, made but ſmall way; and the enemy afraid of the great ſtore of ordnance the galleaſſes carried, durſt not come neere them. The Turks fleet was rather nimble than ſtrong, but ours more firme and forward. Looke wherein each exceeded the other, therewith they endeuored to helpe themſelues and annoy the enemy. The Chriſtians fearing to be circumuented by the multitude of their enemies, oppoſed their ſhips and galeaſſes before them as a moſt ſure fortreſſe: and the Turke, by how much he had had the worſe ſucceſſe the yeare F before, was ſo much the more carefull to beware how he indangered himſelf within the reach of the galleaſſes. The Chriſtians deſired nothing more than to fight and to come to handie blowes: but the Turke, who thought it ſufficient for the preſent not to be ouercome, ſomtime The Turks warily declineth battell.
made away as faſt as he could, and by and by ſtaied againe, if happily he might haue taken the gallies ſeperated from the galleaſſes; neuer ſeeming willing to aduenture further than reaſon

discretion were. The enemy seeing the Christian fleet comming still on, and readie to gaue battel, first seemed as if he would haue done the like, but afterwards turned his course vp-on the hand, and kept aloofe alongst the coast of Malea: At which time the Christians, alth[ough] they were very desirous to haue followed them, yet the Turkes with their nimble fleet were quickely too far gon for the Christian fleet to ouertake them, especially with their beauie ships. That day almost spent as it were in the chase of the enemy, towards the going downe of the Sunne, the enemy put into the current of the sea betwixt Cerigo and the Hant.
Iti and, in bredth about ten miles, and there diuiding their fleet into three parts, lay in good order, as expecting the coming of the Christians, with the prowes of their gallies turned, as if vpon the confidence of place, which they had filled ouerthwart, they had purposed nothing more than to fight. But both fleets seemed resolued; the one not to fight without the gallie asses, and the other not to come neere those hot ships, from whom they had but [illegible] yere before receiued so great harme. And although the enemy, as was afterwards knowne, proposed nothing lesse than to fight, but vpon great aduantage; yet fearing by open flight to shoo nor his lord and master, and by granting as it were of victorie, to increase the fame of the christians, the craftie pyrat made a great shew of that he least indeed purposed. For pretending a great desire to fight, he indeed deluded the Christians hope: who although the wind had failed them, yet in hope the enemie would abide them battel, with much labor and rowing came so neere him, that the great shot began to flie too and fro on both sides: but when the matter should haue come to haue bin tried by dint of sword, then it plainly appeared what the enemy had indeed purposed: for still keeping the prowes of his gallies vpon the Christians, he by little and little shrunke backe; and beside that the shadow of the night began then to approch, he caused al his great ordnance charged only with pouder, to be shot off, & so in the thicke of the smoke retired vnseene; col[illegible] his subtill departure also, by certaine lights left in their cock-boats, making shew as if the [illegible]fleet had still there staied. By this meanes the Turks with great celeritie escaped, being also [illegible]pen in[illegible], that the Christians hindred by the hea-uinesse of the galleasses, could not but fain and [illegible]y pursue them: for these galleasses, as they are vessels of great seruice, so are they also heauie and vnweldie, and not fit for chase. The departure of the enemy at length knowne, the Christians also vnwilling to fight by night, returned to Cerigo. Two dayes after, the Turkes stayed in the bay of Tenarus (now called Meta-pan) & the Christians at Cerigo; contented in that, that the enemy was the cause that the battell was not fought, and reckoning his wearie and couert declining of battell, as a secret confession of the victorie. The third day after, the Christians desirous of nothing more than to joine in battell with the enemie, in their former order set forward from Cerigo, and sailing all the night, were in the breake of the day descried from land by the Turks: whereupon Vluzales by shooting off of certaine warning pieces commanded all his men to go aboord, and to put themselues in readines for battell. And now the Christians were not far off, when as the Turks (lest declining of battell might reproue them of feare) came out of the hauen, with their fleet diuided into three battels: whereof the left wing was extended a great way into the sea, the right wing still keeping neere vnto the maine, and in the middle battell was Vluzales himselfe:
who came all on no faster than the tyde draue them, staying their course oft times of purpose, to haue drawne the gallies of the Christians from the galleasses and ships. Vluzales seeing his fleet thus in order, and fearing nothing more than the galleasses, commanded both the wings of his fleet (hauing in each of them foure score gallies) to fetch a great compasse about, the one on the right hand, and the other on the left, aloofe off from the galleasses, and so to assaile the wings of the Christians on the sides or behinde: in hope so to haue disordered their battell, and without danger to haue drawne the gallies from the galleasses and the other heauie ships.
Which their intent the Christians perceiuing, in their wings turned about their gallies also, in manner of the new Moone, their maine battell still facing the middle battell of the Turks. The wings of the Turkes fleet thus farre seperated from the middle battell, seemed to present vnto the Christians a great aduantage: which Fuscarinus (intentiue to all the offers of good fortune) quickly perceiuing, and calling vnto Columnius and Lilly, and shewing them the enemies main battell at hand, and the wings gone a great way off, requested and persuaded them, That staying for the heauie Ships and Galleasses, they would with him vpon the sudden assa the enemies middle battell now destitute of the wings: not doubting but so to ouerthro
the

Vluzales manning, and making ready, vpon the approch of the battell.

The Turks politicly retire.

A the enemies greatest strength there, before the wings could, now they were so farre gon, joyne themselues to the battell againe. What could (as he said) haue hapned more wishedly, than to haue their battel diuided? So that they might at more aduantage fight against euery part thereof, now seperated, than against all three parts at once. If they had thought themselues not only equall, but too strong for the whole enemies fleet vnited, should they not the better ouercome them apart and dispersed? The opportunity, as he said, was but short, and therefore to be forthwith resolued vpon. If they would take the present occasion of victory then offered, and as resolute men charge their enemies, little fearing any such thing, they should by their celeritie and valour, teach the Turks what the Christian discipline of war and power was able to do: but B if they would therein vse delay, they should ere long in vaine wish for the like occasion they had let slip, when as their battell was againe strengthned with the wings. This the Admirals speech was of most that heard it joyfully receiued, and his counsell well liked; and that with such a generall cheerefulnesse of the souldiers, as shewed in them no want of courage to haue giuen the enemy present battell. But Columnius and Lilly being of the same mind they had bin alwaies, said it were dangerous so to do, for feare of drawing the whole three battels of the Enemy at once vpon them, against which they should be too weake, without the help of the galleasses and heauy ships: and therefore said flatly, That without those vessels so much feared of their enemies, they would not in any case hazard the fortune of a battell. But whether Columnius and Lilly were of that opinion for that they so thought, or were so charged by Don Iohn (of whome they altogether depended) not to fight in his absence, many doubted. The
C wings of the Christians in turning about to confront the wings of the enemy, were a little disordered: which the Turks perceiuing, and taking the present opportunitie, with fifteen of their gallies were about to haue charged the straglingst gallies: which Superantius perceiuing, to stay their course, went out couragiously against them with foure gallies, & made with them a great fight: in the heat whereof, Superantius seeing fortie more of the enemies gallies comming towards him, and dodbting to be inclosed, with all speed sent for reliefe, which came presently in, namely twentie gallies, with two of the galleasses: which forthwith sent their thundering shot so thicke and furiously amongst their enemies, that in a little time eighteene of their gallies were by them all rent and torne; and the Turks therewith dismaied, were glad in such hast to returne, as if they had rather fled than retired. Superantius hauing at that fight but one of his
D gallies shot through, returned againe vnto his place. Of this light fight many deemed what would haue bin the euent of the whole battell, if the opinion of Fuscarinus had preuailed. Both the fleets falling again into their order, although the Christians could not so fast follow, as the Turks went before them; yet came they so neere them, that oftentimes they changed bullets, as well with their small shot as their great. And yet for all that, it was by many signes gathered, that neither the Turks would abide present battell, neither the Christians longer delay, if by their enemies they so might. The Christians had agreed (as is before said) not to joine in battell without their galleasses and tall ships: which Vluzales well vnderstood, both by the fugitiues and his owne espials, as also by their manner of sailing. And he himselfe, although he had no great desire to fight, yet to be the better able to frustrat the endeauors of the E Christians (who with great labour drew with them the galleasses and other heauie ships) sent his chargeable great ships to Maluasia, there to be vnrigged; whereby he discharged himselfe of a great burthen, and made himselfe able at his owne choice and pleasure, to leaue or take, to fight or not: and also with such soldiers and other necessaries as were in the same great ships, supplied the wants of his whole fleet. By which policie the matter was brought to that passe, that if the Christians would needs draw the enemie to battell, they must of necessitie forsake their galleasses, their most assured strength; or if they would not leaue them, then they could not by any meanes inforce the readie enemie to fight. The day now declining, the enemy supposing himselfe to haue done enough for that time, both for the abating of the heat of the Christians, and encouraging of his own people, in seemly order, as one not affraid, sailed with
F his fleet to Corona. The Christians in like manner retiring themselues to Cerigo.

Whilest things thus went, Don Iohn by a frigot sent of purpose, gaue knowledge to the fleet, that he was come to Corcyra, sharply blaming the great commanders for their departure, and that they stayed not for his comming: and further commanded them as their Generall, all other things set apart, forthwith to meet him at Zacynthus, there to resolue of all matters.

If they had thought themselues not only equall, but too strong for the whole enemies fleet vnited, should they not the better ouercome them apart and dispersed? The opportunity, as he said, was but short, and therefore to be forthwith resolued vpon. If they would take the present occasion of victory then offered, and as resolute men charge their enemies, little fearing any such thing, they should by their celeritie and valour, teach the Turks what the Christian discipline of war and power was able to do: but
B if they would therein vse delay, they should ere long in vaine wish for the like occasion they had let slip, when as their battell was againe strengthned with the wings. This the Admirals speech was of most that heard it ioyfully receiued, and his counsell well liked; and that with such a generall cheerefulnesse of the souldiers, as shewed in them no want of courage to haue giuen the enemy present battell. But Columnius and Lilly being of the same mind they had bin alwaies, said it were dangerous so to do, for feare of drawing the whole three battels of the Enemy at once vpon them, against which they should be too weake, without the help of the galleasses and heauy ships: and therefore said flatly, That without those vessels so much feared of their enemies, they would not in any case hazard the fortune of a battell. But whether Columnius and Lilly were of that opinion for that they so thought, or were so charged by Don Iohn (of whome they altogether depended) not to fight in his absence, many doubted. The
C wings of the Christians in turning about to confront the wings of the enemy, were a little disordered: which the Turks perceiuing, and taking the present opportunitie, with fifteen of their gallies were about to haue charged the straglingest gallies: which Superantius perceiuing, to stay their course, went out couragiously against them with foure gallies, & made with them a great fight: in the heat whereof, Superantius seeing fortie more of the enemies gallies comming towards him, and doubting to be inclosed, with all speed sent for reliefe, which came presently in, namely twentie gallies, with two of the galleasses: which forthwith sent their thundering shot so thicke and furiously amongst their enemies, that in a little time eighteene of their gallies were by them all rent and torne; and the Turks therewith dismaied, were glad in such hast to returne, as if they had rather fled than retired. Superantius hauing at that fight but one of his
D gallies shot through, returned againe vnto his place. Of this light fight many deemed what would haue bin the euent of the whole battell, if the opinion of Fuscarinus had preuailed. Both the fleets falling again into their order, although the Christians could not so fast follow, as the Turks went before them; yet came they so neere them, that oftentimes they changed bullets, as well with their small shot as their great. And yet for all that, it was by many signes gathered, that neither the Turks would abide present battell, neither the Christians longer delay, if by their enemies they so might. The Christians had agreed (as is before said) not to ioine in battell without their galleasses and tall ships: which Vluzales well vnderstood, both by the fugitiues and his owne espials, as also by their manner of sailing. And he himselfe, although he had no great desire to fight, yet to be the better able to frustrat the endeauors of the E Christians (who with great labour drew with them the galleasses and other heauie ships) sent his chargeable great ships to Miluasia, there to be vnrigged; whereby he discharged himselfe of a great burthen, and made himselfe able at his owne choice and pleasure, to leaue or take, to fight or not: and also with such souldiers and other necessaries as were in the same great ships, supplied the wants of his whole fleet. By which policie the matter was brought to that passe, that if the Christians would needs draw the enemie to battell, they must of necessitie forsake their galleasses, their most assured strength; or if they would not leaue them, then they could not by any meanes inforce the readie enemie to fight. The day now declining, the enemy supposing himselfe to haue done enough for that time, both for the abating of the heat of the Christians, and encouraging of his own people, in seemly order, as one not affraid, sailed with

Whilest things thus went, Don Iohn by a frigot sent of purpose, gaue knowledge to the fleet, that he was come to Corcyra, sharply blaming the great commanders for their departure, and that they stayed not for his comming: and further commanded them as their Generall, all other things set apart, forthwith to meet him at Zacynthus, there to resolue of all matters.

where with to keepe the Christians from entring that way. So had they also vpon that point of the entine, which (as we said) runneth out from the towne, and vpon S. Bernards rocke, planted other great pieces of ordnance to defend that passage also. The Christians comming vnto the mouth of the bay, there lay with their fleet diuided into foure parts, but yet doubtfull what to doe: for beside that the entrances of the bay were but narrow, they were also far more dangerous to be entred, by reason of the great ordnance planted vpon them. Neuertheless, the Venetian Admirall in hope of good successe, and loth to let the fearefull enemy so to escape out of their hands, would faine haue perswaded the Generall with his whole fleet to haue entered the bay, and there in the mouth to haue oppressed the enemy: which he shewed to be no matter to do, for that the enemy was too weake in strength, & could not be from land relieued. In which doing, they should indeed ouerthrow but one fleet; but in the ouerthrowing of that one, cut in sunder all the sinewes of the Turkish empire by sea: and raising a tumult in the bay, and filling all with a generall feare, should vndoubtedlly at the first onset put the enemy to flight. Which done, what should let, but that carrying about with them the terrour of the victorie they should with their victorious fleet, take from the Turke al the Islands of the Ægeum? That truly and wisely it was said of Themistocles, That whosoeuer had the command of the sea, must needs also preuaile in the rest, and at length carrie away the victorie by land also. It was (as he said) the part of good chieftaines, not to be wanting vnto themselues when occasion was offered: besides that, they were the same Turks, whom they had but the yere before vanquished, and what had that one yere either taken from them, or giuen vnto the Turks? or what should they feare from pieces of ordnance mounted vpon a hill, who if they should vndertake the battell, were neare the great store of ordnance in 260 of the enemies gallies and galliots? I my selfe (said he) will be the guide and leader, in whatsoeuer shall seeme most difficult & dangerous: and will in person my selfe be the first that shall enter the harbour, and aduenture the first danger. Great victories (he said) were not to be gained but with great aduentures; and that therefore the matter were to be hasted, before more aid should be sent vnto the Turks. Wherfore they should as resolute men attempt that, the Turks thought the Christians durst not to haue attempted; and with the same courage breake into the bay, wherewith they had but the yere before broken the strength of the same enemie; & by the power of God, carrie away another notable triumph of the vanquished Turks: who ouercome in a second battell at sea, must needs depart with all their maritime territories. With euill liking of the Spaniards was the Venetian Admirall heard: and Don Iohn the General, deeming both the time and place vnfit for the attempting of so great an exploit; rehearsed on the one side, the strength of the enemy, the disaduantage of the place, the difficultie of the battell, with the manifold and great calamities receiued by the ouerhasty and rash attempts of their enemies: That the enemies strength was not to be so much deemed by the eye, or by report, as by reason; & that many in seeking to increase their former glory, had in so doing ouerthrown the same: That the Christians in entring and aduenturing the harbor, should on the one side be beaten with the artillerie from the hill; and on the other, with the artillerie out of the castle of Modon: and that it was not like that Vluzales should if need were, lacke aid from land, who but the other day had sent great troups of horsemen to haue kept the Christians from watering: That a matter of so great importance, was (by Fuscarinus his leaue) not rashly to be taken in hand, vpon an heat and hautinesse of stomacke, but vpon graue and mature deliberation: for if they should in a place of so great disaduantage, hazard the fortune of a generall battell, it should seeme that either he knew not that kind of fight, and force of the enemy, or else would make the bay of Modon more famous by the ouerthrow of the Christians, than was the Curzulari by the slaughter of the Turks. Then what a shame would it bee, if they which were about to oppresse the enemies fleet, should themselues be ouerthrowne, and that in their owne deuice. He had rather (as he said) preserue his own fleet, than to take 600 of the enemies gallies, and to account the same for a greater honor. Which he determined not, for that he would not haue any thing done; but that vnripe occasions should not be too much hastned, and as it were thrust headlong forward: whereas time would giue opportunitie for the ouerthrow of the Turkish fleet, so that they ran not blindly on headlong: & that in future time, the Venetians would reioice that they had so moderated their desires. The Christians (he said) had sufficiently preuailed if those things should fall out well, which were warily and aduisedly considered and resolued vpon.

Don Iohn refuseth to follow the counsell of the Admirall.

The

The matter thus on both sides debated, and nothing done, they returned with the fleet into the port of Nauarinum. This proceeding, as it diuersly moued the Spaniards and the Venetians, so brought it forth diuers speeches, euery man speaking in fauour of his owne nation. The Spaniard openly vaunted, That hee had most prouidently resolued, for that how deere the counsell of the Venetian Admirall would haue cost if it had been followed, the thing it selfe (as he said) shewed, by the extreame danger thereof presented, not in the doubtfull opinion of men, but laied open before their eies. The Venetians on the other side more desirous of battell, the neerer they had seene the opportunitie to haue preuailed vpon the enemy, the more impatiently they endured so assured a victorie to haue beene let slip out of their hands: and thereof spake accordingly.

The Christians lying at Nauarinum, consulted of many things what they were best to take in hand: & resoluing at last, by sea and land to besiege the castle of Modon, which kept the passage into the bay, and defended the Turkish fleet; they returned again thither, & landed 7000 of their best souldiers, to besiege the castle. And at the same time, appointed the galeasses with certaine gallies to batter it also from sea: which the more commodiously to doe, they ioined two of their greatest gallies together side to side, which they made fast with masts and strong ropes, and so bourded them cleane ouer, whereon as on a platforme, they placed gabions all afront, filled with earth, and great ordnance betwixt to haue battered the castle. But when this engine (in manner of a floating fort) should haue performed the seruice for which it was deuised, it proued vnseruiceable, after it had with much adoe beene brought thither, being ready to sinke with the weight of the great ordnance and other things wherewith it was ouercharged. For which cause, and for that they vnderstood a great number of horsemen to be come into the towne, they gaue ouer the siege vainly begun, and put againe with their fleet to sea. It fortuned at the same time, that a tall ship of Venice departing from Zacynthus, and comming alongst the coast of Peloponesus with prouision for the fleet, was descried by the enemie; who thinking to do the Christians a great dishonour, if they could almost in the sight of their fleet surprise her, they sent out certaine light gallies to haue taken her; Vluzales in the meane time with the rest of his fleet, lying in the very mouth of the bay, ready to come out if the Christian fleet should once stir to relieue her. Which the Christians perceiuing, and wel hoping that so the enemy would be drawn to battel, sent out Columnius with his gallies to rescue the ship; and others also which lying aloofe, might get in betwixt the Turks gallies & the bay: Don Iohn and the Venetian Admirall, lying ready to haue giuen battel, if Vluzales should haue come forth: but the Christians comming on with a smal gale, the enemy being afraid, by shooting off of certain warning pieces within the bay, in time called backe the gallies that were already gone out of the bay: who all forthwith came in, excepting Mahomet the nephew of Barbarussa, a most famous captaine amongst the Turkes, who as one of great courage, and desirous of honor, staied a little without the bay, with greater courage than discretion, expecting who should assaile him. Him the Marques S. Crucis set vpon, and had with him a great and terrible fight: but in the end the Marques preuailing, slew Mahomet with all his Turks, and with honor carried away the gallie. So the dishonor which Vluzales would haue done the Christians, fell vpon himselfe, hauing in his owne sight lost one of his best captains with his gallie.

Mahomet slain.

The next day, because the yere should not passe without something done, nor the hope of so great a preparation come to nothing, the Christians determined to besiege the castle of Nauarinum (which was in antient time called Pylus) more famous for nothing, than for that it was the natiue place of old Nestor. The citie of Nauarinum standeth vpon a rising ground, stretching somewhat into the sea; whereinto it hath a large prospect, and a faire large hauen, but subiect to the Northwind. It is defended with a point of the main, running compasse into the sea, whereon standeth an old castle. Some sent before to view the scituation of the place, brought word backe, that the castle might in three daies be woon. The performance of which exploit, was committed to Alexander Farnesius Prince of Parma, whom the Venetians furnished with munition and victuall. He landing with two thousand Italians, a thousand Spaniards, and 500 Germans, began with twelue great pieces to batter the castle. And albeit that the batterie was plantdd so farre off, as that it did the enemie no great harme; yet happily the enterprise had taken effect, if by taking the straight and troublesome passages through a rough and thicke forrest, the citie had bin kept from relief: but forasmuch as those passages were left free, the et[illegible] cunningly opposed policie against force, for sallying out of the citie, they gaue the C C[illegible]ians an hot skirmish: and in the mean time whilest the Christians were so busied, by a po[illegible]ward the forest on the other side of the city, receiued in great number both of horse & foot[illegible] port of this new come aid caused the Prince to raise his siege, and to goe againe a-boord. And now rested all the hope of the gaining of the towne in the strength of the fleet: and that not small, for that the Turks not relieued with victuals by land, were by the confede-rats kept from them also by sea: for at that time the Turks were troubled with two great mischiefes, the Plague, and Famine. For no prouision had there bin made, as in a thing not feared; and that little being sp[illegible] that was in the towne, they were inforced to seeke for victuals further off: which commin[illegible] sparingly, as in time of dearth, was oftentimes by the way intercepted by the souldiers tha[illegible]y about in the countrey villages, wanting victuals no less than H they in the citie. And the more men the Beglerbeg of Græce brought downe for d[illegible] of the sea townes, so much the more the wants of all things daily increased. So that no ma[illegible]b-ted, but that in short time all would be brought to extreame penurie. What a death the i[illegible] litie had made, the want of men in the gallies well declared: for many of the gallies for lacke The weakenesse of the Turkes fleet. of mariners and souldiers were sent away into Eubœa, or left at Maluasia, or carried away to Constantinople. Those which staid in the bay of Modon, were scarce 100 gallies, and 40 gal-liots: and they so slenderly manned, that the greatest gallies had scarcely an hundred & twen-tie men left in them, and they so meagre & faint, as that they could scarcely hold vp their weapons. The Christians vnderstanding of these things, were in good hope, that by continuing the siege, they sh[illegible]ld without dange[illegible]ine a notable victorie: for which cause Fuscarinus persua- I ded the Spa[illegible]s (of whose cor[illegible]ie he doubted) to hold it out, as men of resolution; shew-ing them, [illegible] the euent of th[illegible]tion rested for them for euer to be feared or contemned of the Turks: w[illegible]o except they sh[illegible]d be changed into fishes or into birds, could not (as he said) without a notable ouerthrow escape their hands out of the Bay[illegible] But vnto this his hope and coũnsel, the euent was not correspondent: for the[illegible]niards, whether it were for the tedious-nesse of the siege, or for want of victuals, or for the a[illegible]ch of Winter, or els moued with some other reasons, began to thinke of the matter diuersly: and at the first a report was raised, That the Christians giuing ouer the siege, would shortly returne home: and the reason was, for that they wanted bisket, and had scarcely victuals left for fifteene dayes, which was to be reserued for their long iourney home: besides that, the approch of Winter did call them from the acti- K on: and that hauing done what they might, they could neuer draw the enemy forth to battell; and that therfore hauing sufficiently and as far as was possible already discharged their duties, they were now also to regard their safetie, and to foresee that their fleet, wherein the welfare of them all was reposed, were not too far endangered. At the first these speeches were divulged by the common souldiers and mariners of small credit or reputation; but afterwards by moe, and they also men of better place and sort: Yea Don Iohn himselfe, whether it were to some other purpose, or that hee so spake in good earnest, began to lay the fault vpon others, why that he, so lately come from Messana, should in so short time want victuals and all things else necessarie.

The Venetians murmure against the Spaniards. With these vnexpected reports, and so far different from the confederation, the Venetian L Admirall with the rest of the Venetian commanders were exceedingly troubled, and grieued aboue measure: for it seemed not credible, that they which but a little before were come from the most fertile and plentifull countrey of Sicilia, in all ages the most faithfull and abundant granarie and storehouse of Italie, both in peace and warre, could so soone want victuals. Could eighteene tall ships (which ought by the capitulations of the league to haue come loaded with bisket, victuals, and other warlike and necessary prouision) become emptie? or but to haue brought so much as might but suffice for a month only? If this were done without the knowledge of Don Iohn, where was then the care of a Generall? If he winking therat, where was his zeale to the confederation, or to what purpose came he to Corcyra? was it to auert the Christian fleet (hauing once or twice met with the enemy) from doing any good vpon him? Could M it come into any mans head (besides that in so doing he w[illegible]s therein to extinguish the glory of most certain victory, like to worke the Turks confusion [illegible] the infamy of a voluntary return to increase the glory & renowne of his enemy, and bri[illegible] perpetuall ignominy and disgrace vnto the honour of the Christians? Verily the Spaniar[illegible] therein to shew themselues not so willing

A willing to haue the power of the Turks abated, as the strength of the Venetians not increased.
[illegible]These things Fuscarinus and the Venetians sometimes fretted at amongst themselues; and The Venetian Admirall perswadeth the Spaniards in no case to returne from the enterprise. otherwhiles the Admirall himselfe expostulated the same with Don Iohn and Columnius: & in the presence of the greatest counsellors shewed, not only how profitable, but also how necessarie perseuerance was in all martiall affaires: That it was an old and vsual matter for men in besieging of their enemies, to suffer many difficulties: if they should, hauing performed nothing, return with the fleet, who would doubt but that both their labor & charge was again the next yere to be renewed? And what could this delay be els, but a propagation of their further calamities? That therefore it much concerned the Christian commonweale, although they had not all things in abundance, yet resolutely and with patience to indure the scarcity of victuals.
B If want of bisket were feared, the Generall might easily remedie that matter, by speedily sending for those ships which lay laded with victuals good store at Tarentum; which thing might in short time be performed. In the mean time he promised to supply the Spaniards wants with part of his owne store: and that he had rather his men should liue with rootes, than to let the enemies fleet coupt vp, so to escape his hands: That the desire to protect the honour of the Christians, would ouercome all difficulties. Besides that, the matter would be but short, if it were done at once, in one continued course; and would vndoubtedly be by them performed, if they gaue not ouer the thing they had so well begun, vntill they had accomplished it. They (as he said) might in good safety lie with their fleet in the ports of Nauarinum, Sapientia, and Ca-C praria: wher as the enemie, lying shut vp in the bay of Modon, should haue but a bad & dangerous Winter harbor; and October being now begun, should in short time be in danger to perish with blustering stormes and rage of the sea, familiar vnto that time of the yere; or else enforced with the extremitie of the weather, and with want, to aduenture into the open sea, and with their weake forces to ioyn battell. What should therfore let, why they should not for 10 or for 15 daies continue the siege, as best beseemed the honor of themselues, the valor of their souldiers, and worthinesse of the Christian name? What a terrour it would be vnto the enemy, to see the Christians ready to indure all extremities and wants, to gaine the victorie ouer the Turks? Again, what dishonor and dis[illegible]redit would it be vnto themselues, if they should suffer the enemy (shut vp and not daring to fight) to escape: especially, when as they might sitting D still, end the war? The Senat of Venice, he said, most rested vpon the valor & courage of Don Iohn, & therefore he requested him not to deceiue the great hope they had of him conceiued: for how much should he himselfe blemish his owne honor, if when he had before relieued the afflicted state of the commonweale, he should now, when it was most of all to be holpen, forsake the same? Which should not be much vnlike, as if a man should with great labor purchase great store of precious pearles, and vpon an humorous passion cast them all into the sea: That men generally held a great opinion of him the Generall, an honorable remembrance of his vi-ctorie, and regard of his valor; all which, how much the more pregnant and honorable should they be, by the second vanquishing and subduing the most mighty monarch of the world: and that if the action well begun, should be effectually prosecuted by the goodnesse of God, the E direction of the commanders, and the resolution of the souldiers, in short time the Christians should carrie the victorie from the Turks, and make him their Generall equall not only with the great chieftains of the present time, but euen with the most famous commanders of al former ages. Whereunto Don Iohn replied, That the action then in hand no lesse concerned the Don Iohn replieth vpon the Venetian Admirall.
Spaniards than the Venetians: and that he had in his life desired nothing more, than to stand the Christian commonweale in stead: That he pointed at the same marke with Fuscarinus, & in zeale to doe good vnto the Christian commonweale, gaue place to no man; but indeed to perform it, was a thing much more difficult than to say it: lesser things (he said) were to be ouerpassed, to reserue themselues for the performance of greater: and therfore marueiled that Fus- carinus alone could not see things most manifest before his eyes, who otherwise could with F his piercing wit see through the deepest matters: could he thinke by any other means to abate the power of the Turk, than if they kept their fleet whole; that it was euer the maner of the greatest & most worthie cõmanders, rather to shun the present dangers, than to encrease their terrirories: That nothing was so well purposed, which might not be of some wrongfully suspected: but his faithfull meaning to be pure and without spot; and albeit that the opportunitie serued not for him to shew it: yet was his desire and endeuour nothing lesse: And that Fusca- rinus

rious should do well more intentiuely to consider, what the cause, the matter, and the time re- G quired: That the manner of war at land and at sea, were much different: and that although warre of both sorts were to giue place vnto the most vnseasonable time of the yere, vnfit for any kind of war; yet might men at land, better indure the Winter stormes in their tents & cabins, than at sea in their gallies, where oftentimes, will, skill, wisedome, nor valour helpe not: but that (except it be so prouided and foreseene, that the seasonable time of the yere, and commodious for sayling, may be taken) all must together perish by shipwracke. What, would hee haue them to striue aboue their power with the winter stormes, and famin, the greatest extremities of nature? Besides that, he was verily persuaded, that the Turks inioying the commodities of a good harbor in a rich citie, would there in safetie winter; the countrey of Peloponesus relieuing them with all necessaries: when as the Christians in the mean time, except H they in time returned home, should lie expoled to the rage of the sea, standing as it were in a continuall watch, not laying away their weapons in the depth of Winter & dead time of the yere, which in reason ought to giue rest to all men. And that therfore euery man ought to present to beare his owne grieuances, and not by the harms of his friends and confederats, to seeke his own auaile. And that he, bearing himselfe vpon the inward integrity of his good wil toward the Venetians, would this say, how soeuer Fuscarinus should vnderstand it, that if the kings fleet should by long staying there perish, it would no lesse concerne the Venetians, than the king himselfe: and taking God to witnesse, would solemnly promise, Nothing to be vnto him more leifer or religious, than to be prest so soon as the time of the yere would giue leaue, I and by his endeuour to make all men to know, that he had no lesse care of the Venetian State, than of the kings affaires; neither desired any thing more, than to be accounted, & indeed to be a most constant vpholder of this most Christian league; and that beyond all expectation, euen in the imminent of the Venetians themselues: but for the present they must pardon him, if he gaue place vnto the necessity of the time. As for the offer of the communicating of their victuals, that would not be any helpe, but the destruction of both the fleets; for so they should both sooner feele the want: wherefore it were much better to preserue the fleet, which they might vse in the next yeres wars, than wilfully to cast away the same by famine, & the rage of the sea. In briefe, what an indignitie should the Christians sustain, if they themselues should by the same means be ouerthrowne, whereby they had thought to haue ouerthrowne others.

The Spaniards about to return without the knowledge of the Venetians.

Now the Spaniards were so resolutely set downe for their departure, that not only with- K out the consent of the Venetians, but euen without their priuitie, their departure was resolued vpon, and secret commandement giuen vnto the masters of the gallies, with all the haste that might be, to depart thence to Messana. Which the Venetian Admirall vnderstanding, & ther-with troubled as with an vnexpected matter, came aboord the General, & greatly complained of his purpose for so sudden a departure: requesting him a while to stay, vntil the two gallies made fast together in the harbor of Nauarinum (as is beforesaid) with the ordnance vpon them might be put in good safety, & neither they, or any thing else left for a prey vnto the enemie.
With much adoe, Fuscarinus perswaded him to stay that night, that those gallies might bee brought out of the harbor, and all things put in order for their departure. The rest of the night was spent in debating of the matter too & fro: where Don Iohn would needs haue it conceiued L into a publike instrument in writing, That the fleet by the generall consent of the three Admirals returned for lacke of victuals: whereunto the Venetian Admirall hardly consented. But when the instrument should haue bin made and confirmed, Don Iohn better aduised by one of his Secretaries, That the same would redound vnto the great dishonour both of the king and himselfe, that the fleet comming out of the fruitful country of Sicilia, should in a months space want victuals; changed his mind for the writing, & onely requested the Venetian Admirall to credit him & Columnius, in that they had said concerning the want of victuals: promising him, that if vpon the way he should meet with the victuals that were sent for, he would forthwith return & giue him aid, as the time and occurrents should require: but in the mean time to proceed by common consent, to do that which was most needfull. Hereupon they returned: and M comming to Corcyra, they met the expected ship laden with victuals. Now is not Fuscarinus vnmindfull of his dutie, but comming to Don Iohn, put him in remembrance of his promise; telling him, That it was not vnlike, but that the enemy soone as hee vnderstood of their departure, would come out of the bay, and returne with his fleet towards Constantinople; and being

A being but weake manned, and worse furnished of mariners, might easily be ouertaken vpon the way and ouerthrowne. But Don Iohn was not by any meanes to be thereunto perswaded, pretending, that he was by the King commanded forthwith to return. So the expectation of great matters to haue bin this yeare done, came to nought, but vanished into smoake: and nothing performed worth so long a discourse, more than to see with what difficultie great actions are managed, wherein the hands of many great ones are required; who jealous of their owne honor, or enuying at others, corrupt with delaies the fairest opportunities, & by their crosse dea-B ling, no lesse than the enemy, hinder the common good, whereat they would all fainest seeme to aime. From Corcyra Don Iohn departed to Messana, and Columnius vnto Rome. Fuscarinus with greater honor than successe returned to Venice, where he was with great joy receiued, both of the Senat and the citizens in generall: and so (no lesse famous for his patience & moderation towards the other confederats, than for his policie and valour) with the good liking of all men gaue vp his charge, in few yeares after to receiue a greater.

Amyda the exiled King of Tunes craueth aid of Don Iohn.

About this time, Amida King of Tunes (of whom much is before spoken in the life of Soly- man) being but a little before driuen out of his kingdome by the Turks (who had of long by little and little incroched vpon him) and as a priuat man liued in exile with his two sonnes at Guletta with Franciscus Tonares Gouernour thereof; hearing of the great ouerthrow of the Turks at Lepanto, and of the good successe of the Christians, sent Embassadours to Don Iohn Generall of the confederat princes, then lying in Sicilia, humbly requesting his aid for the re-C couerie of his kingdome; promising to defray the whole charges of the warre, and for euer to hold his kingdome of the King of Spaine, as his vassal and tributarie. Whicst his request well considered of, and the matter thought of no small consequence for the safetie of the Christian countries lying ouer against that part of Affricke, to haue so dangerous an enemie remoued; Don Iohn the yere following (in the beginning of October) by the commandement of the king 1573 of Spaine his brother, departing from Drepanum in Sicilia, with an hundred and fiue gallies and fortie ships, arriued the next day about noone at Guletta, where the gallies of Malta came vnto him, and shortly after Iohn Andreas Auria the Admirall with nineteene moe, and Columni- us the Popes Admirall with fourteene moe, all well appointed. At his arriuall at Guletta, he vnderstood by Amida and the Gouernour, the whole estate both of the citie and of the king-D dome of Tunes: and that the Turks and Moores, terrified with so great a fleet, were about to forsake the citie. Wherefore hauing well viewed the place, he the next day after landed his forces about foure miles from the citie, and sent two thousand fiue hundred footmen before the rest of the armie to the citie; who found it all desolate, the Turks and Moores being before for feare fled, some to Carauana, some to Biserta: who entring without resistance, came to the castle, wherein they found two hundred Moores, who said they kept it for Amida their King; but yet would by no meanes suffer the Christians to enter. All which was forthwith made knowne to Don Iohn, who then because it was almost night, would not mooue, but early the next morning set forward with his whole armie; and entring the citie, before abandoned by the inhabitants, and so comming to the castle, found nothing therein but great store of oile, E butter, and wooll.

Amida the late King, by the commandement of Don Iohn all this while stayed at Guletta. But whilest Don Iohn was yet at Tunes, newes was brought to him the thirteenth of October, That the Turks garrison before fled out of Tunes, with diuers Moores, comming to Biserta, were there kept out by the citizens, and not suffered to enter: for which cause they began to burne and spoile the country thereabout. Whereupon the Generall sent Tonares the Captaine of Guletta thither with part of the armie; who encountering with those Turks ouerthrew them, and had the citie by the citizens peaceably deliuered vnto him.

The iust iudgement of God vpon Amida the late king of Tunes.

The kingdome of Tunes thus easily once againe recouered from the Turkes, Don Iohn tho-rowly informed of the faithles & cruell dealing of Amida the late king, and that in detestation F of the Christians and their religion, he had already had intelligence with the Turks, and procured the death of some of the Christians; gaue this definitiue sentence vpon him, being yet in the castle of Guletta: That forasmuch as he had of long time bin the author of great discord and endlesse troubles in that kingdome, and had most vnnaturally depriued Muleasses his father, first of his kingdome, and afterward of his sight; and in like manner tyrannized ouer his naturall brethren, the rightfull heires of that Kingdome, whereby the Turkes had taken occasion

...y desire he had thereunto of himselfe. For certaine daies at the first the French Embassador G ...s most curteously heard and the Bassa with faire & cunning speech promised, that the mat... of pacification should easily & in short time be composed: and so at their first conferences things passed rather in general terms, than that any conditions of peace were particularly agreed vpon: only this was on both parties consented vnto, That the Venetians should send their embassador of purpose, for the full concluding and confirming of the desired peace. Which charge was by the Senat committed to Iacobus Superantius, in whose wisdome and valor they had reposed great hope and confidence. He was no sooner come to Constantinople, and the Turkes deliuered of the feare of Christian sword, by the dissolution of the confederation, but that all things were changed, and the Venetians glad to endure the proud looks of the Turks, their disdainfull eares, their despightfull speeches, their long and insolent attendance, with many H other shamefull indignities: Yea the Bassa was so shameles, as proudly to aske them; How they durst be so bold as to impugne the great Emperor Selymus his fleet at sea. Whereunto the Embassador answered, That the Venetians had alwaies honored the Majestie of the Turkish Emperors, neither had at any time taken vp arms against him, but in their own reasonable defence, when force was by force to be repulsed, a thing lawful euen for the wild beast in the wild wildernesse to do. At the first intreatie of the peace, the Bassa seemed to put the Venetian embassador in good hope, that the Venetians according to his request should enioy their territories in Dalmatia in as ample manner as in former times, and bounded with the same bounds, whereof they had in these wars lost some part about Iadera. But when the matter should haue come to the shutting vp, the Turke began to shrinke from that he had before promised, refusing not I only the restitution of the territorie they had indeed by treason got; but by cautelous expositions of his meaning touching the conclusion of the present peace vnto the forme of their former leagues, required, That as the Turkes had now yeelded vnto them Maluasia and Nauplus, so they should redeliuer vnto them two other places of like worth and importance: As for not restoring the territorie they had taken about Iadera, to colour their deceit, they pretended that they might not by their law restore vnto the Christians any towne or place wherein were any church or temple dedicated or conuerted vnto the Mahometane religion, which was there: and further, That the same territorie was alreadie giuen by Selymus in reward vnto his souldiers, men of desert, from whom without great iniurie it might not be againe taken. Hereupon the French Embassador complained, That promises were not performed: and the Vene- K tians so fretted, that they were euen about to haue returned as men shamefully deluded, without concluding of any thing. Yet when no better could be obtained (the Turks stil standing vpon such hard termes) the Embassadours by the appointment of the Senate concluded a peace with the Turke; wherof these were the chiefe capitulations: first, That the Venetians should giue vnto Selymus three hundred thousand duckets, one hundred to be presently payed, and the other two hundred by equall portions in two yeres next following: then, That the merchants goods should be indifferently on both sides restored: and lastly, That such places of the Venetians as the Turke was alreadie possessed of, should still remaine vnto the Turks; but that such towns or places as the Venetians had taken in the Turks dominion, should be again forthwith restored. For the first payment of the money the Turke was earnest, thereby as by a fine L for an offence committed, to make this league vnto him more honorable.

The Venetians send their Embassador of purpose to Constantinople to entreat a peace.

This peace at Constantinople concluded the eleuenth day of Februarie in the yeare 1574, was by the decree of the Senat confirmed; and afterwards the 13 of April following solemnly proclaimed in Venice, to the great wonder of the other Confederates. For the better satisfying of whom, the Popes Nuntio, with the Embassador of Spaine, were sent for into the Senat house. And although there were many things that grieued the Venetians, yet did they forbeare all hard speeches, and of that their moderation receiued so much the more honor, as it is more difficultie for an angrie man to ouercome himself than others. The duke with calme & temperat speech, framed to the purpose, declared vnto them, That anger and hope, two euill counsellors, being set apart, he had concluded a peace with the Turke: not for that he was desirous M of the Turkes friendship, which what account it was to be made of, he right well knew; but for the loue he bare to the State, which was not lately with losse, but euen with death it selfe to be maintained. How he had been spoiled of the kingdome of Cyprus, he further declared: and that the Venetian state grew euery day weaker and weaker by the continual wa...

A and that therefore, before it were by losse vpon losse come to the vttermost of extremity, they not able to maintaine so heauie a war, were to take some better course for the preseruation of that which was yet left of their Seigniorie: for that the safetie of the Venetian State should at all times be a sure fortresse and defence of the Christian commonweale against all the furious attempts of the enemie, and vncertaine euents of time.

The fame of this sudden and vnexpected peace was for the iust and common hatred of the Christians against the Turks, generally euill taken: and the Venetians for the concluding thereof hardly spoken of, as if they had betrayed the whole Christian commonweale, or at leastwise their Confederates. For men were for the most part of opinion, that the Turkes peace would be but feigned and deceitfull; and that hauing gained time to set things in order, accor-B ding to his desire, he would for the naturall grudge he bare vnto the Christians, come to his old course, and as he had alwaies done, breake the league and take vp armes. Some said, That the Venetians forsaken of their friends and confederats, would in their owne deuices perish, yet so, as that their destruction would turne to the generall harme of all Christendome: and these men were of opinion, That in that case, and against that enemie, a dangerous warre was to be preferred before vn vncertaine and dishonorable peace. Neuertheless the Venetians, besides that they for the present eased themselues of many an heauie burthen, so haue they thereby enioyed the fruits of a long and happie peace, and found the same vnto their State both wholsome and profitable vntill this day. It was thought by the sequel of matters, That Selymus was the more willing to haue peace with the Venetians, that he might the better re-C couer the kingdome of Tunes and the strong castle of Guletta from the Spaniards: who with the knights of Malta now gaped more after Tripolis and the other port townes holden by the Turks vpon the coast of Barbarie, than how to defend the Venetians their Confederats. Thus with the losse of Cyprus and some part of the Venetian territorie in Dalmatia, ended the mortall and bloudie war betwixt Selymus and the Venetians. In the course whereof is well to be seene, what great matters the vnited forces of the Christian Princes were able to do against this most mightie Enemie, if all discord and contention set apart, they would in the quarrell of the Christian Religion joine with heart and hand against him, and fight the battell of Christ Iesus.

The peace by experience found profitable vnto the Venetians.

Selymus now at peace with them who before most troubled him, to keepe his men of war D busied, shortly after conuerted his forces against Iohn Vayuod of Valachia, and so at length joined all that prouince to his empire. This countrey of Valachia was in antient time called Dacia: it hath on the East the Euxine (now called the Blacke sea) on the South the famous riuer Danubius, on the West Transyluania, and on the North Russia. It is diuided into two parts, the one called Transalpina, & the other Moldauia (of the riuer Moldavus running thorow the middest thereof) but far passing the other both in greatnesse and abundance of pasture. That part called Transalpina, Mahomet syrnamed the Great (which woon Constantinople) made subiect to the Turkish empire; but vpon Moldauia, the other part, he only imposed a yearely tribute of two thousand duckets. After which time the Vayuods of that country, aided sometime by the Hungarians, and sometime by the Polonians, rise vp oftentimes against the Turks, and refused E to do their homage. It chanced, that Bogdanus Vayuod of that country, fauoring the Polonians, and joyning in league with them, liued much in Russia, as purposing from thence also to haue taken his wife. Which Selymus suspecting, with a great power chased him into exile, and placed in his stead one Iohn (called of his countrymen Iwan, and of some Iuonia) the supposed son of Stephanus sometime Vayuod of that country: who with Ieremias Czarnitueczius (a Moldauian, who afterward notably betrayed him) hauing of long time liued amongst the Turks, to be the more gratious amongst them, renounced his faith, and being circumcised, turned Turke; and following the trade of marchandise, became among them a merchant of such fame, that he became very familiar and well acquainted with the great Bassa's of the Court, and at length with Selymus himselfe. He vnderstanding by his friends neere about the Turkish F Emperor, of his purpose for the remouing of Bogdanus, corrupted with rewards the great Bassa's, to be mediators for him to Selymus, that commended by them, he might be preferred to be Vayuod of Moldauia: still increasing the suspition Selymus had conceiued of Bogdanus, and telling him, That he supported by the Polonians, was like enough in short time to reiect his obedience to his Imperial Maiestie. Selymus at the instance of the Bassa's nominated this

[a]ns to haue againe recouered his Countrey, but finding no possibilitie so to do, fled afterwards into Muscouia, where he long time after liued.

Iohn the Vayuod falleth into suspition with Selymus and the Bassa's of the Court.

Iohn now quietly possessed of Moldauia, for some few yeares held the same with the good liking of the Turke, paying [a]ll his woonted tribute: but afterwards repenting himselfe of his wicked reuolt from the Christian Faith, and now eftsoones againe embracing the same, and (ignorant of his owne former) persecuting with too much seueritie those which withstood his comming into the Country, especially such great men as tooke part with Bogdanus; and now after his returne vnto the Christian Faith, not fauouring the Turks as he was woont, but crossing them in many matters, became suspicious both vnto Selymus and the Bassa's his old friends. Which the Vayuod of the lesser Valachia (commonly called Valachia Transalpina) vnderstanding, he became a suter vnto the great Bassa's of the Court for his brother [Peter] and earnestly trauelled with them, that as Iohn supported by Selymus, had driuen Bogdanus out of Moldauia, so Peter his brother might in like manner by his helpe driue Iohn out also. In which his sute he spared for no cost, neither ceased by malicious suggestions to increase the suspicion alreadie conceiued of Iohn the Vayuod: who hauing reiected the Mahometan Religion, and againe embraced the Christian Faith, would (as he said) in short time, as had Bogdanus, ioyne hands with the Polonians, and cast off his obedience towards the great Sultan, by whome he had beene so highly promoted. Besides that, this malicious man offered, That his brother Peter for his preferment, should pay yerely vnto Selymus twice so much more as did Iohn, namely [a] hundred and [t]wenty thousand duckets by the name of a tribute.

The Bassa's [h]ereupon corrupted, and moued with the greatnesse of the tribute, perswaded Selymus by an Embassador to send for Iohn the Vayuod, to come vnto him himselfe in person, and to command him to giue place to such a man as he should send thither in his stead: which if he should refuse to do, then to denounce vnto him open war. Hereunto Selymus, who had euen then much emptied his coffers with the losse of his fleet in the battell of Lepanto, and the chargeable warres against the Venetians, was easily induced: and to that purpose sent his Embassador to the Vayuod: who hauing audience the one and twentieth of Februarie, at the same K time that Henry Valoys (afterward the French King) was crowned at Cracouia, deliuered his message as followeth:

The commaunding speech of the Turks Embassador to Iohn the Vayuod.

Selymus the Great Emperour of the Turkes sendeth me vnto thee, Iohn, Vayuod of Valachia, his Tributarie; with this commaund, (whereunto his pleasure is, that thou shouldest without delay send him answer:) first, he chargeth thee to send him not such a tribute as he was wont, but twice so much more, to wit, an hundred and twentie thousand duckets. If thou shalt refuse so to do, there is another readie to giue it both for himselfe and his posteritie. But Selymus mindefull of thy constancie, fidelitie, and valour, will not be troublesome vnto thee in thy gouernment, if thou forthwith send the aforesaid tribute. Which if thou shalt refuse to do, then his will is that thou shouldest giue place to another, and thy selfe L returne with me to Constantinople, there to answer the matter: otherwise, I am in his name to denounce all hostilitie and the calamities of war both vnto thee and thy countrey.

This proud message of the Embassador strooke farther into the minde of the Vayuod than any would haue thought: yet dissembling his griefe, hee commanded him to be brought to the Lodging appointed for him; telling him, That in a matter of so great importance, and so much concerning the whole State of his Countrey, hee could not giue him so present answere as hee required; but that vpon mature deliberation had with his Nobilitie and Counsell, hee would in short time answere him accordingly. The Embassadour being gone to his Lodging, the Vayuod forthwith began deeply to consider of Selymus his demands; and that in the Turkes Faith was no assurance, which hee kept or brake with the Chri- M stian Princes as best fitted his owne turne: and besides that, That if hee should graunt to pay that so great and heauie a Tribute in so great [p]ouertie of his Kingdome, sore vexed with ciuile warre, Selymus would not be therewith long contented, so long as any man would giue him more, but happily would the next yeare exact a greater, and in the end

A end such an one as hee with all his subiects should not be able to pay; which it should not be safe for him at any time to refuse, so long as any man would giue it. Wherefore calling together the nobilitie and States of his countrey, he brake with them in this sort:

The speech of the Vayuod vnto his nobilitie and subiects.

If euer you were to consult and deliberate of a most important and difficult matter, this verily is that time: for Selymus the Turkish Emperour, enflamed with insatiable auarice, and I know not by whose persuasion, not contented with his woonted tribute, exacteth of vs twise so much more. If you shall grant it, it shall not much concerne mee, as not to be payed by mee your Soueraigne, but by your selues and your posteritie: if wee denie it, forthwith he denounceth vnto vs fire and sword, with all the B calamities of warre. And in this bareneſſe of our Kingdome, almost spoyled by ciuile warres, how shall wee be able to pay it him? wherefore declare your mindes. Verily I foresee, that if you shall in this yeeld vnto Selymus, and grant him so great a tribute, hee will not therewith long hold himselfe contented, but euerie yeare extort a greater, vntill he haue altogether eaten vs vp. Wherefore it were better [for] vs (in mine opinion) to lose our liues together with our wiues and children, than to suffer so great an indignitie: neither is it mine owne estate that troubleth me; for why, it is you that are to pay it, and not I. Wherefore if you list not to endure this so dishonourable and base a seruitude, let mee forthwith so vnderstand from you: and I will for my part so prouide, as that I will not onely not pay vn- C to the barbarous tyrant the new and heauie tribute he demandeth, but not so much as any tribute at all; so that you be not wanting both to your selues and me. I know right well (beloued and fellowes in armes) what I owe both vnto you and the common-weale, for whose good and welfare I am alwaies ready to lay downe my life.

He had no sooner thus said, but that a secret sorrow and vnwonted silence had as it were oppressed the whole assembly. At length, as men awaked out of an heauie and dead sleepe, they murmured among themselues, that the Turkish Emperour should so without reason oppresse them, with doubling and redoubling of his tribute: and were generally of opinion, That the Vayuod had not so plainly as truly spoken of the intollerableneſſe thereof: and that therfore they had rather die, than to indure so great dishonor, ioyned with so foule a slauerie. And therupon offered vnto the Vayuod to serue vpon their own charge, and with him vpon the banke of Danubius to meet the proud enemy, and there in defence of their lines and libertie, to fight D it out vnto the last man. The Vayuod in few words commending their fidelitie, and taking of them an oath for the faithful performance of that they had so resolutely promised, sent for the Turks Embassadour, and gaue him this short answer:

I, for the antient fidelity and allegeance which I owe vnto my Lord and dread Soueraigne, the mighty Emperour Selymus, would willingly yeeld vnto him the tribute hee requireth, were it not that I know the mindes of my people to abhorre the same: wishing rather to endure all calamities, hap what soeuer hap may, than to yeeld vnto so dishonourable and shamefull slauerie. Wherefore sithence I cannot by any meanes extort the same from my subiects, tell my Lord Selymus, That I must humbly request E him, not to take the same in euill part, whose amitie I wish to be vnto me, rather an ornament and refuge, than disgrace or hinderance. And that vpon that good hope I both asked, and for my singular fidelitie obtained of him the Vayuodship of Moldauia: which my good hope I most heartily beseech him may not deceiue me.

With this answer he dismissed the embassador vnrewarded, & with a safe conuoy brought him vnto the banke of Danubius: which his homely vsage of the embassador, caused him not a little to be suspected, to be in mind changed from Selymus. The Embassadour sent away, the Vayuod not ignorant of the sudden inuasions of the Turks, forthwith began to raise his armie: and at the same time, sent Embassadors vnto Henrie King of Polonia his neerest neighbor, cer- F tifying him of the dangerous state of Moldauia, the surest bulwarke of the Polonian kingdom, which once ouerthrowne, opened a faire and easie way for the common enemie into Polonia: and therefore requested him, that as the Kings of Polonia had of antient time, euen for the safetie of their owne State, protected that countrey; so it would please him now in like manner in so dangerous a time, to giue him aid; or at least wise to giue leaue vnto such of his subiects as were willing to serue for entertainement, to come vnto him, whom he would with all to be Vayuod, who wit[h] great power of the Turks horsemen entring into Moldauia, ex- G

C what I owe both vnto you and the common-weale, for whose good and welfare I am alwaies ready to lay downe my life.

He had no sooner thus said, but that a secret sorrow and vnwonted silence had as it were oppressed the whole assembly. At length, as men awaked out of an heauie and dead sleepe, they murmured among themselues, that the Turkish Emperour should so without reason oppresse them, with doubling and redoubling of his tribute: and were generally of opinion, That the Vayuod had not so plainly as truly spoken of the intollerableneſſe thereof: and that therfore they had rather die, than to indure so great dishonor, ioyned with so foule a slauerie. And therupon offered vnto the Vayuod to serue vpon their own charge, and with him vpon the banke D of Danubius to meet the proud enemy, and there in defence of their liues and libertie, to fight it out vnto the last man. The Vayuod in few words commending their fidelitie, and taking of them an oath for the faithful performance of that they had so resolutely promised, sent for the Turks Embassadour, and gaue him this short answer:

The answere of the Vayuod vnto the Turkes Embassadour.

I, for the antient fidelity and allegeance which I owe vnto my Lord and dread Soueraigne, the mightie Emperour Selymus, would willingly yeeld vnto him the tribute hee requireth, were it not that I know the mindes of my people to abhorre the same: wishing rather to endure all calamities, hap what soeuer hap may, than to yeeld vnto so dishonourable and shamefull slauerie. Wherefore sithence I cannot by any meanes extort the same from my subiects, tell my Lord Selymus, That I must humbly request E him, not to take the same in euill part, whose amitie I wish to be vnto me, rather an ornament and refuge, than disgrace or hinderance. And that vpon that good hope I both asked, and for my singular fidelitie obtained of him the Vayuodship of Moldauia: which my good hope I most heartily beseech him may not deceiue me.

With this answer he dismissed the embassador vnrewarded, & with a safe conuoy brought him vnto the banke of Danubius: which his homely vsage of the embassador, caused him not a little to be suspected, to be in mind changed from Selymus. The Embassadour sent away, the Vayuod not ignorant of the sudden inuasions of the Turks, forthwith began to raise his armie: and at the same time, sent Embassadors vnto Henrie King of Polonia his neereſt neighbor, cer-F tifying him of the dangerous state of Moldauia, the sureſt bulwarke of the Polonian kingdom, which once ouerthrowne, opened a faire and easie way for the common enemie into Polonia: and therefore requested him, that as the Kings of Polonia had of antient time, euen for the safe-tie of their owne State, protected that country; so it would please him now in like manner in so dangerous a time, to giue him aid; or at leastwise to giue leaue vnto such of his subiects as were willing to serue for entertainement, to come vnto him, whom he would with all honour

nour and bountie vse acc[ording] to their place and qualitie. Whereunto the king answered, C t forasmuch as he and h[is] predecessors the kings of Polonia, had for the space of more than an hundred yeres bin in le[ague] with the Turkish kings and Emperors, he could not either send him aid, or yet giue leaue to any of his subiects to serue against the Turke, as hee desired.
The Vayuod entertaineth the Polonian Cossackes. W[hereu]pon this answer the Vayuod was much troubled, as there deceiued where he most hoped for reliefe: yet hearing of [cer]tain companies of the Polonian Cassacks, which hauing long lien in hope of prey vpon the [bo]rders of the great riuer Borysthenes, were returning empty home, he by fit messengers sent of pur[pose], offered them great entertainment to serue him in his warres against the Turke; of whi[ch] his offer, they (as men liuing for most part by seruice) gladly accepted; and so witho[ut] knowledge of the king went vnto him, to the number of twelue hundred, with their cap[tains] men of great courage and valor, of whom Suierceuius was chiefe: H who were by the Vayuod honorably entertained, and did him in these wars right worthy seruice. These Cossacks are light horsemen, lying most commonly vpon the borders of the Po-lonian kingdome towards the Tartars: an hardie and valiant kind of men, whose best liuing, is the spoile they take from the enemie; and their best lands, their horse and launce. For albeit that the Turks and Tartars are most commonly in league with the Polonians, and seeme neuer so desirous of peace; yet do they oftentimes in great numbers, vpon the sudden break into the countries of Podolia, and Russia, part of the Polonian kingdome, and there do great harme, if they be not in time represt or cut off by the aforesaid light horsemen, who for that purpose lie alwaies in wait for them, as doth the Hawke for the prey.

Selymus vnderstanding the answer of Iohn the Vayuod, was therwith exceedingly enraged, I Selymus sendeth his forces against the Vayuod, and the more [for] the bitter complaint of the embassador, who angry with the Vayuod, that he was of him [not] better regarded nor rewarded, spared not to the vttermost of his power, to incense the [mind] against him, as if his honor had bin in the person of himselfe contemned. [Wher]efore without delay, he sent thirty thousand Turks, and two thousand Hungarians vnto the Palatine of Valachia Transalpina, that ioyning those forces to his owne, he might take Iohn the Vayuod, and sending him in bonds to Constantinople, to place Peter his brother, Vayuod in his place. The Palatine glad of this command, and hauing raised his owne power, together with the Turkes & the Hungarians, swam ouer the riuer Moldavus, hauing in his army about an hundred and two thousand fighting men: a power, not onely sufficient to haue driuen the Vayuod out of Moldauia, but also to haue shaken a right puissant K king in his kingdome. The Palatine in the midst of so great a strength, little fearing, & lesse regarding the sudden comming of the Vayuod, suffred his men with their horses to lie disorderedly here and there, dispersed in the large medows and pastures al along st the faire riuer side; so the better to refresh themselues, wearie of their long trauel. In the mean time certain scouts came to the Vayuod then at dinner, certifying him, that the enemy with an huge army (the certaine number whereof they could not well descry) was come ouer the riuer: and now resting themselues, had turned off their horses into the rich meadows thereabout, in such disordered and careless manner, as that they might with a small power be easily ouerthrowne. The Vay-uod glad of this newes, forthwith sent before Suierceuius with his Cossackes, and 5000 other light horsemen, more certainly to descry what the enemy did, with the manner of his lying; L and he himself with the rest of his army followed faire and softly after. Suierceuius with great silence approching the enemies camp, suddenly light vpon the enemies scouts, in number about 500; who enclosed before they were aware, were taken euery man by the Cossacks, and by them straightly examined of the state of their armie and campe. Who for safegard of their liues now in their enemies power, franckly confessed how that the Palatine lay securely there by, resting his armie, not so much for the refreshing [the]reof after his trauell, as with greatest strength to set vpon the Vayuod with his fresh soulde[iers]: and that in the army were about seauenty thousand Valachians, thirtie thousand Turks, a[nd] three thousand Hungarians; who now dispersed, and sleeping in securitie, might easily be o[ver]thrown. Of all these things Suierceuius aduertiseth the Vayuod; requesting him with all poss[ible] speed to hasten his comming, for the M obtaining of a most notable and assured victory: he i[n the] mean time lying close with his men The Palatine with the Turks ouerthrowne by the Vayuod. not far from the enemie. The Vayuod certified of a[ll] these things, came without delay, an[d] forthwith commanded Suierceuius with his men to g[iue] the onset vpon the enemy: purposing himself with the rest of his army on the other side, to charge the disordered camp in three pla-

A ces. Suierceuius according as he had in charge, with a great and terrible outcry, suddenly set vp-on the secure enemies: who dismaid with the suddennesse of the vnexpected danger, stood as-mem astonied, not knowing which way to flie, or how to make resistance. But whiles Suierce- uius with his light horsemen thus on the one side filleth the camp with tumult, retrour, slaughter, and feare; behold, euen as a sudden tempest, commeth the Vayuod, bearing all the disordered camp downe before him: neither had the enemies any means to flie, hauing put their horses a great way off from them into the rich pastures; but there take[n] vnarmed, were miserably slain. In all the camp was lamentation and mourning, death raging [in] euery place with such furie, that of so great an armie as of late passed the riuer, few or none escaped, more than the Palatine with Peter his brother, who by great chance with much ado getting horses, swam ouer B the riuer, and so came to the castle of Brailouia in Valachia; all the rest were slaine, and left to be of the beasts of the field, and birds of the aire deuoured. It was a most horrible spectacle to see the ground couered with the bodies of the dead, al stained with gore bloud, and their weapons of all sorts lying by them. In the campe were found great riches, all which the Vayuod gaue vnto his souldiers, and there staied foure daies to refresh his wearied men. After that, he with his victorious armie entred into Valachia, the Palatines countrey, where he tooke many castles and townes, and put to the sword all that came in his way, men, women, and children, without respect of age or sex: and burnt all the country towns and villages before him as he went; so that all that part of the countrey of Valachia Transalpina, was couered with smoke and fire, to the terrour of the beholders. The aged fathers were in euery place drawne forth to C slaughter, the young babes were cut in pieces, the matrons and virgins defiled, and afterwards slaine: and in briefe all the crueltie that could be deuised, performed: in the bloudie execution whereof, the Vayuod commended his men, persuading them in like manner still to prosecute the victorie, & that the rest of their labors was al but for prey and bootie, for the enriching of themselues. In this hauocke of all things, it was told him, That the Palatine with his brother Peter, the men whom he most sought after, were in the castle of Brailouia not farre off: whereupon he forthwith marched thitherwith his armie. The citie of Brailouia standeth vp-on the riuer Danubius, and had in it a castle of some good strength, defended both by the nature of the place, and a strong garrison of the Turks, which Selymus had appointed for the keeping thereof, as the key of the country: not far from this citie the Vayuod encamping his ar-D mie, writ vnto the captaine of the castle, forthwith to deliuer vnto him the Palatine, with Peter his brother, his mortall enemies; who neuer wronged by him, had inuaded his countrey, and sought after his life, and being ouerthrowne in battell, were fled vnto him: which if he should refuse to do, he threatned neuer to depart thence, vntill he had to his further harm, constrained him by force to yeeld them. These letters he sent by two Valachian captiues, to be deliuered vnto the captaine of the castle: whereunto he returned answere by foure Turks, two of the ci-tie, and two of his owne seruants, by whom he also sent ten great shot, and as many small, with two Turkish arrowes, and this message.

The blunt answer of the captaine to the Vayuod.

E For that I know thee to bee the seruant of my dread Soueraigne Selymus, I regard thee: and will not denie the same men to bee with mee, whome thou so much requirest. But forasmuch as I vnder-stand, that thou of late hast slaine a great number of the seruants of the great Emperour, who by his commandement were bringing Peter the brother of the Palatine into Moldauia: I therefore tell thee, that except thou betime raise thy siege, I will feed thee and thy followers, with such dishes as these; whereupon thou and thine armie gorged to the full, shall all afterwards dangerously surfeit and cast. Farewell.

Barbarous cruelties.

This rough answer so much moued the Vayuod, that he commanded hands to be laid vpon the aforesaid foure messengers, and their noses, lips, and eares, being cut off, both their feet to to be with great nailes fast nailed vnto a long piece of timber, and so with their heads hanging F downward, to be set vp before the citie, & so left for the captain and the citizens to gaze vpon.
Signifying withal vnto the captain that sent them, that he himself with the other fugitiues his guests, should in like manner be serued, if they fel into his hands. Immediatly after, he assaulted the citie, and vsing the cheerfulnesse of his soldiers, by plain force tooke the same, the defendants being not able to hold them out. There was made great slaughter of the Turks, wheras no man was taken to mercie; the very babes were slaine, together with their mothers, & bloud ran like riuers into the Danubius. For the space of foure daies this bloudie execution indured: no place serued for refuge, euen the most secret and obscure places were searched, and the poore creatures there found drawn forth and slain. The fury was so great, that no liuing thing, no not so much as the very dogs were spared. Much gold, siluer, plate, iewels, and other rich spoile was there found, all which became a prey vnto the greedie souldiers: for that citie was of all others in those quarters the richest, as a place much frequented, and inioying long peace, as after such time the Turks were fully possessed of Græcia, not being troubled with any wars; vntil now, that it was by the Vayuod first ransackt, and afterwards rased down to the ground, and nothing thereof remaining, more than the bare castle it selfe: which the Vayuod durst not aduenture vpon, for it was wel fortified, and furnished with so strong a garrison, as that it could not without his great losse be taken.

The Turkes againe ouerthrowne by the Vayuod.

Whiles the Vayuod was thus busied in the spoile of Brailouia, news was brought vnto him of the comming of fifteen thousand Turks to the reliefe of the castle: against whom he forthwith sent Suiercenius with his Cossackes, and other eight thousand Moldauian horsemen, who suddenly comming vpon the Turks, disordered & fearing no such matter, slew almost 14000 of them, and chased the rest vnto the castle of Teina. Of this victorie Suiercenius in all hast certified the Vayuod; and withall, that there was another great power of the Turkes comming, which might easily be also ouerthrown, if he leauing the siege of the castle of Brailouia, would without delay come and ioyne his forces with his. He glad of that newes, and well perceiuing how difficult and dangerous that siege would be vnto him, rise forthwith with his armie, and went to Suiercenius; and afterwards vpon conference had with him, laid siege to Teina: which citie taken without much labor, he put to sword all the people found therein, not leauing one aliue: and by the meanes Suiercenius ouerthrew the Turks comming towards Brailouia.

...ymus in ... bi... of the Vayuod.

Selymus in the meane time much troubled with the proceedings of the Vayuod, and doubting to be quite thrust out of Valachia Transalpina (which he was like enough to haue been, had not the treason of Czarnieuiche hindered the matter) prepared new forces for that seruice; and after the manner of the Turks in time of their greatest distresse, appointed generall supplications and praiers to bee made vnto his Prophet Mahomet, for the better successe of his warres; the vndoubted signe of his feare.

The Vayuod after so many victories against the Turkes, purposing for a while to breake vp his great armie, called vnto him his old friend Ieremias Czarnieuiche, vnto whom, as vnto the man hee of all others most trusted, he had resolued to commit the charge, with part of his armie, to keepe the Turks from passing againe ouer the riuer Danubius into his countrey: and in deliuering to him his charge, spake vnto him as followeth:

The kind speech of the Vayuod to Czarnieuiche

Sith Fortune hath hitherto answered our desires (worthie Czarnieuiche*) with most rare and perpetuall successe against the Turkes, our most cruell enemies, wee are thankfully to take the same, and to render most humble and heartie thankes vnto Almightie God, that it hath pleased him, the Authour of all Victorie, so to haue prospered our endeauours against these fierce and deuouring enemies. Now what remaineth for the present, but to disband mine armie, wearied with labour and trauell, and to giue my souldiers leaue to depart home to rest themselues, that so I may as occasion shall require againe vse their fresh forces for our better seruice: you in the meane time with thirteene thousand of my select souldiers, shall lie vpon the side of Danubius, to keepe the Turkes from passing the riuer. Haue good regard I pray you, vnto this your charge, which I vpon an especiall trust, grounded vpon your antient loue and fidelitie, haue at this time imposed vpon you. And let mee from time to time with all expedition vnderstand from you of euerie motion of the enemie, that so we may in due time prouide for him accordingly.*

And so in token of his greater fauour, taking his leaue of him with a kisse (as the manner of those people is) gaue leaue vnto the greatest part of his souldiers to depart home, yet with this charge, to be alwaies in readinesse whensoeuer they should be called vpon.

Czarnieuiche hauing receiued his charge, & promising vnto the Vayuod the vttermost of his faithful deuoire; went towards Danubius, & there most carefully kept the passages with continuall watch and ward. It was not long but that great numbers of the Turks were come do... to

A to the other side of the riuer, and moe were still comming, yet none of them was so hardie as to aduenture the great riuer; Czarnieuiche with his horsemen lying in the faces of them, ready to receiue them on the other side. Which the Bassa whom Selymus had sent with his armie, perceiuing, sent certaine men pickt out for the purpose, to Czarnieuiche, to sound him, if hee might by any means be drawn to come ouer, in secret to talke with him: & the more to moue him, beside his conduct for his safetie, sent him by the same messengers thirtie thousand Hungarian duckats for a Present. With which so faire a bate Czarnieuiche allured, receiued the mony, & faithfully promised to come: and so shortly after, secretly passing ouer the riuer, had conference with Peter the Palantines brother, who then lay on the further side of Danubius, with a great power of the Turkes. In this conference, Peter declared vnto him in how great danger

Czarnieuiche hath secret conference with Peter the Palantines brother, who cunningly perswadeth him to giue the Turkes passage.

B the Vayuod stood, and how highly Selymus was offended with him, That he his tributarie and vassaile should worke the destruction of his so great armies: which his heauie displeasure he could no otherwise satisfie but with his head: and that therefore hee should no longer rule in Moldauia, for that gouernment was by the great Emperor giuen vnto him. Wherefore (said he) if thou be wise, whilest it is yet in thy power, gain the good will of Selymus by some good deserts: for an easie matter it is to begin any war, but an hard matter to end the same. Forasmuch as it is not alwaies in the same mans power to begin wars, and at his pleasure to make an end. Euery foole may when he list enter into armes, but must lay the same downe when it pleaseth the conqueror. Now you haue a faire opportunitie, and it is in your own power to procure his friendship for euer, better standing with your affaires than warre. And albeit you may hope

C well of the power of the Vayuod, yet wisedome would not, that you should prefer vncertainties before things certain: you haue now receiued 30000 duckats, the earnest of your further deserts; which shal hereafter haue also their due rewards in most full and bountifull measure. Wherefore if you will do your selfe good, and prouide both for your safetie and preferment, confound not your owne good fortune, with the broken and desperat state of the Vayuod, but suffer the Turks to passe as friends ouer the riuer of Danubius: for I am come (said he) with a great and puissant army from the mightie Selymus, to take vpon me the gouernment of Moldauia, and to send the Vayuod in bonds to Constantinople: and of me, being once Vayuod, what is it that for so great desert thou and thine may not aske and obtaine? Wherefore I pray thee conceale the comming of the Turks, and withdraw thy selfe from the riuer: so shall we pas-

D sing ouer the riuer with our populous army, easily oppresse the Vayuod with all his power, and at once reuenge all the former iniuries and disgraces done both vnto Selymus and vs.

Czarnieuiche corrupted, giueth the Turke leaue quietly to passe ouer the riuer of Danubius.

With greedie men what will not the foule desire of gold worke? Czarnieuiche ouercome with the golden promises of Peter; and forgetfull of his faith before giuen vnto the Vayuod, yeelded vnto all he requested: and drawing his forces further off from the riuer, as if it had bin for his more safety, gaue the Turks free passage. There was then in the Turks armie two hundred thousand men, well appointed, & furnished with great ordnance and all other things ne-

E cessary both for the field and for siege, who by the sufferance of the false traitor passed quietly ouer the riuer. Czarnieuich forthwith posting to the Vayuod, certified him, how that the Turks trusting to their multitude, had passed the riuer of Danubius, against whom he was not able (as he said) to make head: and that therefore he should do well, without delay to goe against them with such forces as he had then in a readinesse, which ioined vnto his, might easily ouerthrow them. Glad was the Vayuod of this newes, and filled with the hope of good successe, demanded of him what strength the enemie might be of? They are (said he) not much aboue twelue thousand that be already come ouer, but are still comming more & more, and will before your comming thither be aboue fifteene thousand.

The Vayuod lay then at the siege of the castle of Teina (hauing before taken the citie) but hearing this news, raised his siege, and so in foure daies came and incamped within three miles of the enemy: and forthwith sent foorth Suiercenius with his Cossackes, and Ieremias Generall of the horsemen, with six thousand horse, to take view of the enemies camp, and to vnderstand

F what might be of their designes. These two captains marching together, chanced to fall vpon the Turks scouts, in number about six thousand horsemen, with whom they had a light skirmish, and in short time put them to flight. Of these scours they tooke one, and him grieuously wounded; who being examined of the strengh of the enemie, and feeling himselfe wounded to death, told them dissemblingly, that the Turks were not in number many. But the Cossacks doubting

...ing of the truth of that report, & probably coniecturing by so great a number of scouts, G ...he enemy was of far greater strength than was supposed or reported; quickly certified the ...thereof, withing him in time to prouide for the safety of himselfe and his army, and not ...uch to trust Czarnieuiche, whom they had a good while before suspected. But the Vayuod nothing doubting ... faith of him whom he had a long time found most faithfull in the time of his hardest distr... and vsed as a most trustie companion in all his trauels, answered nothing, but that he kn... whom he trusted; & that it was not now time to stand in doubt, or to be afraid, and that he ... dere long come and take view of the enemies camp himselfe: for that he was not co... e to flie, but to fight in defence of his countrey and subiects, euen to the last gaspe. A... rtifying his campe neere vnto a lake that runneth out of Danubius (for the more conuenient watering of his armie) he set forward with all his power against H the enemie.

Neere vnto the enemies campe was an high hill, from whence the Vayuod had tho... to haue descried the number of them, with the manner of their lying: but comming thi... e could descry nothing but foure companies of scouts a far off, one company from another; who also vpon the sight of the Moldauians withdrew themselues of purpose out of sight vnto the army, which then lay in a low valley behind an hill, not to be discouered vntill a man were almost vpon it. The Vayuod suspecting the enemy to be at hand, diuided his horsmen, in number 30000, into 30 companies, and placing before euery company certain field pieces, so marched ready to giue battell. His footmen, in number many, a rude and homely kind of people, I but vnto him ... all others most faithfull, and armed with such countrey weapons as they had, he placed by themselues. So ... hing on, he came to another hill, from whence he might not far off eas... descry ... e army of the enemie, and how he had bin by the treason of Czarnieuich... ued ... he reupon he presently sent for him; who sent him word back again, That ... ot now come, the enemy beeing so nigh at hand, but that he should forthwith see ... field as forward as the forwardest against the enemy. Czarnieuiche had then vnder Ouer throw ... vnto the Turks. his command 13000 of the most choice souldiers in the army: who vpon the signall of battel on both sides giuen (for the Turks were now also ready) first according to his promise set forward, as if it had bin to haue giuen the onset: but being come neere vnto the enemie, forthwith (as he had before agreed) caused his ensigne to be let fall, and his men with their caps vpon the K points of their spears and swords, in token of their voluntary yeelding and submission, to bow downe their heads and bodies; whom the Turks with their spears and lances holden vpon hie, ioyfully receiued as their friends, or rather as men taken to mercy. The rest of the army almost discouraged with this so sudden a reuolt of so great a man, retired in hast to the Vayuod, crying out vnto him, That all was lost. But he nothing discouraged therewith (as a most resolute man in the most sudden dangers) with comfortable words cheered them vp, willing them as couragious men to follow him against the enemy, whom they in all things exceeded, excepting number, which alwaies gaue not the victorie. The Turks perceiuing the Moldauians lately reuolted, vpon the ioyning of the battell (as men in conscience wounded) to shrinke backe, Traitors iustly rewarded. thrust them perforce into the head of their battel, making of them no more account, but to L blunt the enemies swords; and such as hung backe, they themselues slew: vpon whom as false tiarrours the Vayuod caused his field pieces to be most furiously discharged; so that most part of these trecherous men there slain, some by the Turks, some by their owne friends, receiued the iust reward of their infidelity and treason, accompanied with perpetuall infamie. Ouer the The battell betwixt the Turks and the Moldauians. dead bodies of these traitors the Turks comming on ... ere at the first notably encountered by the Moldauians; and after a most cruell fight, as if th... d been discouraged, began to retire, but indeed of purpose to haue drawne the Christian... ore they were aware, within the danger of their great ordnance, and ambushes, which th... d before aptly & couertly placed for that purpose. Which Suiercewius well acquainted ... he Turks fineneſſe, perceiuing, with much ado staid their further pursuit, and so auoided ... nger prepared for them. The Turks deceiued of their expectation, came on againe afresh ... no lesse fury than at the first: whom M the Christians right valiantly receiued, and made w... m a most cruell and mortall battel; The Moldauians ouerthrowne. wherein many both of the Turkes and Christians fe... neuer rise againe. But what was ... mal a power against such a world of men? after long ... the Moldauians oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, began to giue ground: & seeing no ... remedie, but either to fly or

A or to die, betooke themselues to flight, wherein most part of them were slain, the furious enemie still hardly pursuing them at the heeles: of the Cossackes were left onely two hundred and fiftie. The horsemen (the chiefest strength of the Vayuod) thus by the treason of Czarnieuiche ouerthrowne, the Vayuod with twenty thousand footmen, and such horsmen as had now after the battell ioyned themselues vnto the footmen, retired vnto a towne not far off, which The Vayuod hauing fortified himselfe within the ruines of an old towne, is besieged by the Turkes. he but a little before had rased; but was now glad in the ruines thereof to fortifie himselfe against the sudden and furious assaults of the Turks: who the same night so beset the Vayuods camp with such a multitude of men, that no man could go in or out of the campe; or the vttermost part of that hugie armie be from any place descried.

The next day (which was the 11 of Iune) the Turks shot diuers great shot into the Vayuods B camp, but to small purpose; for the Christians had (for so short a time) notably fortified themselues within the ruines of the old towne. Which the Turks well perceiuing, and withall considering how hard and dangerous a matter it would be to assault the Vayuod in his strength: they sent messengers vnto him, to persuade him without delay to yeeld himselfe, & to repose more trust in the mercie of the Turks, than in his owne broken forces; especially in his so hard distresse, being so beset, as that he could not possibly escape; and out of hope of all relefe, and therefore should by such voluntary yeelding, seeke for grace of his enemies, rather than by a desperat obstinacie to cast himselfe into a most certain destruction, where no mercy was to be expected. Wherunto the Vayuod answered, That he was not ignorant into what danger he was brought, rather by the treason of Czarnieuiche and his followers, than by the valor of the ene- C mie; yet had left with him a strong power of most valiant & resolute men, who would in his quarrell and defence of themselues, sell their liues very deare vnto the Turks: neuertheless, that to auoid the farther effusion of bloud, he could for his part be content to yeeld vnto his hard fortune, so that the great commanders of the Turks army would condiscend vnto such reasonable conditions as he should propound, & for the performance thereof giue him their faith, not once or twise, but seuen times by solemn oath to be taken. Of this his offer the Turks accepted, willing him to set down the conditions: which were, first that the Polonian Cossacks might in safety depart into their country, with their horses and armor: then, that they should without any violence offered to his person, send him aliue & in good safety vnto the great emperor Selymus, before him to answer his owne cause: as for the Moldauians, he said he needed D not to couenant any thing, for that the iniurie offered vnto them tended also to the hurt of the Emperour himselfe, and of him whom he should appoint Vayuod, whose subiects they were. These conditions (as reasonable) were well liked of the Turks, and so according to his desire, confirmed seuen times by the solemne oath of euery captaine and commander in the armie, both for themselues and their followers. Vpon this agreement, the Vayuod brought al his armie out of their trenches wherin they had lien strongly incamped, and there with heauy heart tooke his last leaue of his souldiers, to the generall griefe of them all: amongst whom he diuided such mony & iewels as he had, as a remembrance of his kindnesse. And there in the sight of them all disarming himselfe, accompanied only with Osmolius a Polonian, went in maner of a suppliant to the Turks camp, where he had ful foure hours talke with the great commanders E of the armie; vntill that at last Capucins Bassa (either offended with his speech, or vnmindfull of his faith before giuen) with his scimitar vpon the sudden strucke him a great blow ouerthwart The Vayuod shamefully and perfidiously murthered by the Turkes. the face, and another crosse the bellie: whom so wounded, & as yet but halfe dead, the Ianizaries tooke and cut off his head, which was forthwith set vp vpon a lance, for al men to behold. His dead body they bound by the feet vnto two camels, & so shamefully tore it in pieces: and happy was he that could get any little piece therof, or embrue his sword with the least drop of his bloud. This was the lamentable & wofull end of Iohn the Vayuod of Moldauia, a right valiant and worthie man, shamefully murdered by the perfidious Turks; who had he been more constant in the Christian faith, had not happily fallen into so great miserie. Whose wofull fall may serue as a most notable example of the vncertaintie of these worldly things: for as no man F for a time had of the Turks moe or more glorious victories, so in the end, and as it were in demonstration of mans fragility, no man perished more miserably. The Vayuod thus perfidiou... ... urthered, the Turkes with like treacherie foorthwith set vpon the Moldauians, and slew ... down right as beasts appointed for the slaughter. Which the Cossackes beholding, and hoping for no better measure, thrust themselues into the thickest of their enemies, & there valiantly liantly fighting were all slain, except some few of the better sort reserued for ransome, among whom was Seuerentius with some other captains; who were afterwards for great sums redeemed, when as they could by no means be perswaded to forsake their religion and turn Turke.

All Valachia made subiect to the Turks.

After this victorie and bloudie murder of the Vayuod, the Turks ouerran all Moldauia, & put to the sword all the nobilitie of that countrie, with many of the countrie people: of whom they also as their manner is in countries new conquered, sent great numbers in colonies into the farther parts of the Turkish empire: & for the more assured possession therof, placed strong garrisons in euery towne and castle, as they thought it most conuenient. Thus all Valachia (both the higher and lower) fell into the Turks hands in the yeare 1574, and was by Selymus ioyned vnto the Turkish empire, none of the least things by him done: for beside the gaining of so great a country (the most assured bulwarke of Polonia) he hath therby opned a faire and easie way for his successours, at their pleasure to enter into Podolia, or Russia, parts of the Polonian kingdome, yea and into Polonia it selfe: which they will vndoubtedly in time doe, if God in mercy bridle not their immoderat desires, and with his mightie hand prouide for the dangerous state of that Kingdome.

Selymus at the same time, not a little grieued with the losse of the kingdome of Tunes, and that Don Iohn had there done the yeare before; began forthwith to cast in his minde, how he might again recouer the same, and withall, thrust the Spaniards out of the strong castle of Guletta; which they had now almost fortie yeares kept, euer since that it was by Charles the fift taken from Barbarussa in the yere 1535: for he well saw it to be a matter of no small moment, to whom this strong fortresse (standing so commodiously in the frontiers of Affricke) belonged. There was still (til is) vpon that coast diuers of the Turks aduenturers, which liuing altogether vpon spoile, had to that place safe recourse, as to a most assured refuge: and if no bootie were to be got with their ships, then would they run out towards Malta, Sardinia, Sicilia, & the other Ilands thereabouts; yea oftentimes into Italie and Spaine, and from thence carrie away with them great booties both of men and cattell, and whatsoeuer thing else came in their way: for which cause many of the Turks men of war resorted thither in hope of purchase. But after that Guletta was possessed by the Spaniards, they were not only depriued of that so commodious an harbor, but many times intercepted euen by them of that place, and by the gallies of Malta: which two places serued as two most sure bulwarkes against the Turkes and Moores aduenturers, by whose meanes they many times came short home. For which cause the Turks, especially these pyrats (of whom the Turke maketh great account, as not his least strength at sea) wonderfully desired to haue both those strong places gotten out of the hands of the Christians. In the castle of Guletta was continually a strong garrison of a thousand Spaniards, who kept them of Tunes in great subiection, and oftentimes cut short these pyrats and rouers, who much troubled those seas. Wherefore the Turkish Emperor Selymus, hauing made great preparation both for sea and land seruice, commanded Sinan, Piall, and Vluzales, his chiefe Bassaes, & men of great experience, with all speed to passe ouer with his fleet into Affricke, to besiege Tunes and Guletta. Who when they had put all things in readinesse according as they had in charge, set forward, and with three hundred saile of gallies came before Guletta the thirteenth day of Iuly: whether also resorted vnto them other the Turks men of war from Alexandria, Algiers, and other places in, such number, as that al that coast seemed to be couered with shipping. The Turks at their first arriuall laied siege to the water tower, wherein were eight hundred souldiers well prouided of all things needfull for defence, who most valiantly maintained the place, vntill such time as that most of them being by the often assaults of the enemie slaine; the rest by the commandement of the captaine retired to him into the castle. In taking of this tower the Turks lost 3000 of their men.

Guletta besieged by the Turks.

After that, they began to besiege the castle of Guletta, against which they cast vp diuers mounts, and from thence most terribly battered the castle: from whence the deadly shot was sent again among them not sparingly; so that in one day 200 great shot were reckoned to haue bin shot out of the castle amongst the thickest of the enemies. But after many furious assaults, too tedious to report, and much harme done on both sides, the Turkes to their great aduantage tooke the channell of the lake of Tunes; and fearing least some reliefe should bee sent to the besieged, maintained their assault day and night without intermission. Neuertheless, certaine companies of Spaniards sent from the new castle by Serbellio, got into Guletta; after which which, they in the besieged castle sallied out, and the twentieth of August repulsed the Turks, with an exceeding great slaughter. But the Bassaes fully resolued vpon the winning of the place to gage their whole forces, and without ceasing still bringing on fresh souldiers, after they had all the day continued a most terrible assault, at length about two houres after Sun set, they tooke the castle the 23 day of August, when there was now scarcely two hundred souldiers left aliue to defend the same; who altogether with the other weake people in the castle were without mercie cut in pieces. What wealth the Turks found in this castle, is hard to say; but certaine it is, that they had therein great store of victuals, armour, shot, and pouder, and foure hundred great pieces of artillerie.

Guletta thus taken, the Turks forthwith laid siege to the new castle, appointed by Don Iohn the yeare before to haue bin built betwixt Guletta and Tunes, which was not yet altogether finished: wherein the two antient and valiant captains, Serbellio and Salazar (left there of purpose for the building thereof by Don Iohn) lay with a garrison of foure thousand good souldiers. The Bassaes when they gaue the first summons to the castle, the foure & twentieth of August, required to haue it forthwith deliuered vnto them: to whom Serbellio stoutly answered, That he had promised the king his master, to giue him a better account of the place; & being now also very old, could not indure the Turkes heauie yoke, but would therefore hold it out vnto the last man: which both he & Salazar truly performed, not omitting any thing that was by men to be done for defence of the place; and sallying out, sometime the one, and somtimes the other, made great slaughter of the Turks, giuing them also repulse vpon repulse when they came to the assault. But the great Bassaes, little feeling, and lesse regarding the losse of men, so that therby they might gain the place, after many most terrible and desperat assaults, at length (namely the thirteenth day of September) when they had with al their force for the space of six houres furiously assaulted the castle, and slaine most of the defendants, at last tooke it. Serbellio shot in with two bullets, and wishing rather to die than to fall into the hand of the enemie, thrust himselfe into the middest of the Turkes, there to haue perished: but by the hastie comming in of Piall Bassa, both he and Salazar were taken aliue, as for all the rest that followed them, they were put to the sword. The Bassa in his rage strucke Serbellio, and the more to grieue him, caused his sonne to be cruelly murthered before his face. Neither was this victorie by the Turkes obtained without bloud, hauing in lesse than three moneths space that the siege endured, lost aboue thirtie thousand men.

The new castle besieged.

The notable constancie of Serbellio.

The new castle taken.

These strong holds (the greatest strength of that kingdome) thus taken, the Turks marched to Tunes, which they easily tooke, and afterwards ouerthrew the fortifications therof, because it should no more rebell. Mahomet the yong king, but the yere before placed in that kingdome by Don Iohn, was there taken, and in bonds sent aboord to be carried with Carrera captaine of Guletta, prisoners to Constantinople: and thus the kingdom of Tunes, with the strong castle of Guletta, fell againe into the possession of the Turkes, to the farther trouble of the Christian countries lying ouer against it. The proud Bassaes hauing (as they thought) best disposed of all things at Tunes and Guletta, departed thence, & with their fleet of 400 saile, came the fourth of October within sight of Malta. But vnderstanding that they of Malta were prouided for their comming, and remembring what dishonor their most magnificent Emperor Solyman had not many yeares before there sustained (whereof diuers of them had bin eye-witnesses) they turned thence, and sailed directly to Constantinople.

Tunes yeelded to the Turke.

Shortly after, this great Emperor Selymus spent with wine and women, vnto whom he had giuen his greatest strength, died the ninth of December, in the yeare of our Lord 1574; when he had liued one and fiftie yeares, and therof raigned eight, and lieth buried at Hadrianople. He was but of a mean stature, & of an heauie disposition, his face rather swollen, than fat, much resembling a drunkard. Of the Othoman Kings and Emperors he was of least valour, and therefore least regarded, altogether giuen to sensualitie and pleasure: and so dying, left his empire vnto Amurath his eldest sonne, a man of more temperance, but not much greater courage; who neuertheless by his valiant Bassaes and men of war, did great matters, especially against the Persians, the mortal and dangerous enemies of the Turks, as shall be hereafter in this Historie declared.

THE LIFE OF AMVRATH THE THIRD OF THAT NAME, SIXTH EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

C THe death of the late Emperor Selymus was for feare of the inſolent Ianizaries notably concealed by the great Baſſa's, vntil ſuch time as Amurath his eldeſt ſonne, then in Aſia, by ſpeedie meſſengers aduertiſed thereof, about twelue dayes after arriued at Conſtantinople, and there receiued into the Seraglio, tooke poſſeſſion of the Empire the fiue and twentieth day of December, ſolemne amongſt vs Chriſtians, for the natiuitie of our Sauiour Chriſt Ieſus. He was about thirtie, or as ſome write ſeuen and twentie yeares old when he began to raigne, of a manly ſtature, but pale and corpulent, wearing his beard thin and long : in his countenance appeared not the fierce nature of the Othoman Princes, being indeed himſelfe of a peaceable diſpoſition, a louer of juſtice, Amurath takes vpon him the Turkiſh empire the 25 day of December in the yeare 1574.

The deſcription of Amurath.

D and in the manner of his ſuperſtition very zealous. The riot and exceſſe growne amongſt the Turks by his fathers euill example, he reformed by his owne temperance, and the ſeuere puniſhment of notorious drunkards : yet is it reported, that he would oftentimes himſelfe drinke plentifully of wormewood wine : he was much ſubiect to the falling ſickneſſe, and ſore troubled with the ſtone : more ſpare handed than was for the greatneſſe of his ſtate : and yeelding more to the counſell of his mother, his wife, and ſiſter, than of his great Baſſa's, which was of many imputed to him for ſimplicitie. At his firſt comming to Conſtantinople, to appeaſe the murmuring of the Ianizaries (grieued to ſee themſelues ſo diſappointed of the ſpoile of the Chriſtians and Iewes, which they were woont to take in the vacancie of the Empire) hee beſide the vſual largeſſe which the Turkiſh Emperours at their firſt entrance into the Empire beE ſtow vpon them, augmented alſo their dayly wages, and granted them this priuiledge, That their ſonnes as ſoone as they came to be twentie yeares old, ſhould be inrolled amongſt the number of the younger Ianizaries, and be partakers alſo of their immunities ; whereby hee woon their fauours exceedingly. And immediatly to rid himſelfe of all competitors, he after the vnnaturall manner of the Turkiſh policie, cauſed his fiue brethren, Muſtapha, Solyman Abdulla, Oſman, and Tzihanger, to be all ſtrangled in his owne preſence. The mother of Solyman pierced through with the cruell death of her yong ſonne, as a woman ouercome with ſorrow, deſperatly ſtrucke her ſelfe to the heart with a dagger, and ſo died. At which ſo tragicall a ſight it is reported that Amurath let ſome teares fall, as not delighting in ſuch barbarous cruF eltie, but that the ſtate and manner of his gouernment ſo required.

He periſheth the Ianizaries, and augmenteth their priuiledges.

He ſtrangleth fiue of his brethren.

A deſperat woman.

In the beginning of his raigne he eſtabliſhed diuers wholeſome lawes, altered the coine, and bountifully relieued the poore. And albeit that he was of a milde and peaceable nature, yet becauſe he would not ſeeme to degenerate from the Othoman Princes his progenitors, he proſecured his fathers wars, and by the Tartars called Præcopenſes, in the moneth of October in the yeare 1575 entred into Ruſſia, part of the Polonian Kingdome, where hee burnt and deſtroyed Ruſſia inuaded by the Turks. Leon. Goreci de Bell. Iuonic.

destroyed two hundred noblemens houses, besides an infinite number of townes and villages, G made great slaughter of the poore countrey people, and carried away great numbers of cattel and prisoners bound in thongs made of raw hides. But whilest they were diuiding the spoile with Peter the new Vayuod of Valachia, who had before solemnely promised to giue the Tartars passage that way, the Polonian Cossacks, who had lien waiting for their returne vpon the riuer Boristhenes, brake into the Tartars country, and there requited them with like harme, and brought backe with them a number of old captiues, who little expected that their so sudden deliuerance.

The Polonians at this time were at variance among themselues about the election of their new king; Henry Valoys their late king being the last yeare, after the death of Charles his brother the French King secretly stolne from them into France, to take vpon him that kingdome: H after whose departure some of the Polonian Nobilitie made choice of Maximilian the Emperor: other some no lesse inclining vnto the choice of the great Duke of Muscouie; and some vnto others also. Whereof Amurath vnderstanding, and loth that either of those two great Princes his enemies, should be inuested or strengthned with that so great a kingdome, and so neere vnto him; to hinder that their election, and to bring in another of lesse power, & so lesse dangerous vnto himself, euen in the beginning of his raigne wrot vnto the Polonians to that purpose, commending vnto them Stephen Battor the Vayuod of Transyluania for their King, in manner following:

Amurath God of the earth, Gouernour of the whole World, the Messenger I of God, and faithfull seruant of the great Prophet, vnto the most honourable Nobilitie and Counsellors of the Kingdome of Polonia, greeting.

Amurath his letters to the Nobilitie of Polonia.

It is not vnto the world vnknowne (most honorable and prudent Senators) our Noble Progenitors to haue of long time and for many yeares holden good friendship and religious leagues with the kingdome of Polonia: For which cause it hath seemed good and reasonable vnto vs, to put you in remembrance of this so antient a league and bond of friendship; for that we vnderstanding your Kingdome to be of late become destitute of a King, by the departure of the noble King Henry your crowned King (discended of the royall race of the French Kings) our friend: who for the small regard you had of him (so great and K worthie a Prince) and for your disloyaltie, is departed out of your Kingdome, without purpose of returning any more into Polonia. Whereupon, as it is reported vnto vs (but how truly we know not) you passing ouer your said crowned King Henrie, are about to make choice of a new King, and especially of Maximilian the Emperour, or of the Duke of Muscouie, both men of running wits, and of vs greatly hated: for why, you may well know they will be troublesome and grieuous not vnto euery one of you only, but euen vnto vs also. Wherefore be you ware that you be not deceiued; and take heed lest your confederations and leagues cannot long by their valour and prowesse be established; and withall consider well the great dangers and losses which you may thereby fall into, whereof we haue thought good to giue you a taste: wherefore beware that heauier things befall not your State. We know there are right noble and L wise men amongst you, which know better than they how to rule and gouerne: and if so be it please you not to make choice of any of your owne Nation, there is not farre from you one Stephen Battor Prince of Transyluania, a man of great honour and valour, by whose labour and dexteritie you may easily procure the peace and quiet of your Kingdome. Whereas if you shall doe otherwise, we take to witnesse your God, and his seruants our Great Prophet, to destroy all your wealth and goods, which together with your selues, your wiues, and children, shall be giuen for a prey vnto our soldiers; with the chiefe men of your cities of Cracouia and Leperis: which for all that we say not as any thing at all doubting of your fidelitie and constancie towards vs. As for the rest, which it pleased vs by word of mouth to haue told vnto you, we haue giuen charge vnto this our Embassador and Counsellor, vnto whom our desire is that you should giue full credence. From Constantinople the last of September, in the yeare of our Prophet Mahomet 983, and first of our raigne. M

This the Great Sultans commendations so much prevailed with the Polonians, that nor withstanding that Maximilian the Emperour was by the Archbishop of Gnesna and som others chosen king, yet was that his election by the greater part of the Nobilitie reuoked, and both

A both he and the great Duke of Muscouie being passed ouer, the noble Princesse Anne (of the most honorable Iagellonian house) chosen Queene of Polonia: yet with this condition, That she should marry Stephen the Vayuod of Transyluania, to them by Amurath commended. Who afterward elected King, all the time of his life right worthily gouerned that noble kingdome, not only defending the same in such state as he found it, but also notably extending the bounds thereof, enlarging it with such territories as he by force of arms got from his neighbors, especially the Muscouite. Of this election Amurath would oftentimes afterwards boast and say, That he had giuen the Polonians their King. But of him, and of the league by him made with Amurath, more shall be said hereafter.

Stephen Vayuod of Transyluania vpon the commendatiō of Amurath chosen king of Polonia.

The yeare following, great troubles arose in Persia, whereby the flourishing state of that B most mightie Kingdome was sore shaken, and opportunitie giuen for the Turkish Emperour to inuade the same; which he laying hold vpon, entred into that bloudie warre, which to the great quiet of the Christian commonweale, for long time after exercised the forces of those most puissant Princes one vpon another. For the better vnderstanding whereof, it shall not be amisse compendiously to set downe the same troubles of the Persian kingdome, the very ground of the long and mortall war betweene those two most mightie Monarchs.

Old Tamas the Persian King, sonne to the noble Hismael, who with great glory had more than fiftie yeares worthily gouerned that large kingdome, and mightily withstood the often inuasions of the Turkish Emperors, now spent with yeares, died the eleuenth of May in the yeare 1576, leauing behinde him eleuen sonnes; namely Mahamet the eldest, of an infirmitie
C in his eyes syrnamed Codabanda, a man of a peaceable and quiet disposition, more delighted with the sweet pleasure of a contented life, than the carefull honours of so great a Kingdome: Ismahel the second sonne, of a more fierce and troublesome nature, so much abhorring quietnesse, that not regarding the league hardly concluded betwixt his aged father and the Turkish Emperors Solyman and Selymus, he would now and then without his fathers knowledge vpon a youthfull heat breake out into the frontiers of the Turks dominions, and there make great spoile; for which doing, although he was both of his father and the people the more regarded, yet was he by his fathers commandement (who in outward shew seemed to mislike of those his youthfull pranks, tending to the breach of the league) restrained of his libertie, and sent to the castle of Cahaca, betwixt Tauris and Casbin, where he remained at the time of his D fathers death: Aidere the third sonne, no lesse ambitious than was his brother Ismahel, but not of like valour, kept by Zalcan, Pyry Mahamet, and other his kinsfolkes, all men of great power and authoritie: The other eight were, Mamut, Solyman, Mustapha, Emanguli, Alichan, Amet, Abrahim, and Ismahel the younger.

The eleuen sons of Tamas the Persian King.

The old King before his death had by his last will and testament solemnly appointed Ismahel his second sonne to succeed him in the kingdome; as of all his sonnes most fit to take vpon him so great a charge. Which thing Mahamet his elder brother seemed not much to dislike, contenting himselfe with such honours as his father had before bestowed vpon him.

Ismahel appointed by his Father to succeed him in the kingdome.

Tamas thus dead, Ismahel was by the Sultans sent for to Cahaca, to take vpon him his fathers kingdome at Casbin; when in the meane time there arose a great tumult in the city, yea euen E in the kings palace: for Aidere the third brother, who in the time of his fathers greatest sickenesse had entred the chamber where he lay drawing towards his end, and in his sight most presumptuously set the royal crowne vpon his head, to the manifesting of his ambitious desires, for which he was then worthily reproued: now after the death of his aged father, caried headlong with the same aspiring humor, and supported by Zalchan and other his mighty fauourits, had so effectually dealt with the great ladie Periaconcona his eldest sister, and the other Sultans Counsellours of Estate, put in trust to see the will of the dead king put in execution, as that the succession could not be any longer kept from him, & preserued for Ismahel, but by the help of some fine and secret deceit. This ladie Periaconcona (elder than all the yong princes the sons of Tamas, her brethren, a woman of great spirit and deep conceit) left in great trust by her father, F seeing the proceedings of her brother Aidere, durst neither openly to moue any thing vnto the Sultans, preiudicial to his designes, neither could she in her heart indure so great an iniury to be done to her brother Ismael, appointed by his father to succeed him. Wherfore in this perplexity, she cast in her wily head, how to satisfy her ambitious brother present, how to saue the right of Ismahel absent, the honor of her dead fathers will and testament, and the safety of the kingdome.

Aidere aspireth to the kingdome of Persia.

dome. For hauing thorowly debated the matter with the Sultans, ſhe reſolued that Aidere G inueſted in royall apparell, and ſetled in the great gallerie, ſhould attend the acclamation of the people, and be there openly enthroniſed as the very elected King. With which vaine ſhew the vnwiſe youth (blinded with ambition) ſuffered himſelfe to be led: and being ſet in his ma-jeſtie, eaſily perſuaded himſelfe, that he ſhould now be honored both of his friends and foes, as King. But vnto theſe his ſo haſty and proſperous deſignes, the ſucceſſe that ſprung from the ſubtiltie of thoſe Counſellors and his diſſembling ſiſter, were nothing conformable: for that ſhe by their aduice tooke order for the gates of the palace to be preſently locked, leauing at euery paſſage a ſure gard, and onely one wicket open, ſafely warded with a companie of moſt faithfull and valorous captaines and ſouldiers, wholly deuoted to Tamas and Iſmahel: with ſtraight charge, to ſuffer euery man to enter in, ſauing onely the knowne friends of Aidere. In H this ſort did ſhe thinke to haue entertained the young man, vntill ſuch time as Iſmahel ſhould arriue at Cahaca, and ſo put in execution what he thought beſt for the honour of himſelfe, and the generall quiet of the kingdome.

Who joyeth now but Aidere? in conceit a king, repleniſhed with vnwonted joy receiuing honour from all men ſauing from his beſt friends. By means wherof perceiuing now the prohibition of them, and moued alſo with the great ſtir of Zalcan his greateſt fauorit (who diſcouering the deceit, and crying vpon king Aidere, threatned the lady, the Sultans, and the reſt that waited vpon the feigned ſucceſſion, indeed ordained but for the ſcorne and diſpight of the ambitious man) ſtrucken with an exceeding feare, and full of ſorrow, hee withdrew himſelfe cloſely amongſt certaine women in the court, hoping ſo to find ſome way to eſcape with life. I

In the meane time greatly increaſed the cries and threatenings of the friends and fauorits of Aidere (who now had all of them prepared themſelues for ſome dangerous and pernicious attempt) that the Counſellors, with conſent of the ladie his ſiſter, were inforced to take order, That to bereaue this tumultuous and ſeditious people of all their hope and courage, Aidere ſhould be depriued of his life. Whereupon Sahamal the Georgian, vncle to Aidere by the mothers ſide, by the appointment of the ladie Periaconcona & the Sultans, after long ſearch made for him, at laſt found him hidden amongſt the women, and without further delay taking him by the lockes, ſtrucke his head from his ſhoulders, and in the place where Zalchan and the reſt of his vnfortunate fauourites ſtood crying and threatning, amongſt the thickeſt preiſe of the proud conſpiratours flung the head all bloudie and as it were yet breathing for heat; crying K aloud vnto them, Behold there your King, enioy him at your pleaſure. At which ſudden and horrible ſpectacle euery man burned in rage and anger: neither for the preſent wanted there manie a raſh head, that vainly threatened moſt cruell reuenge: but in the end, when they perceiued the neere ſucceſſion of Iſmahel ineuitable, and the death of Aidere irreuocable, euery man betooke himſelfe to his owne priuat affaires, and ſo at laſt diuided themſelues one from another, and ſo departing from the Palace, ſcattered themſelues ſome one way, ſome another, euerie man as he thought beſt for his owne ſafetie.

Aidere ſlain, and his head caſt amongſt his Fauorits.

Iſmahel ſaluted king.

Shortly after, Iſmahel the deſired king arriued at Casbin, where he was of his ſiſter and the Sultans joyfully receiued as their lawfull & vndoubted ſoueraign, & with the great acclamation of the people ſaluted king: who as ſoone as he ſaw himſelf poſſeſſed of the royal ſeat, & his L power now anſwerable to his deſires, he after the manner of the Turkiſh policie, moſt vnnaturally cauſed the heads of his eight yonger brethren to be ſtricken off: & withal vſed ſuch farther diligence, that not only all thoſe which were neere vnto them in bloud or affinitie were bereaued of their liues, but alſo all the fauorits of his late ſlain brother Aidere, were deſtroyed in that publike ſlaughter: ſo that all the ſtreets of Casbin were defiled with bloud, & all the city reſounded with mourning & complaints. Which vnexpected cruelty, altogether vnworthy ſo worthie a thought king, ſo altered the minds of his ſubiects in general, that all their former hopes were now conuerted into new fears, and their joy into mourning. But much greater and far more lamentable did the miſeries grow, as ſoon as it was giuen out, That he would change the religion of the Perſians (who with great deuotion honour their fooliſh Prophet Aly) into M the ſuperſtition of the Turks (who with no leſſe impietie obſerue & maintain the wicked rites of Ebubekir, Haumer, Oſman, & others, by them ſuppoſed to be the moſt true ſucceſſors of the great Prophet Mahomet.) For by meanes of this vnc[illegible] noueltie and vnexpected chang and by force of an Edict concerning that matter, publiſhed by this new King, many of his prophane

He murdereth eight of his yonger brethren.

A prophane Prieſts, many of the gouernors of his friendly and ſubiect cities (too much deuoted to their former ſuperſtition, were driuen ſome into exile, ſome clapt into priſon, ſome had their eyes pluckt out (among whom was the Caliph of Casbin) and not a few others in ſundry ſorts depriued of their liues. Yea many Ladies joyned in bloud with Iſmahel himſelfe, and diuers others of his kinſfolkes (to whom neither ſex, nor age, nor innocencie, could be a ſufficient defence) endured ſundrie torments and ſtrange calamities: ſo that in Perſia was neuer felt greater troubles, or a more dangerous change.

In this ſo great an innouation, and among theſe tumults, there went abroad withall a general rumor, not in the cities of Perſia only, but in the regions of the Turks alſo, euen as far as Conſtantinople, That Iſmahel with a puiſſant armie of ſuch as fauored this new proclaimed vanity, B was determined in perſon himſelfe to go to Babylon, now called Bagdat, there to receiue the crowne of the empire at the hands of him that he ſhould find to be the ſucceſſor of their great Calyph, and in the chiefe place among their vncleane Prieſts: as had ſometime Solyman the great Emperor of the Turks, and the Perſian kings of antient times. In this world of troubles, when as the feare of further miſeries increaſed, rather than any hope of antient quietneſſe; he was when he leaſt feared, by the helpe of the aforenamed Ladie Periaconcona ſuddenly bereft of his life: but whether ouertaken in ſome of his owne amorous practiſes, or poiſoned by his ſaid ſiſter; or that ſhe (as ſome probably affirme) hauing ſecretly conſpired with Calil Chan, C Emir Chan, Pyry Mahamet, Curchi Baſſi (being all at that time men of great account, and as it were Preſidents of the kingdome) who diſguiſed in womens apparell, and brought in by her, ſtrangled him at ſuch time as he had priuatly withdrawne himſelfe amongſt his paramours, is vncertaine. Howſoeuer it was, ſufficeth it, that he by the helpe of the ſaid ladie Periaconcona, was by vnnaturall death taken out of this world the foure and twentieth day of Nouember, in the yere of Grace 1577; to the exceeding joy of all thoſe nations, who by his death thought themſelues now freed of many great and dangerous troubles: when he had raigned on yeare, ſeuen moneths, and ſix dayes. 1577

Iſmahel thus taken out of the way, the ladie began forthwith to perſuade with the great Sultans (the miniſters of Iſmahels death) that as they had for the general good of Perſia contriued
D the death of the late king; ſo now that they would take vpon them the protection of that great kingdome, with the preſeruation of the majeſtie and libertie thereof, vntil ſuch time as it were knowne who ſhould worthily ſucceed in that Crowne, which now remained in their hands. There was at that time many of the greateſt Princes and Gouernours of that kingdome aſſembled at Casbin, there gaping after ſuch mutations of thoſe troubleſome times, as might beſt ſerue their priuat deſignes. Emir Chan burning in ambitious deſires, was in hope by meanes of a match to be made with a ſiſter of Periaconcona (who was alreadie greatly inclining vnto him) to be exalted to the ſoueraignte of all Perſia. Mirizi Salmas the chiefe Sultan hoped on the other ſide to aduance into the Eſtate, either Mahamet Codabanda the eldeſt brother of the dead
E King, or els Hamze the eldeſt ſon of the ſaid Mahamet; and by beſtowing vpon him his daughter in marriage (as afterwards he did) ſo to increaſe the glory of his Houſe. Others there were that thought they ſhould be able to draw Abas Mirize (the middlemoſt ſonne of Mahamet) out of Heri, and to make him King. Neither wanted the infant Tamas his aſpiring friends, whoſe Tutor waited likewiſe for ſome opportunitie to ſettle him in the kingdome, and ſo by meanes of his greatneſſe to make himſelfe greateſt amongſt his fellowes. A number of others there were, that ſecretly waited vpon euery occaſion that time ſhould preſent for their preferment. Howbeit in this ſo great varietie of thoughts, the Sultans anſwered the lady with one conſent, and promiſed her in moſt liberall termes, all the protection that their forces could afford, or their weapons procure: and yet did euery one of them, both in action and word, Chame-like diſſemble their ſeuerall imaginations, whereunto their minds were as prone and readie, as their hearts were cunning cloſely to conceale them.

Amurath the Turkiſh Emperor now wakened, firſt at the death of the old renowned Tamas; Amurath intentiue to the affairs in Perſia.
F and then at the rumour of the deſire Iſmahel had to paſſe with an armie to Babylon, as alſo at the freſh report of the Turkiſh ſuperſtition newly publiſhed in Perſia; and withall throughly inſtructed what harme this late King had done in Perſia, what diſſentions he had raiſed, and how hardly the prouinces of that Empire had endured thoſe calamities; began foorthwith to thinke hereby a faire occaſion to bee miniſtred vnto him, to take vp Armes againſt the Perſians;

Persians, and matter sufficient suggested for him to put in execution the great desire he had of some new conquest. For it is an antient custome, which is growne to be as it were a law among the Othoman Kings, That they may not challenge their due honors in their life time, nor their [illegible]ments after their death, vnles they attempt some great and ambitious actions and en[illegible]es, and performe some exploit conformable to their Majesty. Amurath therefore bent vpon these great stirs in Persia, would not direct his mind any other way, or take any other war in hand, vntill he might first see what issue these marueilous innouations in Persia would bring forth: which in the person of Mahamet the succeeding King, seemed to be more pregnant than euer before, and ministred vnto Amurath new occasions of victorious and strange hopes. For as soone as Ismahel was dead, the afore named Mirize Salmas (in dignity chiefe man among the Sultans, though in bloud and nobility inferior to them all) after many letters dispatched to and fro, at last assured Mahamet Codabanda, how with all quietnesse of minde, and securitie of person, he might come and possesse himselfe of the kingdome. He was also aduertised by [illegible] said Salmas, of the whole conspiracie plotted against his brother to bring him to his end; a[illegible]e-wise made acquainted, how the fraudulent Ladie, with the Sultans, had capitally con[illegible]d against himselfe: and how she, fauoring Emir Chan, and Abas Mirize of Heri her nephew & his son, more than became her, did little regard the due and rightfull succession of him being the eldest brother. So Mahamet bearing himselfe vpon the faith and diligence of Mirize Salmas, and desiring withall to see his eldest son Hamze Mirize aduanced to some such soueraign dignities as he saw was due to the liuely hope euery man perceiued to be in him, in regard of his vertue and [illegible] managing the commonwealth and matters of warre (wherein also he shewed h[illegible] s father jealous and sulpicious, lest some other man should vsurpe vpon him th[illegible]onor and authority which so properly appertained vnto him) resolued in the end not to leaue the kingdome in the hands of priuate persons, nor the lightnesse of an vnconstant woman of suspected modestie, and a rebellious conspiratour against her owne bloud, wherewith she had without any pittie or remorse of conf[illegible]ce, now twice defiled her selfe. And therefore he wrot backe againe, That he was mind[illegible] to take the rightful succession vpon him, and that for the same purpose he was putting himse[illegible] vpon his journey: with straight charge notwithstanding, That Mirize Salmas should before his entrance within the gates of Casbin, present him with the mischieuous head of Periaconcona; a woman (in respect of the scorne exercised against her brother Aidere, and of the treacherous death of her other brother Ismahel, and of the peruerse imaginations which shee had conceiued to cause the succession to fall into other mens hands, & of the prodigal familiaritie which she had with some of the Sultans) wel worthie of a thousand deaths. Secretly did Mirize Salmas put in execution whatsoeuer Mahamet had priuatly enioyned him, so that by his meanes he was presently and solemnly proclaimed King of Persia. And afterwards hauing gathered together many squadrons of men wholly deuoted to the bloud and name of Mahamet, the same Mirize Salmas met him on the way, carrying the head of that manlike Virago Periaconcona vpon the point of a lance, with her haire dispersed, and some other vncouth sights to the terror of the beholders. From which nouelties (one mischiefe as it were hudling vpon the necke of another) there sprung vp diuers inward hatreds, sundrie tumultuous seditions, and much ciuile wars: this new King by the instigation of Mirize Salmas, seeking on the one side to be reuenged on the Sultans for his brothers death; and they on the other side opposing themselues with all their power against him, the State of Persia began to fall into great inconueniences, and of these nouelties to reape new losses. Sahamal the Georgian fled into his mountaine of Brus, fearing the wrath of his new Lord: Leuent Ogli likewise another of the Lords of Georgia, vnderstanding of the flight of Sahamal his neighbour, estranged himselfe so farre from his old loue and antient deuotion towards the Persian Kings, that he seemed now to desire some new innouation. The Nations also that were neighbours to the Turks, and the people of Media Antropatia (now called Siruan) disliked of this new King: and in the end it appeared, that Persia vnder this king, through many mutations, was in short time fallen into most notable miserie, and the state therof more weakened than it had been of long time before.

Mahamet resolueth to take vpon him the Persian kingdome.

Mahamet proclaimed king of Persia.

The head of Periaconcona prefitted to Mahamet on a Launce.

Of all these things had Amurath from diuers place[illegible]telligence, but more particularly from Vsteff of Van (a citie of Armenia the greater, scituat[illegible]pon the lake of Actamar) who sent h[illegible] most perfect information of all the stirres in Persia; Discoursing vnto him of the death of Ismahel, mahel, the consultations of the Sultans, the trecheries and death of Periaconcona, the broils betweene the King and the Sultans, the nature of the new King (being diseased in his eyes, little esteemed of his subiects, besotted in affection towards his sonnes) the facilitie to ouerrule the chiefe Gouernors of the Georgians, and the people of Siruan, euill affected towards the new King: and to be briefe, whatsoeuer had in truth succeeded in Persia, and might enflame the mind of the ambitious Sultan, to conuert his forces against an enemie of small counsell, and much confusion: adding thereunto, that neuer was there greater opportunity to ouercome that king, than now was offered, and therefore wished him, not in any case to let slip so faire an occasion, as the Othoman Kings had neuer before, for the obtaining of so certaine and glorious victories.

Amurath of long time wholly bent to marke the euent of the troubles in Persia, now stirred vp with these aduertisements from Vsteff, setled himselfe more deeply in his former conceits to proue his forces in subduing the Persian king, the antient enemy of the Othoman Emperors, and his onely corriuall and odious competitor in the East. But no one thing did more enflame him thereunto, than to thinke, how he should haue to his enemie a king not acquainted with deeds of armes, doting vpon his children, and weakned with the dissention of his subiects: and on the other side entring into the consideration of his owne forces, of the infinit number of his men, both horse and foot, of the meanes he had to find money; of his artillerie and engines of war, wherin he far surpassed the Persians; he did more and more retolue with himselfe, to take the occasion that was now offered him to begin the war. For the compassing of which his purpose he was greatly fauored by the present state of Christendome, at that time beeing wholly in league and amitie with him. So not finding any thing contrarie to his designements, hee resolued at last to confer with the chiefe Bassa's, which had the gouernment of his empire, Whether it were better vpon this occasion to begin the prepensed war; or if they thought not this opportunitie to be so fit, then to lay it aside, and to conuert his forces and counsell against the commonwealth of Christendome. For such is the barbarous policie whereby this empire is mannaged, That it is lawfull for them to breake any league, be it by neuer so many promises or solemne oaths confirmed, whensoeuer any enterprise is to be attempted for the aduancing therof. So that although this war could not be moued either against the Persians or Christians without breach of their promised faith: yet among the manifold consultations that passed among the great Bassaes, there was not any man found that made any account of that defect, but al with one accord, without further respect sought to set forward the ambitious desire of their proud lord and master. At last after long consultation and large discourses, it was agreed vpon by the great Bassaes Mahomet, Sinan and Mustapha, That it would by better and lesse danger to attempt war against the Persians, than against the Christian Princes. Mustapha amongst the rest preferring the valor of the Latines (whereof he had made good trial especially at Famagusta) before the armies & forces of the Georgians & Persians. Whereby it is apparant to the world, that neither the zeale of their religion, nor any iniurie receiued from the Persian king, but only the ambitious desire of Amurath (to subdue a kingdome, both in his owne conceit and other mens relations, euill gouerned, by an effeminat and sottish king, and through ciuile dissention brought into great danger) was the first prouocation of making this war.

No assurance in the Turks league.

Ambition the cause of the Persian war.

Vpon this resolution there arose new consultations touching the manner thereof, and vpon what coast they should begin their iourny, for the more honourable successe thereof. Which point Amurath greatly vrged, protesting before his chiefe counsellors, That he would not enter into that warre, except he were in great hope to beare away the victorie. Some thought it most conuenient to send the army to Babylon, & from thence to Syras, called in old time Persepolis, the chiefe citie of the country of Persia: others there were that gaue aduise, That the armie should be directly sent to Tauris, there to erect strong fortresses, and to take possession of all the countrie round about it: and there wanted not some (as it is reported) that thought it better to send two seuerall armies for both the forenamed places; & so by bringing the enemy into a strait, to enforce him to yeeld to whatsoeuer should be of him required. But Amurath durst not repose such confidence in his forces, as to thinke, that with his battels diuided and so weakened he should be able to conquer that enemie, who had alwaies most valiantly fought against the monstrous and puissant armies of his ancestours. And therefore firmely resolued with himselfe, to send one only army, and so with his vnited forces to seeke the ouerthrow of the enemie. And so preferring the strong hope he had conceiued to conquer the countrey of Siruan, and the chiefe cities of Media the great, before the difficultie of making war vpon the coast of Scyras, reposing also great hope in the notable helpe that was promised him by the Tartars called Præcopenses, he confirmed the great Bassaes his counsellors in the same opinion: and withall discouered vnto them a matter, which to all of them, but especially to Sinan, seemed most strange; namely, that he was determined not to go himselfe in person with his army, but to send one of his worthiest captains in his stead. The causes why he so did, were many, but especially, for that he was troubled with the falling sickneſse, and feared greatly (and that not without good cause) lest his son Mahomet (being much fauored of the people) might peraduenture in his absence be vntimely aduanced to the empire; beside the dangers that he suspected at the hands of the Christian Potentates: and withall perswaded it to be vnto himselfe a great honour to performe those things by his seruants, which had in those countries bin vnfortunatly attempted by his most noble predecessors in their owne persons.

While they were thus consulting about the expedition, and the great Bassaes, Sinan-pha, and others, made means to be sent as the Soueraigne ministers of their lords designment, hee dispatched away sundrie posts and light horsemen, with order to the Bassaes and Gouernors of Van, Babylon, and Erzirum, in the frontiers of his dominions, That they should by often inrodes spoyle the townes and castles of the Persians, and by all means to doe them what harme they could. Which they were not slacke to put in execution, and especially Vlfref (or rather Husreue) Bassa of Van: who with often incursions did much mischiefe, as well in the subiect to the Persian king. A forcible preparatiue for greater troubles

Vlfref Bassa beginneth the wars in Persia.

Now in these great preparations for the Persian war (which for many yeares after notably exercised the greatest part of the Turkes forces, to the great quiet of the Christian commonweale) Stephen Bathor the late Vayuod of Transyluania, but now by the commendation of Amurath become King of Polonia; in the beginning of his raigne, by his Embassadour the great lord Iohn of Syenna, entred into a strong league and confederation with the great Turkish Sultan Amurath at Constantinople. Which for that it sheweth in what tearmes that famous kingdome then and yet standeth with the Turkes great empire, and withall containeth matter well worth the Christian consideration, it shal not be impertinent to our purpose (omitting the long and glorious stile of that barbarous Monarch, seruing to no other end but to shew the greatnesse of his power) plainely to set it downe as it was on his part at the same time by him confirmed.

The League betwixt the most puissant and mightie Princes, Sultan Amurath the Turkish Emperour, and Stephen king of Polonia, agreed vpon and concluded at Constantinople, in the yere of our Sauiour Christ Iesu 1577, and of the Prophet Mahomet 985.

The league betwixt Amurath the Turke Sultan, and Stephen king of Polonia.

I Sultan Amurath, the sonne of Selym Chan, the sonne of Solyman Chan, the sonne of Selym Chan, the sonne of Baiazet Chan, the sonne of the Great Emperour Mahomet Chan, &c. Prince of these present times, the onely Monarch of this age, of power able to confound the power of the whole World, the shadow of Diuine clemencie and grace, Great Emperour of many Kingdomes, Countries, Prouinces, Cities, and Townes, Lord of Mecha, that is to say, of the house of the glorie of God, of the resplendent Citie of Medina, and of the most blessed Citie of Hierusalem, Prince of the most fruitfull Countrey of Ægypt, Imen, Zenan, Aden, and many other such like: In most louing manner declare, That the most glorious and renowned Stephen King of Polonia, great Duke of Lithuania, Russia, Prussia, Masouia, Samogitia, Kiouia, Liuonia, and many other Countreyes moe, Prince of the couragious followers of Iesus, Gouernour of all the affaires of the people and Familie of the Nazarets, the welcommest cloud of Raine, and most sweet fountaine of Glorie and Vertue, eternall Lord and Heire of the felicitie and honour of the aforesaid noble Kingdome of Polonia, vnto whome all the distressed repaire for refuge, wishing most happie successe and blessed end to his actions: offering vnto vs many religious vowes, eternall praises worthie our perpetuall loue and most holy League, and with great deuotion performing these and other like honours, for

A for the dispatch of his Letters to our most glorious Court, for the new confirming of the most sacred league and confederation with vs, sending the honourable Lord Iohn of Syenna (his most faithfull counsellour) his Embassadour to our Imperiall Court; declaring his loue and integritie, and purging himselfe of all the suspition of hostilitie, hath requested the league and confederation to be renewed. At whose instance wee haue giuen these our letters confirming the said league of peace and confederation: Wherein we command, That none of our Counsellours, Beglerbegs, Sanzackes, Generals of our Armies, Captaines, or Seruants, shall doe, or on my behalfe presume to doe any hurt vnto the Kingdome, Countries, Cities, Castles, Townes, Islands, or whatsoeuer else to the Kingdome of Polonia belonging. And in like manner, that none of the Nobilitie, Generals, Captaines, or others whosoeuer belonging vnto the king of Polonia shall dare to doe any harme vnto my Kingdomes, Cities, Castles, or Townes confining vnto the

B Kingdome of Polonia. In briefe, my will is, that he being a mortall enemie vnto mine enemies, and a fast friend vnto my friends, shall doe no grieuance or harme vnto any my subiects, or things whatsoeuer vnto my iurisdiction belonging. So in like manner commanding also, that no hurt by any meanes, or for any occasion be done by our people vnto the subiects, or whatsoeuer else vnto the iurisdiction of the King of Polonia apperta ning.

The creatures, Embassadours, Messengers, and men of whatsoeuer condition else, shall on both sides freely without let or trouble come and goe without any harme receiuing, either in their persons or goods.

It shall be lawfull also for the King of Polonia his subiects, to seeke throughout our Empire for any the Polonian captiues taken before the time of this league; and the same so found (if they haue not receiued the Turkish Religion, but still remaine Christians) to redeeme without the contradiction of any

And that whatsoeuer shall be taken and carried away after the confirmation of this league, shall be all againe freely and without any thing paying, deliuered and restored.

That the merchants on both parts may freely traffique with all kind of merchandise in the blacke and white sea, as also vpon the maine; and so paying their vsuall and lawfull custome, to be in nothing wronged or molested.

If any of the Polonian merchants shall die in our dominion, the goods of him so dead shall not be embeseled, but kept in safetie vntill his brethren or other his friends shall come with the king of Polonia his letters: vpon the shewing whereof, hauing also our letters mandatorie, the goods shall be forthwith re-D stored vnto the dead mans heires. In which sort also my merchants shall be dealt withall, if any of them shall chance to die in the kingdome of Polonia.

If any wrong be done within the limits of mine Empire, vnto any belonging vnto the kingdome of Polonia, after the date of these letters confirming the league; the doer of the wrong shall by my commandement be sought out, and being found shall be punished, and the wrong done, without any delay or contradiction forthwith recompenced. And the like Iustice to be also on the behalfe of the king of Polonia administred.

If any debtor shall depart out of mine empire into the Polonian territorie, whersoeuer he shall chance to be found by his creditor, he shall be brought to the Iudge of that place to be examined, and whatsoeuer is shall be proued him of right to owe, the Iudge of that place shall according to the equitie of the cause

E make the creditor to be satisfied.

But if the debtor cannot himselfe personally be found, no other man shall by reason of another mans debt be taken, detained, or molested: neither shall the innocent be troubled for the guilty, in either or both our kingdomes.

In briefe vpon whatsoeuer conditions and capitulations the league of peace and confederation was in the time of my father, my grandfather, or great grandfather of famous memorie, made with the kings of Polonia vpon the same conditions and capitulations be it now made also.

Whatsoeuer hurt hath hitherto bin done to either part by reason of the disagreement of the Gouernors and Captaines, shall all be on both parties neglected and forgotten.

Also after the time of these letters confirming the league and confederation, Whereas the King of F Polonia shall in time pay a certain summe of money vsed to be paied vnto the Tartars, the Tartar Chan and his sonne Mirzeleby their Princes, shall restore the same again, and not to dare to suffer his armies by any meanes to hurt the Polonian territories. So that on the part of the Tartars and their armies no harme shall be done vnto the kingdome of Polonia: neither on the part of the Polonians, to the territories of the Tartars. And if any harme shall by the Tartars be done in the king of Polonia his territories, it shall all by my commandement be againe restored. And so likewise on the part of the Palatine of Mol- G or the inhabitants of the kingdome of Moldauia, no harme shall be done vnto the countries sub-the King of Polonia: but if any be done and certainely knowne, to be by my commandement compenced.

On the part also of the King of Polonia and his subiects, whatsoeuer harme shall be done vnto the ter-ritorie or subiects of the Moldauian Palatine, or Tartars, the harme so done to be recompenced, and the doers thereof punished.

Also that all such fugitiues as hauing done any notorious felonies or other villanies in Moldauia, and so are fled into Polonia, shall at my request, or at the request of the Palatine of Moldauia, be restored, and in no case denied.

That all the Polonian captiues within my dominions, yet professing the Christian religion, may by the H King of Polonia his subiects be redeemed, not paying any more for them than their Lords and Masters paied: euery such master of the slaue taking his oath that he cost him so much. But such capt as haue receiued the Turkish faith, to be forthwith set at libertie: and so the Turks slaues in the King of Po-lonia to be likewise manumised.

That our Embassadors on both sides (so long as we are in league and amitie) may freely come and go, and not be staied in any place, and being willing to meet together, may at their pleasure so doe. And being entred into the confines of either part, to be forthwith by some good and faithfull guide appointed vnto them, conducted vnto the place they are to goe vnto. And this to be on both sides kept.

No man to dare to hurt or stay any merchant, hauing paied his thirtieth part, or lawfull custome.

If any of our subiects shall haue any suit with any of the King of Polonia his subiects, the Iudges shall I be bound to administer Iustice. All theeues and robbers shall be diligently sought out; and being found, to be seuerely punished: and the goods taken away, without impeachment to be restored vnto the right owners, their heires, or to the King.

The Sanzackes of Silistria and Bolograne, the Customers and Water-baylifes shall not suffer any man but merchants and such as are sent in our seruice, to pa ver the riuer Nyester; who passing ouer, if they shall bring with them any slaue bondman out of Po he shall be sent backe againe. The sheepheards, if they will transport their sheepe into the Iurisdiction of e King of Polonia, shall not so doe without the leaue of the Polonian Gouernours, before whom they shall also number their sheepe: of whom if any shal be lost, the Gouernours shall cause them to be sought for, and to be restored vnto the sheepheards, as also to pay for their hay. K

The Zauzij, Ianizaries, or Posts, shall not dare in time of peace or war, to take any horses from the Po-lonian merchants, or other the Kings subiects comming into our Kingdome.

The Palatines of Moldauia, in whatsoeuer condition they haue been towards the former Kings of Polonia, they shall now also still so be hereafter. The thirtieths and Customes of both parts, shall continue in their old manner, and not be encreased. The Polonian kings subiects and Merchants, as well Armenians as of any other Nation, whensoeuer they shall enter into Moldauia, or any other part of our Empire, shall not trauell by vncertaine and vnknowne, but by the common and high waies: wherein if they shall suffer any losse or harme, either in their goods or persons, the doers of such wrongs shall bee sought for, and seuerely punished. Which merchants shall bee suffered without any molestation quietly to come and goe, hauing paied their thirtieths: and no merchant to be troubled for another L debt.

If any the Polonian Kings merchants or subiects, be willing for ready mony to redeeme and carry away any slaues taken out of the Polonian Kingdome, and yet professing the Christian religion, the Iudges shall in no case withstand them, neither presume to take them from them, or againe redeeme them. But if any of such slaues haue receiued the Turkish religion, they shall not be againe demanded by the King of Polonia.

Such slaues as haue not receiued the Turkish religion, if after a certaine space they shall be set at liber-tie by their masters, and in the letters testimoniall of their libertie, it shall be declared that they haue re-ceiued the Turkish religion; yet shall they not by the Iudges be therefore detained.

In the Citie of Burusa, the Polonian merchants hauing paied their vsuall thirtieths, shall not be far- M ther pressed with any other vnusuall payment.

My will is also, that the territories at this present in so be by him taken from the Muscouite or any other the league, and so to be royally by him possessed.

And

A And for the confirmation of the articles and conditions in these our letters of confederation contained, I sweare by the power of the most mightie God, and of his most holy Prophet, and by the most cleane and pure Spirits of all the Prophets; That for all the daies of my life, and so long as nothing shall on the behalfe of the King of Polonia be done contrarie to the peace and league, nothing shall also on my part bee done contrary vnto the same. Witnesse the Almightie, the vpright Iudge and discerner of mens actions. From Constantinople the yeare of the holy Prophet Mahomet 985, the 14 of the moneth Cziemasit Euuel, and of Christ 1577.

This league betwixt these two mightie Princes Amurath and king Stephen thus concluded, and after the death of Stephen by Sigismund the third (which now raigneth) renewed, as it hath B bin euer since to the Polonian kingdom for the time commodious, so hath it as with an Adamantine band so bound that most famous Kingdome, as that in the hardest distresses of the Christian commonweale, and most indeed concerning it selfe, it hath affoorded no more help than hath the members farther off, which is (I rue to say it) none at all. As in these late and present wars betwixt the Christian Emperor and the two last Turkish Sultans, it is too plainly to be seene: wherein had it in due time giuen but such reasonable helpes as it might well haue spared, much no doubt might haue been done for the repressing of the common enemie, and the recouerie of the greatest part of that is lost of Hungarie: but thus bound, standeth as a dead member, seruing to no vse more than to the more speedie destruction of it selfe, together with C the rest of the sicke bodie. For what assurance it can haue in this long (I must needs say) but euill assured peace, is well to be seene in that in the great consultation of this great Sultan Amurath with his Bassa's after the Persian war, for the inuading of Christendome; the Polonians for all this league so solemnly constrained, were nothing the more regarded, but laid in the same ballance with the least, and preserued only by the Prouidence that all gouerneth: which leading the Turk against the Christian Emperor their neighbor, hath giuen them that peace they were otherwise hardly to haue looked for. Vnto whom for all that, hauing to his endlesse praise maintained a long and most chargeable war, they haue not lent any great help or friendly hand; yet lying themselues still in the Lyons mouth, and like enough to be the next (God grant I be therein deceiued) that is to be of him deuoured.

D But leauing these the heauie conceits of a melancholy mind, and ominous forbodings of that I wish not, to returne againe toward Persia, Amurath his greatest care. Amongst many the ambitious competitors for the managing of these Turkish so great designes, was the great Bassa Mustapha (euen he, who in the raigne of the late Emperor Selymus conquered Cyprus, carrying thence together with his victorie perpetual infamie, for his faithlesse and cruell dealing with Bragadine the worthie and renowned Gouernour of Famagusta) appointed Generall of the Turks army into Persia: and authoritie giuen him, to prouide whatsoeuer he should thinke needfull for so great a warre. And commandement giuen vnto the Bassaes, and other commanders of the greatest part of the Turkish Empire Eastward, that they should themselues with their souldiers of all sorts, bound by their perpetual annuities to go to the warre, in the begin-E ning of the Spring this yeare 1578, repaire to Erzirum, a citie of Capadocia bordering vpon Armenia, there to attend the command of their new Generall. Who hauing his dispatch from Constantinople, and for fashion sake conducted by most of the court ouer the strait to Scutari, and from thence passing through the countries of Amasia and Siuas, in the very beginning of Sommer arriued at Erzirum; and there stayed vntill such time as his people, victuals, artillerie, and other his necessary prouision was come thither. From whence he departed for Siruan, hauing first taken a diligent surueigh of his whole armie, mustering the souldiers of euery Nation by themselues: namely, of the Mesopotamians twelue thousand, of the Assyrians and Babylonians foureteene thousand, of the Syrians two thousand, of them of the Lesser Asia (now comprehended vnder the name of Natolia) ten thousand, of the Iews and Philistims one thousand, and of the Cilicians foure thousand. After whom followed the souldiers of Græcia, the F glorie and hope of all the campe, valiant men, to the number of ten thousand: and after them the familiar and faithfull guard of the Generall, ten thousand Ianizaries of Constantinople, with harquebusies on their shoulders, and scimitars by their sides: of the citie also of Erzirum, and the Iurisdiction thereof, appeared foure thousand, vnder the ensigne of of Beyran Bassa their Generall. All these were stipendaries to the Turkish Emperour: vnto whome other voluntarie untary aduenturers ioyned themselues, in number not inferiour to the rest, but better furnished, and of greater courage. So that in this generall suruey of the armie were found about an hundred and ten thousand men, most part horsemen: yet was there not any stirred out of Arabia [illegible] Affrica, or Hungarie, or other places alongst the sea coasts: neither were the Prouinces whence these souldiers were drawne, left destitute or vnfurnished of their ordinarie garrisons. Besides this multitude of men, Mustapha brought with him fiue hundred small pieces of artillerie, with many loads of mony for his souldiers pay, with further order for the taking vp of more at Aleppo, and other places, if his occasions should so require. He caused also great quantitie of corne to be transported by the Great sea called in antient time Pontus Euxinus, to Trapezond, so to be conueied to Erzirum, beeing but foure daies iourney distant thence. To be short, hauing taken order for all things hee thought necessary for the warre, hee in seemely array departed from Erzirum, and in eight daies arriued at the ruines of Chars, and in the fruitfull countrie thereabout rested himselfe: but was there surprised with such a violent tempest of wind and raine, as rent in sunder his tents, and did great hurt by means whereof many fell sicke and were constrained to forsake the armie.

Mustapha at Chars.

Hauing staied three daies at Chars, the bounder of the Turkish and Persian empires, hee departed thence with his armie, and that euening lodged vnder the mountains of Chielder, supposed to be part of the hils Periardo: where hearing the Persians to be in armes, hee thought it best for the securitie of his armie, so to pitch his tents as that hee might well discouer the comming of the enemie, and not to be assaulted at vnawares. And therefore planting himselfe [illegible] he gaue order that Beyran, Bassa of Erzirum, should take possession of a certaine [illegible] right hand; and Dernis the Bassa of Caramit should keepe another hill that stood on the left hand; and with them Osman Bassa, Mahamet Bassa, Mustassade Bassa, aduenturers, with many others as well stipendarie as voluntarie men, should likewise pitch their tents vpon the same hils, in such sort, as that they making as it were two wings to the camp, might discouer the comming of euerie man, and yet he himselfe being shadowed with the two hils, might lie vnperceiued of any.

Mahamet the new king of Persia, as yet scarcely setled in his kingdome, stirred vp by the fame of these motions, resolued in himselfe to stand vpon the defence of his state, & for a time to dissemble the conceiued hatred which he bare to some of the Sultans of Persia, and princes of Georgia, and to make some apparant shew that hee was reconciled to them; for that without them he could not promise vnto himselfe any form of an armie, or defence: wherein (notwithstanding all the troubled state of his kingdome) he wrought so cunningly, that almost all the great men of account tooke vpon them the protection of his state and kingdome. And so Tocomac a Sultan, the Chan and Gouernour of Reiuan, a famous man, well knowne vnto the Turks, and of great reputation amongst the Persians, was chosen Generall of this expedition; with charge, That gathering together the greatest number of men he could out of Atropatia, out of Media the greater, and other places neere vnto the Turks, he should by all means possible stop their passage into Georgia and Media Atropatia. And therupon precepts were sent out into all parts of the kingdome, That all the Chans, Sultans, and souldiers whatsoeuer, should come readie prest to attend vpon their new Generall. Many obedient to the kings proclamation, came; but many there were that would not stir a foot, for their obstinacie in the broiles begun, and for the suspition they had of vnlooked for mischiefes: at whose disobedience the king much grieued; but now there was no remedie but to make the best of the matter, and for the safegard of his honour to make the best resistance they could. So with those few which for the loue of their prince and country were met together in those parts, being in number not aboue twentie thousand, Tocomac was dispatched about his businesse, if happily he might with these small forces oppresse the enemy in some strait and troublesome passage, where the great multitude should rather serue to the confusion of themselues, than to the helpe of one another. These twentie thousand were all horsemen, armed with scimitar and bow, with some harquebusiers among, and furnished with very fine and well tempered armour; but aboue all couragious they were, & resolute, and wel the more, for the valor and prowesse of their Generall. So prouided of all things necessary, they set forward, and keeping the way of Tauris, Genge, they came to the turning of Chars, where they were aduertised, that the enemies armie was already passed.

Tocomac Generall of the Persians.

They

They were now come within a days journey of Chielder, when they sent quicke and faithfull scouts, to bring them certaine news of the condition and number of the Turks army; who came thither euen at the very time that Mustapha was incamping his armie between the two hils, whereupon the two Bassa's Beyran and Dernis, with their people, had alreadie pitched their tents. These scouts discouering the Turkish hoast aloft, persuaded themselues that there was not any other battell than those which they saw vpon the hills; whereof with all speed they could they returned newes to Tocomac, who at ease had followed these his scouts a far off. Tocomac thus misinformed by his scouts of the number of his enemies, held on his way boldly, with purpose to assault them; and hauing discouered their tents vpon the hils, was throughly confirmed in the opinion he had before conceiued of the number of his enemies, & the scouts relation, and with so much the more confidence set forward to assaile them. But Beyran and Dernis, who quickly from the hils perceiued the Persians comming in the plain, although they knew them to be men of great courage, yet reposing an assured confidence in their Generals battell, with all speed mounted vpon their horses, and ran to meet them. So in the aforesayd plaines vnder Chielder, within one houre after noone was joyned a most bloudie battel, wherein at last were slain seuen of the Turks Sanzacks, with a very great number of soldiers, without any apparant losse at all among the Persians, who fighting close together in a great heat, and all bebloudied, vrged their happie and fortunate victorie.

But Mustapha who perceiued all that had passed, and staied waiting till the fight was at the hotest, and the medly at the thickest, that so the flight of the enemies might breed their greater disorder; and now seeing that his people could no longer endure the fury of the enemies rage (euen as if it had lightned & thundred, and as though the earth had shaken) with such cries and acclamations as the Turks vse in their assaults, for the more terror of the enemies, exciting his army, ran as it were headlong vpon his aduersaries, and so renewed a most terrible battell. The Persians wonderfull courage endured this vnexpected and dreadfull assault, and with incredible signes of valour, in that little time of daylight that was left (for the night began now to approch) continued their manifold slaughters, and at last being fauored by the darkenesse of the night, withdrew themselues with as little losse as possibly they might. Neither durst Mustapha any longer pursue them, but was glad by night to returne to his campe. Of the successe of this battell the Persians certified their king; as also of the greatnes of the Turkish army, with their further purpose for the annoying thereof. And by the Turkes also were presented to Mustapha (who had alreadie sent away posts with news to Amurath) 5000 heads, which by their color, countenance, & beards, bewraied themselues to be Persians, and 3000 Persians aliue. Of this victorie Mustapha greatly reioiced, and to make it seeme the greater (seeking by all means to conceale his owne losses, and to raise a greater terror by the fame thereof, amongst his enemies, caused the heads of those three thousand that were brought before him aliue, to be presently cut from their shoulders, and gaue order, that of those heads there should be framed a bulwarke in those fields, for a most horrible and vncouth spectacle.

A bulwarke made of the heads of the slain Persians.

The same day that Mustapha imploied himselfe about this barbarous and cruel worke, there came vnto him certaine messengers from Manucchiar the younger son of the Georgian widow Dedesmit (a great prince in that country) who told him, That with his good fauour and leaue, Manucchiar their lord and master was comming to salute him, and to offer himselfe vnto him as his obedient and deuoted seruant. At which newes Mustapha redoubling his joy, gaue commandement, That all the Bassa's and captains of the army, with all solemne pompe, with trumpets, drums, peales of ordnance, and all other signes of munificall and joyfull entertainment, should go forth to meet the said Manucchiar, and to accompanie him to his presence. Which they did accordingly, and so encountering him with all signes of honor, conducted him to the great pauilion of Mustapha, who there caused him againe to be saluted with like triumph. Manucchiar dismounted from his horse, and against his wil beholding the strange and vncouth pile of heads all pale and filthie to behold, and indeed imagining what the matter meant: yet notwithstanding, before all other things hauing done his due reuerence to the great Bassa, and according to his degree placed himselfe next to his side, after he had presented him with such gifts as his country yeelded, he gaue him to vnderstand, That for the honor & estimation which he bare to the Turkish valor, he was alwaies deuoted to the house of the Othomans; and as he had oftentimes desired to spend his goods & life in their seruice, so at this present time, moued his antient desire, allured by the strange fame of this victorious and wonderfull armie, and C red vp by a particular fantasie, to learne the painfull and hard precepts of the art militarie, vnder such a Generall, commander of other commanders; he offered him all deuotion and more than euer he had done to any heretofore, & himselfe hauing nothing in the world leere vnto him, consecrated his own life to his commandements; desiring that the same might be imployed in the conflicts of war vnder his banners, among warriors and souldiers of fame and renowne: and therefore besought him to accept of him in the name of Amurath, whose obedient vassal he vowed himselfe to remaine for euer.

The answere of Mustapha.

Graciously did Mustapha receiue all this discourse from Manucchiar, and hauing shewed him againe the pile of heads, together with his battels, armor, and prouision of war, told him, That as all these forces are the gift of God, who alwaies fauored the righteous counsels of the Otho- H man Emperors, in such sort that they lord it ouer all the world, euen to the astonishment of all that liue in the world at this day: so had he for his particular chosen the better part in com-ming now to yeeld himselfe, and to submit his obedience to his Lord, although it beene better if he had done it before. And as concerning the desire he had to be his compan-ion and fellow in these warlike affaires, he did very friendly accept of his comming, and promised him all good entertainement and assured safetie. And so in exchange of the presents which hee brought him, he apparelled him in cloath of gold, honored him with a battel-axe and targuet wrought with gold and ammell, and neuer permitted him to go from his pauilion without a traine of his slaues following him.

A terrible rowd tempest

This Georgian prince thus solemnly entertained, the General gaue order thorow the camp, I that they should the next morning remoue from those mountaines: and now euery man was putting himselfe in readinesse, when as there rise a most terrible tempest of winde and raine, mixt with thunder & lightning; which continued with such violence by the space of foure dayes together, as if the heauens had bin dissolued into waters. Whereby it came to passe, that out of the dead carkasses & heads before mentioned issued a most horrible stink: so that thereby, & by the foulnesse of the weather, with the other annoiances always attending vpon so great a camp, the whole army was exceedingly troubled, and diuers diseases arose among the Turks.
But at the last the weather breaking vp, Mustapha rise with his campe, and set forward toward Teflis: and being not able by reason of the foulnesse of the way to passe any farther, that day stayed in the plains, where the lake Ghielder Giol standeth, and there refreshed his sicke and K wounded soldiers: remouing thence, the next day about noone he came to the castle of Archichelec, sometime a castle of the Georgians, but taken from them by Solyman in his wars against Tamas, and euer since holden by the Turks. Here Mustapha surueyed his army, and by diligent account taken, found himselfe to want 40000 of his soldiers: whereof some were slaine in the battell, some were dead of sickenesse, and many wearie of so long and perilous a journey, were by night stolne out of the campe, and returned to take their ease at home. From thence the armie remoued, and lodged at night neere the marish called of the Turks Peruana Giol, or lake of slaues, and the next day came to Triala, where at this day are to be seene the ruins of a great citie and of many churches; whereof some are yet repaired and maintained by deuout Christians, the reliques of those happy and religious forces, that with so great and faithfull zeale L passed the seas and mountaines through those barbarous nations into the holy land, men worthie of eternall praise. The next day the Turks ascended the high and craggie mountaine that standeth vpon Teflis: from the top whereof discending the day following, they seised vpon a castle of the Georgians, called by the Turks Giurgi Chala. Departing thence, and lodging in certaine plaines, the next day they came neere to the riuer that runneth by Teflis. But in these foure dayes march from Archichelec, where Mustapha tooke view of his armie, many of the Turks who in seeking for victuals for themselues and their horses, had stragled from the army, were cut off by the Georgian captaines, who with a number of their owne country souldiers secretly followed the Turks armie, and well acquainted with all the wayes of the country, lay in ambush vpon such places as the victuallers were to passe through, and so suddenly set- M ting vpon them, spoiled them at once both of their goods and liues.

Mustapha comming to Teflis, found that castle emptie for that Daut Chan lord thereof, hearing of the comming of the Turks, forsook the same and tooke himselfe to the fields, pro-uiding better for himselfe in so doing, than by staying still in the castle, to haue bin there taken prisoner.

A soner. This castle for the conuenient scituation thereof Mustapha caused to be repaired and fortified, and planted therein an hundred pieces of artillery, and appointed Mahomet Bassa Generall Gouernor of that place, with a garrison of six thousand soldiers, which done, he departed for Siruan. At which very time those of Soria, which had brought a thousand loads of rent corne to the campe from Aleppo, being themselues in number a thousand person, with fiue hundred others of Omps (in antient time called Hus, the citie of the patient Iob) and other places of Soria, men neither of dutie bound, nor of themselues willing to follow the campe, returned homewards towards their owne countrey: but vpon the way they were set vpon by Alessandro, Giusuf, and Dauid (three of the Georgian lords) and all slaine except some few, who by the swiftnesse of their horses escaped with Nassardin their Captaine.

Alessandro the Georgian sendeth Embassadors to Mustapha.

B Now after that Mustapha had passed the discent of the steepe mountaines of Teflis, the next day he incamped in certaine low plaines; where the Embassadors of Alessandro surnamed the Great, sonne of Leuent a Georgian Prince, came vnto him and told him, That their Lord was readie, if it so pleased him, to come vnto him to do him reuerence, and by word of mouth to promise him that deuotion he had alwayes in minde borne to the Othoman Emperors. With a glad heart and cheerefull countenance did Mustapha receiue these Embassadors: and presenly sent them backe to will their lord to come, and to tell him, That his friendship should be vnto him most deere and acceptable. And after their departure, tooke order with all the commanders of his armie, to receiue him with all the signes of joy that might be; which at his comming was accordingly by them performed. Who after he had presented vnto the Gene-C rall the rich gifts he had brought with him, he offered his obedience to the Bassa with most liuely speeches he could possibly deuise, calling Amurath his Lord: seeming to take it in euil part, that he passed not through his territorie, where he should (as he said) haue had plentie of all things for the reliefe of his army; yet hoping that in his returne from Siruan he would take it in his way; whereas he should find him most readie to bestow all that he had in the seruice of his Lord: telling him moreouer, That although he could not for many vrgent respects go with him into Siruan, yet he would alwayes accompanie him in minde, and continually pray vnto the Creator of all things, for his prosperitie and most happie successe. Courteously did Mustapha receiue both his presents and submission, and in exchange thereof bestowed vpon him certaine gifts after the Turkish manner, and in magnificall termes gaue him answer; pro-D mising him in his returne to passe through his country: and so dismissed the Persian Duke with like honour wherewith he was entertained at his comming.

Mustapha holding on his journey toward Siruan, through mooriſh and troublesome wayes; in twelue dayes after he departed from Teflis, came into the confines of Siruan, neere to the riuer Canac, and there rested on this side the riuer one day. At which time they of the city of Sechi, bordering vpon the Siruanians and Georgians, foure dayes journey from Sumachia, came to offer themselues to Mustapha, as subiects to the Turks. Of whose submission the Generall graciously accepted, promising to them his assured protection.

The Turks armie afflicted with hunger.

The Turks army ouerwearied with the continual trauell of twelue dayes march, but yet far more afflicted with hunger, not finding in those parts so much as one wild beast to assuage their E greedie desire of meat, sought by all means, euery man for himself, to get somthing, especially when they vnderstood their Generall would passe the riuer into a countrey vnto them all vn-knowne, where they were altogether vncertaine what to find for their reliefe. So whilest they were inquiring among themselues, who were able to conduct thẽ to some such place as where they might supply their wants, behold, certain Persians were taken, who being straitly examined on that point, after much resistance at last told them, that not farre off, after they had passed certain marishes, where Canac discharged it selfe into Araxis, they should find many fields ful of ryce & corne in the blade, and a little farther certain fat heards of cattel, sufficient to relieue the whole army. Of this news was the general certified; who although he greatly doubted the subtiltie of his enemies, yet to gratifie his souldiers, and to make them more willing to follow F him into Siruan, he licensed euery man that had a desire thereunto, to go and prouide himselfe of victuals, and so suffered all that would, to go freely. Whereupon there went of themselues, and were sent by their Captaines, about ten thousand seruile persons, with Camels, Horses, and Mules, to fetch away this prouision of corne and cattell: but the euent answered not to their desires. For Tecomac with the other Persian Captaines, and the rest of the souldiers that were were escaped from the ouerthrow giuen them in the plaines of Chielder, hauing gathered to- G gether the remainder of the army, and recouered such places as they thought safe and friendly to them, carefully attended the marching & passing of the Turkish armie. And being certainly informed by them of Reiuan and Georgia, what way they kept, and that of necessitie they must [illegible]e at the banks of Canac, they began to deuise how they might in some measure be reuenged of their former losse, and impeach their enemies entrance into Siruan. But wanting rather strength than courage to assaile the whole armie, they thought it best to stay in ambush in some fit place, vntill some part of the Turkish armie (allured with the prey of the the corne and cattell) should for the reliefe of their common necessities discend into those fields. And the rather to draw them on, sent out diners men, who as if they had gon about their owne businesse, and by chance at vnawares had lighted vpon the Turks campe, reuealed vnto them as H a great secret, what a good prey was hard by them. And so withdrawing themselues out of sight priuily, awaited the comming of the Turks: when as within the space of thre[illegible]es it so fell out, that the aforesaid ten thousand forragers arriued at the wished place; wh[illegible]hey had no sooner begun to charge themselues with the prey, but they were surprised by th[illegible]rsi-ans and all slaine, sauing a few, who by hastie flight saued themselues. The noise of this hot skirmish being heard into the Turkish hoast, caused Mustapha to imagine that the matter was fallen out euen as indeed it was; and therefore rising with his whole army, hasted with all possible speed to haue succored the poore people, who were now all slaine. And albeit hee came not in so good time as to yeeld them reliefe, yet came he very fitly to reuenge their death vpon the Persians, staying too long to load themselues with the spoile of their enemies.

Ten thousand of the Turks forragers slaine.

The place from whence the Turks were to haue had the aforesaid bootie, was almost in maner of an Island, inclosed with the riuers of Araxis and Canac: whereinto Mustapha entred with his whole power, Dernis Bassa leading the one wing, as did Beyran Bassa the other, and he himselfe comming on in the middle with the maine battell. The Persians seeing Mustapha with all his forces hasting towards them, & withall remem[illegible]g the late ouerthrow by them receiued in the plains of Chielder; began to bethinke them[illegible]s how much better it had bin for them to haue contented themselues with the late slaughter of the forragers, and with speed to haue got them away out of that strait, than by staying longer, to be inclosed with the multitude of their enemies, as that they could now no way escape without most manifest peril. In this perplexity discoursing among themselues, whether it were better to fly, or with so great disaduan- K tage to join battel, and so rather to die honorably, than to liue with reproch: at last they reso-lued to reserue themselues to the further seruice of their prince and country; deeming it rather a point of wisdome than of dishonor, not to aduenture vnto most desperat and assured death, so many worthie men as might in future time stand their country in good stead: yet did they not see how by flight well to escape, for that they were in such sort strained within the riuers, as that there was no ground left for them to escape by, than that which contrary to their expectation was by the Turks alreadie possessed. In these difficulties euery man began to betake himselfe to his owne priuat conceit and fortune. Tocomac with Emir Chan and other the great commanders of the armie, were the first that turned their backs, and by the helpe of their couragi-ous horses got ouer the riuer of Canac: whose example mooued many others to attempt the L like, though not with like fortune; for that their horses being not of such courage, and out of breath, lay many of them drowned in the riuer. Wherewith others being amased, as perceiu-ing inuitable death in flying, present before their eyes, and reposing all their hope euen in dispaire, ran as it were headlong in a rage and furie vpon their enemies, and in fighting shewed vnspeakeable valour: but what was one against an hundred? for there they were also all slaine, though worthie of immortall fame. Thus was the Persian armie quite discomfited in this de-mie Island, being first stained with the bloud of the enemy, and afterward with the slaughter of the neighbour and proper inhabitant: and so became the perpetuall sepulchre of a most cou-ragious and warlike people. The Turks in this last conflict lost not not aboue 3000 men, beside the slaughter of the 10000 forragers: although Tocomac to make his losse to seeme the more M tollerable, made report to the king of a greater slaughter made. The Persian Captaines full of The Persians fly and in flying are many of them drowned in Canac.

A fore by the King appointed, and so remained expecting his further pleasure from Casbin.

Mustapha was now come to the riuer of Canac, which he was to passe ouer into Siruan; and therefore made straight proclamation through his whole armie, That euery man should be in readinesse against the next day to passe the riuer. At which proclamation all his people sud-denly arose in a tumult, and with iniurious termes euen to his face reproued his folly and in-humanitie, propounding vtter danger vnto himselfe, & an vniuersall confusion vnto the whole armie: and therfore prayed him to surcease from proceeding any further, vnlesse he were min-ded to cast them all away. But his resolute mind was not by their threats or intreaties to be re-moued, neither gaue he them other answer than this, That so had Amurath commanded, and that if all the rest should shew themselues vnwilling to obey their Soueraigne, he himselfe would not nor could B not, but would be the first man to attempt and performe that which they all so abhorred and reproued. Va-liant souldiers (he said) were discouered and knowne not in idlenesse and ease, but in great paines taking, and difficult enterprises: who neuer ought to be affraid to change this momentarie life for euerlasting honour, or to shun death, if the seruice of their Prince so required. And for mine owne part (said hee) I most earnestly request you, that after I haue attempted the passage of the riuer, if any thing happen vnto me otherwise than well, yet carrie my dead bodie to the other side of the riuer; to the end that if I cannot whilest I yet liue execute the commandement of my Soueraign, I may yet at least performe the same when I am but a speechlesse and liueless carkas: forasmuch as the desire of my Lord is not in any sort to be fru-strated, for making too great account of mine owne life.

The resolute answer of Mustapha to his tumultuous souldiers.

Diuers and sundrie murmurings & whisperings followed vpon this speech of the General, C who notwithstanding the next morning did first of all wade ouer the deepe & swift riuer him-selfe: after whom presently followed the Bassa's with all their slaues, by whose example the rest also were induced at last to do the like, and so continued vntil the darknesse of the night inter-rupted their passage; by which occasion more than halfe the armie could not then get ouer. In this passage, being with great tumult and disorder attempted, it came to passe that about 8000 persons carried away with the violence of the riuer, were miserably drowned, with the great outcry of all the hoast. The like hapned also to many mules, camels, and sumpter horses, vpon whose backes diuers persons being mounted, in hope to haue passed drie ouer the riuer, were likewise headlong ouerwhelmed therein. With great complaints and blasphemous cursings was the whole night spent, by them that were yet on this side the riuer, whose fears were not D a little increased by the example of their vnfortunat fellows before drowned. And like enough it was, some pestilent sedition to haue insued thereupon, had there not a shallow foord by great chance bin discouered, which gaue safe passage to those that were left: for in the passage which the people made that followed Mustapha, the grauell of the bottome of the riuer being raised and remoued by the heauy hooues of the cattel, was driuen down the riuer to a place where by great good hap there was also a foord; and there gathered together in a heape, had in such sort raised the depth of the channel, that it made as it were a shelfe for their commodious passage, so that the remnant of the army, carriages, and artillerie passing ouer the same, there was not so much as one man that perished. So hauing with much difficultie at last got ouer the riuer of Canac, they rested themselues that day and the next, and there staied vntill the whole armie E was mustered, and againe put in order. Remouing thence, the day following they incamped in certain barren champaines where was neither corne nor cattel: neither could they perceiue or learne, that in those quarters were any villages at all. By meanes whereof the hunger of their beasts increasing, they were inforced to giue their horses and mules leaues and stalks of verie drie and withered reeds, & such other like things of little or no sustenance at all: and the men themselues were faine to satisfie their hunger with those vttermost reliques which they were fain to picke out of such poore victuals as now by corruption were become loathsome to mans nature: and that which worse was, they saw no end of these miseries they were so entred into. Notwithstanding there was now no looking back, but needs on they must, and follow the for-tune of their leaders: among whom Mustapha before all the rest set forward on his determined F journy. He had not long marched, but there was discouered good store of sundrie plants, and shortly after a very large plaine countrey all greene and flourishing, and garnished with many trees; by the only sight whereof euery man was refreshed with the hope of reliefe, and with more than ordinarie paces hasted vntil they were entred into those Champaines, abound-ding with all kinde of corne and fruits that could be of an hungrie man desired. In this place did did euery man satisfie his appetite, and forgot in part the forepassed calamities. Through this G fruitfull and pleasant countrey Mustapha leading his armie, at last arriued at Eres, the chiefe citie in that coast of Siruan, as you trauell from Georgia.

This citie of Eres was forsaken of a number of her inhabitants, as soone as it was knowne, that the Tyrks were come to Canac: who all followed their gouernor Samir Chan; who with Ares Chan gouernor of Sumachia, and other the gouernors of Sechi and other places of Siruan, forsooke the cities, & all together withdrew themselues into the mountains, as places of more suretie, attending the euent of these so great motions. So that as the Turkes entred the citie vndisturbed, so were they with the prey they found therein nothing inriched; for that in this common danger euery man had carried away with him the best things he had. Here stayed H Mustapha two and twentie dayes, during which time he erected a fortresse in the said city: whereupon he placed two hundred small pieces of artillerie, and for the keeping thereof appointed Caitas Bassa with a garrison of fiue thousand soldiers. In the meane time also he commanded Osman Bassa (one of the voluntarie captaines) with ten thousand men to possesse Sumachia, sometime the metropoliticall citie of that prouince, with the title of Visier and Gouernor generall of Siruan. Giuing him further in charge, that in any case he should cleere the passage to Derbent, and giue present aduertisements to the Tartarians, of his arriuall there: whom he supposed by that time to be come into those quarters, for that they had before so faithfully promised to Amurath. Osman comming to Sumachia, presently seised vpon the citie, and was friendly entertained of those that remained there: whom he likewise curteously I entreated, without doing or suffering any outrage to be done vpon them. Of which his curteous vsage they of Derbent vnderstanding, sent presently to offer their citie vnto him, beseeching him to receiue them into his protection, and to defend them from the Persians: vnder whom although they had long liued in subiection, yet differed they from them in the ceremonies of their Mahometane superstition, wherein they better agreed with the Turks.

Mustapha returneth out of Siruan.

Mustapha hauing thus brought the countrey of Siruan into the Turkish subiection, and finished his fortresse at Eres, and put all things in such order as he thought best; importuned by the Ianizaries and the people of Grecia, and somewhat inforced by the season of the yeare, which was now far spent; departed from Eres, and turned his course homeward toward the countrey of Alexander syrnamed the Great, as he had promised in his late passage into Siruan. K
And hauing trauelled a long journey, he sent before him certaine engines and pioners to make a bridge ouer Canac, so without danger to passe ouer his armie. Hauing passed the riuer, hee gaue notice to Sahamall (one of the Lords of Georgia) of his arriuall, who presently came and yeelded himselfe as vassal to the Turks: and being entertained of the Bassa with great pompe, and rewarded after the Turkish manner, tooke his leaue, and so returned into his mountaine of Brus.

Mustapha setting againe forward, and trauelling by night, because he would not lose the opportunitie of the faire weather, by the error of his guids lost his way, and so fell into rough and difficult passages, whereby he was inforced to stay and wait for day light: which arising, did manifest vnto them, that they were now entred into the countries of his friend Alexander. And L therefore he gaue forthwith proclamation through all the armie, That no man vpon paine of death should be so hardie as to molest or disquiet any of the subiects of Alexander, but to haue good respect vnto them, and to entreat them with all curtesie. The day following he still trauelled on in the same country, when there arriued from Zaghen certaine Embassadors of Alexanders, with great abundance of cattell, corne, fruits, and other reliefe sent for a present to the Generall, with a solemne excuse that he came not himselfe, because the infirmitie of his bodie would not suffer him. Wherewithall Mustapha rested satisfied; and leauing the citie of Zaghen on the right hand, caused the messengers of Alexander to guide him the way to Teflis: which they so directly did, that within the space of three dayes they conducted him thither with his armie, without the feeling of any annoyance; from whence they returned, being well rewarded for their paines by the Generall. Who now come to Teflis, found the garrison hee M had there left for the keeping thereof, so hardly pinched with famin, that they were glad to eat cats, dogs, sheepskins, and such like vnwonted food: for neither durst they for feare of the enemie go out of the castle to prouide for themselues; neither if they had so done, had it any thing auailed, such was the carefulnes of the enemie in keeping of his things: but now by the coming

A ming of the Generall they were relieued with meat, money, and plentie of all things. Hauing staied there two daies, he put himselfe againe vpon his way; and with fire and sword destroied whatsoeuer came in his way in the Champains subiect to the said city: only the sepulchres of Simons progenitors (lord of that country) were left vntouched by the Turks fury. The next day they trauelled ouer rough and ragged mountaines, full of a thousand difficulties, which were the more encreased by wonderfull great snowes that were fallen: by reason whereof, many soldiers, horses, camels, and mules perished. In which distresse the army continued two daies; during which time the souldiers were fallen into such a disorder, that forgetting the feare of the enemies countrey wherein they were, euery man without regard tooke vp his seueral lodging apart, some here, some there, where they might finde either some thicke bush or some B small cottage, or some quiet valley to shelter themselues in from the wind, the snow, and the stormes. Of which disorder certaine Georgian lords vnderstanding by the scouts which from time to time waited vpon the Turks armie, ioyned themselues together, & in the night secretly approched vnto it, expecting the opportunitie of performing some notable exploit: and hauing obserued, that Hosaine Bey had withdrawne himselfe with his regiment from the rest of the armie vnder certaine mountains, to defend himselfe from the storme and wind; they tooke the occasion presented, and so assailing him, slew his slaues and al his squadrons; tooke a great bootie of many loads of money and apparell; led away with them all his horses, and whatsoeuer else they could find, and scarce gaue him leisure to saue himselfe, by flying into the tents C of Beyran Bassa. The next morning the Turks remoued, and in the euening came to a castle called Chiurchala, where they staied a whole day to make prouision of victuall: which was attempted by sending abroad many of their slaues into the fields, conducted by them of the castle; who were all miserably cut in pieces by the Georgians. From this place the Turks armie departed in great hunger, ouer diuers rough places of the Georgians, where they were oftentimes faine to rest themselues: and at last came to the confines of Dedesmit, of her called the widowes countrey. In the entrance whereof, they must needs passe thorow a narrow strait, be- The miserie of the Turks army in passing the straits of Georgia.
tweene certaine mountaines, where the riuer Araxis windeth it selfe with a thousand turnings in the low vallies: a dangerous place, and so narrow, that no more but one man alone could at once passe through it. Betweene this strait and a very thicke and hillie wood, they lodged vp-D on the banke of the said riuer: and from thence they remoued the next morning, and trauelled ouer very steep mountaines and rough forrests, ouer yce and snow more harder than marble, and ouer other hanging rocks, in such miserable sort, that many camels, mules, and horses, tumbling downe headlong into the riuer, there miserably perished. Through these ruinous crags and diuers other miseries, they marched al the next day, and after that another day also, as miserable to the army as the former: and so at last being sore afflicted with hunger, spoiled of the enemy, tormented with the hard season of the yeare, and scituation of the place, they arriued in the territories that lay vnder Altunchala, or Golden Castle, the princely widowes pallace, where they found all maner of relieue, for all the miseries they had endured since their departure from Chiurchala, by the space of six daies: which if it had bin a faire common trauelled way, E might haue been performed in one onely daies iourney.

The widow, with Alexander her eldest sonne, came downe from her castle, and went vnto the pauilion of Mustapha; offering him diuers Presents, & promising vnto him all faithful obedience. Whome Mustapha courteously receiued, declaring vnto her, what honourable entertainment he had giuen to Manucchiar her younger sonne there present, who had bin with him in all the expedition into Siruan. And for the present, dissembling the priuy displeasure he bare against Alexander (whom he thought to haue bin one of them that spoiled the Sorians in their returne from the campe) he embraced him courteously, and prayed her to be content to leaue him also there with him: giuing her farther to vnderstand, that he would send both her sonnes to Constantinople to Amurath, with letters of credence for their yeelded obedience, for their fauour shewed to his armie, in giuing it so secure passage, and so many helpes: and lastly, that F for their good deserts, they might be of the said great Sultan both honourably entertained and rewarded. The aged Ladie, although her mind was herewithall sore troubled, yet outwardly in her countenance shewed her selfe pleased; and seemed courteously to yeeld, what shee was of necessitie constrained to grant: as well for that hee was alreadie possessed of one of her sonnes, as also for that both herselfe and her whole state were now in his power; and as it were

In this place Mustapha hauing refreshed his army two daies, departed thence toward Chars, an... ...ny daies trauell at last arriued at Erzirum, to the great reioycing of the whole ar-mie, ...ch was there presently discharged by the Generall, without any mustering at all, and leaue giuen for euery man to returne into his countrey.

Mustapha setling himselfe in Erzirum, dispatched posts with letters of plentifull aduertise-ments to his great lord and master, of all things that had passed: not forgetting to magnifie his owne exploits aboue measure. He certified him of the battels he had had with the Persians, the obedience he had receiued of the Georgians and Siruanians, the mutinie of his owne sol-diers, the fortresse hee had built at Eres, the garrisons left in that citie with Caitas Bassa, and in H Sumachia with Osman Bassa: and in briefe, whatsoeuer else had passed, and whatsoeuer he had taken from the enemy. Neither did he faile to propound vnto Amurath, what he thou... ...on-uenient to be attempted the next yeare, for the strengthening of those places hee ha... ...eady conquered, and for preparing the way for new enterprises. And principally he put him in mind of a fortification to be made at Chars, a place very fit for any passage into Georgia or Ar-menia, by situation fruitfull and commodious both for men and cattell. And withall he sent vnto him the widowes two sonnes, Alexander and Manucchiar, the Georgian princes, certifying him of their submission, and that hee had receiued in their countrey all good entertainement and friendly welcome: and withal declaring his opinion, That Manucchiar was the meeter man for gouernment than his brother Alexander, and the readier to do him seruice. Greatly did Amu-rath commend the valor and diligence of Mustapha, and highly pleased himselfe with this con- I ceit, That of these beginnings might grow mightie conquests, to the enlargement of his Em-pire, and that by this meanes he should be able to surpasse the glory of his predecessors. And the more his ambitious thoughts were occupied about these wars, the lesse he troubled him-selfe with thinking how to annoy Europe with his ...rces.

It was not long after the departure of Mustapha ...rom Eres, but that the Tartarians hauing left the fens of Meotis, and the vnmountable shores of the Blacke sea, and hauing passed ouer the rockes vpon Cholchis, and surueyed the frozen crags of the mountaine Caucasus, were now arriued vpon the confines of Siruan, and there attended the commandment of the Turks. These Tartarians beeing of them that are called Præcopenses, to the number of thirtie thou- E sand, conducted by their lord and captaine Abdilcherai, a yong man of great valor and fame, and of a comely personage, were come according to the faithfull promise of Tartar Chan, with a full resolution to attempt whatsoeuer should be commanded them in the name of Amurath. Now Osman Bassa vnderstanding of their approch, according to the charge before giuen him by Mustapha the Generall, enuited them to enter into Siruan, and by encreasing of the Turkes forces, to further these beginnings of Amuraths glory, and these his conquests (or more truly to say, these magnifical & famous termes of victory.) All which was most diligently put in ex-ecution by Abdilcherai: who hauing entred the yron gates where Derbent standeth (which by the Turks at this day is called Demir Capi, and signifieth the gates of yron) & so from thence passing into the countrey of Siruan, there staied, and thereof gaue aduertisement to Osman, as L was by him appointed. Ares Chan late Gouernor of Sumachia, who for feare of the great army of the Turks, had abandoned the city, the chiefe place of his charge, and betaken himselfe to the safegard of the mountains, hearing of the departure of the Turkish Generall, resolued with the other Gouernours of Eres and Sechi (who following his example, had in like manner fled) now to returne againe to their forsaken country, and to make proofe if he could by any means take reuenge of the iniurie done vnto him by the Turks. So passing vnder Sumachia, & hauing put to the sword certaine of Osmans straggling victuallers that were gone out of the citie, he en-camped with all his people a little from Sumachia, and by good fortune surprised certaine messengers sent from Abdilcherai the Tartar, to certifie Osman Bassa of his arriuall, and to know his pleasure what hee should put in execution. These Tartarians brought before Ares, after M much torture disclosed the letters they carried: whic... t... Persian captaine read, and consider-ing the great number of the Tartarians that were con... r the letters made mention of th... thousand) he resolued not to stay any longer in those quarters, but presently raised his cam... and retired towards Canac, meaning from thence to certifie the king of those nouelties, and

A vpon the banks of the said riuer to attend the kings answer. The Tartarian captaine comming to Sumachia, was appointed by the Bassa to passe ouer the riuer of Canac, into Genge, the coun-trey of Emanguli Chan, with the spoile thereof to enrich himselfe, and by all means to make his arriual vnto the Persians most terrible. With this charge the Barbarian departed, thirsting now for nothing more than for the bloud and spoile of the enemy: and with posting iournies came to Canac, where Ares Chan was yet encamped: whom he vpon the sudden most furiously as-saulted, and like a deuouring flame discomfited all his hoast. And taking him aliue, sent him to Sumachia to Osman, who forthwith caused him to be hanged by the necke out of a lodging in Ares chan hanged at Sumachia. the same statehouse where he had not long before sat as Gouernour. The Tartarian after that, swimming ouer the riuer, and coursing a little aboue Genge, found Emanguli Chan with his B wife, and all his familie, and a great part of the nobilitie of Genge in a valley hunting the wild Emanguli chan taken, & Genge sacked by the Tartarians. boore, and assailing him, put him to flight, took from him his wife, al the ladies, & many slaues, and slew many of the rest that were come thither to see the sport: and after that, rode on to Genge, which he tooke, and yeelded it wholly to the furie and lust of his barbarous souldiers, who left no manner of inhumane crueltie vnattempted, in satisfying their immoderat and bar-barous affections. And so being loaded with the spoiles, & weary with the slaughter of their enemies, they returned merrily toward Siruan: & passing again ouer Canac, came to the high-er side of Eres into certain low champaigns, enuironed about with hils, & there hauing pitch-ed their tents, without any feare setled themselues to sleepe and to rest their wearie bodies.

In the meane time, and long before these actions, were newes come to the Persian court of C all the Turks proceedings: whereupon the Persian king hauing gathered new forces, had dis-patched Emir Hamze Mirize his eldest sonne with 12000 souldiers to passe into Siruan, to see what hurt the enemy had done, and to attempt the reuenge of the forepassed iniuries; but aboue all things to punish the villany of them of Sechi, and the other cities of Siruan, that not induced with any necessity, had so voluntarily yeelded themselues to follow the obedience and religion of the Turks. The Persian Prince departing from Casbin, accompanied with his mother Begum, who would needs follow her beloued sonne, was on his way towards Siruan, vnder the guiding and gouernment of Mirize Salmas, chiefe of the Sultans; and had now left behind them the countries of Ardouil and Caracach, when he was certified by the aduertise-ments come from Ares Chan, of the arriuall of Abdilcherai, with his great number of Tartarians; D and was thereby at the first strucken into a great quandarie, and almost out of comfort: yet pricke forward with an honourable desire of glorie and reuenge, hee prosecuted his intended enterprise for Siruan, and hastening his iourney, came to Eres long before the king his father thought he could haue so done. This his notable celerity ...rued him to great purpose, for that Eres recouered by the Persians. Caitas Bassa was boldly gone out of the fortresse, and went spoiling the country, carrying away with him what soeuer he met withall, and committing such insolencies as hungrie souldiers be-yond all honestie vse to do in strange and fruitfull countries. But when he was in the midst of these spoiles, and least feared the enemy, he was suddenly assailed by the Prince; and hauing no meanes to escape his fury in this extremitie, after a fierce and bloudy battell (wherein the Turks although in number few, yet shewed many effects of valor) he was there slaine with all his sol-E diers, leauing the fortresse, the spoiles, and the country committed to his custodie, free to the pleasure of the victor: which the Persian Prince hauing once againe gotten into his posses-sion, tooke away the two hundred pieces of artillerie that were left in the fort by Mustapha; and presently sent them to Casbin to his father.

The Prince encouraged with so happie a beginning, leauing his mother at Eres, followed on his iourney toward Sulachia, but by the way descending the hils, he discouered where the Tartarians lay encamped. Whereupon he stood in great doubt, whether to aduenture vpon so mightie an enemie, or to content himselfe with the victorie he had already gotten, and so to returne into Persia: to returne he thought it too great a shame, and chose rather to aduenture himselfe to most manifest perill. And therefore descending the hill, and drawing nigh the MF enemie, he perceiued that the armie was all laid downe to rest, and that their horses were some couched, some standing, but al vnsadled: whereupon without any stay setting spurs to his horse, he pricked forward with all his hoast, and most terribly assaulted the Tartarians, now buried in their spoiles and sleep; and hauing slaine their first and second watch, although with some losse, among the tumultuarie souldiers he made an vniuersall confusion and slaughter, putting some some to flight, killing others, and taking diuers of them captiues. Among whom was their Ge- G nerall Abdilcherai, who was taken aliue, and sent to the king.

Sumachia besieged by the Persian Prince.

After these victories, the Persian prince scoured to Sumachia, and compassed the city round about, wherein the Turkish Bassa Osman sat as Gouernour, to the reproch of Persia; and there encamping himselfe, sent word to Osman, That if he would yeeld himselfe, he would let him depart with life and goods: otherwise, if he would obstinatly hold it out, and not yeeld the citie, which he so vniustly possessed, he should be constrained to surrender it by force, & his life withall. Osman who as then knew nothing of the Tartarians ouerthrow, but still hoped of their returne, thought it best to entertaine the Prince with faire words vntill their comming; and therefore gaue him courteous answer, that he was very ready to yeeld vp the city: but withall intreated him, that he would stay but for three dayes, and grant him time to put all things in H readinesse, that so he might freely depart, as it had pleased him in courtesie to offer. The prince glad of such an answer, supposing it to haue proceeded of a sincere meaning, expect[ed] the Turke the performance thereof. But Osman meaning nothing lesse, than to commit himself to the faith of his enemie, and seeing that the Tartarians whom he looked for, appeared not, hee resolued to saue himselfe by secret flight; doubting, as hee had good reason, that if he should longer stay, to be betraied by the inhabitants of the citie themselues: and therefore somewhat before the assigned term of three the daies appointed for the surrendring of the citie, he by the help of a darke night, and the couert of the high and rough crags, with great silence withdrew himselfe out of Sumachia, carrying away with him all his substance, and so in safety arriued ■

Sumachia yeelded vnto the Turkes.

Derbent. The next morning the inhabitants of Sumachia opened the gates of the citie to the I Prince: who seeing their infidelitie, first by giuing of entertainment to Osman, and now by helping him to escape, without giuing him any knowledge thereof, did put in execution the effect of his wrath & indignation, which euen at Casbin he had conceiued in his mind against them; and with great crueltie did punish the miserable and [u]nfortunate citizens, laying their houses euen with the ground, rasing both the old and new w[alls] of that citie, of late so desired a receit for the Turks. But when he was to depart thence, he stood in doubt, Whether to go on to Derbent, or to returne to Persia: the strength of that citie, the approch of Winter, and the long iourney he was to take homeward, perswaded him to lay aside the enterprise for Derbent: whereupon he resolued to returne to Casbin, yet first to make his returne by them of Eres and Sechi, and vpon them as vpon rebels to inflict well deserued punishment. So making his pre- K sent repaire thither, spared neither sex nor age, nor any condition of persons, but vpon them al poured forth his furious indignation, without exception. Which done, he with his aforesaid mother Begum, and his armie, though somewhat diminished, yet victorious and triumphant, returned to Casbin.

Abdilcherai beloued of the Persian queene.

Young Abdilcherai the Tartarian was kept safe in the kings palace at Casbin, but with such easie imprisonment as was agreeable to his calling: which was day by day so inlarged, as that he seemed not to liue as a prisoner, but rather as a companion of those of the court, & as it were in apparant libertie. By which occasion hauing insinuated himselfe into the loue of Begum the kings wife, he spent his time in courting her, and she again in entertaining of him in all secret and couert manner. Yet these their mutual affections and interchangeable fauors passed not so L secretly, but that in the court and all ouer the citie it was a rife report, That the shamelesse ladie, prodigall of her honor, had participated both her bed and her selfe with the Tartarian prisoner. Howbeit neither the king nor the prince knew any thing of it. But the king perceiuing the yong gentleman to be generally commended, valiant, courteous, and of a comely feature, & withal nobly born (for he gaue it out that hee was the brother of Tatar Chan) perswaded himself, that it would stand with the great good of his state, of a captiue to make him his son in law, by giuing him his daughter in mariage: whereby he was in good hope there might grow such an amitie and vnion between the Tartarian Præcopenses, and himselfe, as that they would from thenceforth not only refuse to fauor Amurath in those wars, but also become enemies vn- M to him, and in the fauor of Persia turne their armes and affections against him. Which his deere and considerate purpose so displeased the Sultans of [Ca]sbin, that they sought by all mea[ns] they could possibly deuise to auert the king from that so strange a policie: but all in vaine, the king being fully resolued, and now vpon the point to make a conclusion of the marriage: the Sultans entering into the palace with their followers, and finding there the vnfortunate Tartarian,

A Tartarian, ran him through the body, and cutting off his priuie members, slapped them vpon his mouth after a most barbarous and filthie manner. It is reported, that the Queene was then also murdered by them: certaine it is, that the poore ladie neuer after that day saw the light of the Sun: but whether it was put in execution by the appointment of the king her husband, or that the Sultans did it for the publicke interest, is not certainly knowne. Vpon these murders sprung vp many troubles, and much ciuile dissention, threatning the vtter confusion of the Persian kingdome, to the singular benefit of Amurath. All which tumultuous disorders the king by brideling his owne affections, and the motions of his sonne Emir Hamze Mirize, wel appeased, procuring at last a perfect vnitie, as then most necessarie for the defence of his kingdome.

Abdilcherai slaine in the court.

The Persian Queene made away.

Osman Bassa being in Derbent (the only place of refuge now left for the Turks in Siruan) ceased not with all carefulnesse to deuise what he possibly could, for the assuring of that country B (of late woon, and now againe almost lost) vnder the gouernment of Amurath. For the better establishing whereof, together with his owne safety, he thought it good to enter into friendship with old Sahamal the Georgian, lord of the mountaine of Brus. With this man did Osman practise many tokens of good will; & he again interchangeably towards Osman: whereupon there arose great friendship betweene them, at leastwise in outward apparance: whereunto in short time there was added a strait knot of alliance: for that Osman tooke to wife a daughter of the said Sahamals, the greatest signe of his sincere loue towards him. Neuertheless shortly after Osman vpon some reasonable coniectures began to suspect (as indeed the truth was) that Sahamal for all the faire shew of friendship he made towards him, might for all that receiue some C secret order from the Persian king, to betray him, & to free the city from the Turks, and so to reduce all that prouince vnto the antient deuotion: in which iealous suspition hee was fully confirmed by the speeches of his wife, the daughter of Sahamal; who rauished with the honor, valor, & riches of her husband, could not conceale any thing that she knew deuised against him, but frankly told him, That her father being secretly reconciled to the Persian king, held friendship with him, and that letters went betweene them of great matters, and particularly of the affaires of Siruan. Hereupon the Bassa persuaded himselfe, that all the friendship of Sahamal was but deepe dissimulation, and the marriage of his daughter nothing but a meane to procure his death. Neuertheles he made shew vnto his wife, as if he had made no such reckoning of it as indeed hee did, but kept it in store to his owne safetie, and the destruction of Sahamal;
D whom for all that he still entertained with all honor and kindnesse due vnto a most louing father in law. But to preuent the malicious purpose of Sahamal, hauing inuited him according to the custome to a certain solemne feast, he acquainted certaine companies of his most trustie & valiant souldiers with his determination, enioyning them, that as soone as Sahamal was entred into his court, euen in the very dismounting from his horse they should all fal vpon him, cut off his head, and put all his retinue to the sword. Which his cruell command was by them accordingly at Sahamals comming put in execution, he in lighting from his horse being slain, and all his followers murdered, when forthwith were sent forth by Osman two thousand horsemen to spoile and sacke all the countrie of the said Georgian Lord, to the great maruell and astonishment both of far and neere. The Persian king hearing of these news, tooke the matter grieuou-
E sly, as foreseeing that the recouerie of that country and prouince of Siruan would proue a matter of great difficultie, and fearing greatly that it would still remaine (as indeed it doth) in the possession of the Turks. This was the end of the Turks attempts against the Persians in Siruan this yeare 1578, wherein they lost aboue seuentie thousand men, deuoured partly with the sword, and partly with famine, & the other miseries of war. And so Winter comming on very sharply, euery man withdrew himselfe from the field, wholly attending the keeping of that they had already gotten, vntill the comming on of the next Spring.

Amurath aduertised by letters from Mustapha, of all that had hapned in the late expedition against the Persians, vpon these prosperous successes (which the Bassa had for the aduancing of his own credit described to be far greater than indeed they were) began to cast many deuises in F his head, touching such matters as were to be attempted the next yere. And first he thought it necessary to send his forces again into Siruan, to recouer such places as were first conquered by Mustapha, but afterward againe subdued by the Persian; so to establish his gouernment in that countrie. But vpon better consideration, he ceased further to thinke of that matter, for the great hope he had conceiued of the aid that was promised him by Tatar Chan, who had faithfully assured aft[illegible] both him and Osman, that he would ouerrun that prouince anew, and do great matters in furt[illegible]rce of the Turks designes: all which for all that fell out to be but windie words: yet in re[illegible] of this hope hee laied Siruan aside, and committed the defence thereof to the false promises of the Tartarian, and the valour of Osman. And pleasing his ambitious desires with more haughtie thoughts, he began to deuise with himselfe, for sending his armie directly to Tauris, there to erect a fortresse, which being strongly fortified and furnished with a garrison of most valiant souldiers, should neuer be again subdued by all the power of Persia; and by this meanes to keepe in subiection all those great countries betweene Tauris and Erzirum.

Which his conceit being of great weight and importance, was much increased by the persuasion of others, very inward with him; euery man being almost of opinion, That it was an easie matter for so great an hoast in few daies to performe that seruice, and to pierce, not only into Tauris, but farther to passe whethersoeuer he would desire. Yet after he had more ly considered of an enterprise of so great importance, and with more indifferent iudg[illegible]nt compared his owne forces with his enemies, he began to finde many difficulties and dangers, which in the heat of his ambitious desires he at the first saw not: for beside[illegible] the length and tediousnesse of the iourney, hee doubted that in sending his armie for Tauris, it might be on the one side assailed by the Georgians (of whose obedience he had as yet no great assurance) & on the other side by the Persians, & so brought into great danger; which he was alwaies to feare, whensoeuer he should haue occasion to send new supplies vnto the fortresse by him intended at Tauris. Whereupon laying aside all his former conceits, as too eager and perilous, he resolutely concluded with himselfe, first to make sure his owne borders, and afterwards by little and little to enter into the enemies country, still fortifying in conuenient places as he went; and so surely, although but slowly, to triumph ouer his enemies, rather than by thrusting his armie headlong vpon vncertainties into places strongly fe[illegible] both by nature & the power of most mightie enemies, to be inforced with shame to aba[illegible] the enterprise so hastily begun.

Mustapha careful to put in execution Amurath his command.

Of this his resolution hee aduertised Mustapha o[illegible] writing; giuing him in charge, against the next Spring to prouide all such things as should be necessarie for the building of certaine forts vpon the way that leadeth from Erzirum into Georgia: that hauing made those waies safe, and brought the people vnder his obedience, hee might afterwards attempt greater matters.
Whereupon Mustapha presently directed forth precepts to the cities of Aleppo, of Damasco, Caraemir, and other places of Soria and Mesopotamia, for the taking vp of cunning workmen, of pioners, & such like, to the number of twentie thousand: and likewise wrot to all the countries, out of which hee had raised his armie the last yeare, That all their souldiers (yea and in greater number also) should be in readinesse against the next Spring, to returne to the warres.
The rumor whereof he caused to be spread euen as far as Ægypt. He commanded also the taxes and tenths of those countries to be collected, & further vsed the Chambers of Aleppo, and other places, for such masses of mony as he thought necessarie for these purposes.

In this while the two Georgian brethren, Alexander and Manucchiar, sent (as we haue before said) by Mustapha to Amurath at Constantinople, in doubtful hope; expecting the end for which they were both sent vnto the court, were both examined, and exhorted to embrace the Mahometan religion: whereunto Manucchiar easily yeelded. Whereas on the other side Alexander his elder brother could by no allurements or means be induced to consent to so infamous and damnable a change of his religion, although he knew he should therefore be depriued of his state: but protesting his obedience at all times to Amurath, and his loue to his brother; requested only, that he might but as a priuate man goe and liue in his countrey, there to be buried amongst his ancestours. Which his request the Turkish Emperour referred to the discretion of Manucchiar, to do therein as he saw good: who consented thereunto. Hereupon Manucchiar was circumcised, and the name of Mustaffa giuen him, with the title of the Bassa and Gouernour of Altunchala, and of all his mothers and brothers countries: and being thus created a Turke, had his brother Alexander a Christian, committed vnto him, and so both returned into their owne countries.

Now in the Persian court at Casbin, were many consul[illegible]tions had for the repressing of the inuasions of the Turks. And among others carefull of those matters, Emanguli Chan Gouernour of Genge, doubting to lose his honourable gouernement, by reason of the late sacke of his city, and spoile of [illegible]ountry by the Tartarian; by those plots that were daily in contriuing for the the sending of men into Siruan to impeach the designements of Osman Bassa, and if it were possible, to driue him out of Derbent; tooke occasion to offer vnto the King, vpon paine of his head to defend Siruan, and not to suffer Osman the Turke to attempt any new fortifications, or further conquests in that Prouince. Of which his offer the King accepted, and thereupon the gouernment of Genge, and guarding of the countrey of Siruan against the forces of Osman, was frankely committed vnto him: And commandement giuen to the Gouernours of Tauris, Reiuan, and Nassiuan, and to diuers other captaines that were neerest, to be readie at all times with their power to assist Emanguli Chan, if it should fortune either the Tartarians or Turkes, with any great power to enter into Siruan: which order so taken, was thought sufficient for the securitie of that prouince.

But how to protect the Georgian Countrey, was thought to be a matter of greater importance, euery man being almost of opinion, That some great power of the Turks should be sent thither, for the more assurance of the conquest thereof alreadie begun, and for the succour of the fortresse at Teflis, which must needs otherwise fall againe into the hands of the Georgians.
This matter so troubled the Persian King, as that he seemed to haue bent his whole counsels and thoughts thereupon: when Simon a Georgian a famous captaine (sometime prisoner with Ismahel the late King, at Cahaca, and by the familiaritie hee had with him, seduced from the Christian faith; for defence whereof he had in the time of King Tamas, chosen to liue depri-ued of his libertie and state) thinking it now a fit time to obtaine at the Kings hand such hefpe as he had long desired, for the recouerie of his dominion vsurped by Dauid, otherwise called Daut Chan, his yonger brother (who for the obtaining thereof of King Tamas, had voluntarily renounced his Christian religion) offered now vnto the King his faithfull seruice, for the defence of that part of the Georgian Countrey wherein Teflis stood (being in right, part of his owne Inheritance) against the Turks: reproouing by way of disgrace, his younger brother of cowardise, and promising the performance of great matters in himselfe, both for the defence of that euill defended countrey, and further annoying of the enemie. With great content did the Persian King consent to the request of Simon, and named him Chan of all that Kingdome which he possessed before whilest he was a Christian: and sent with him Aliculi Chan into Georgia, with fiue thousand horsemen, and certaine pieces of artillerie taken at Eres, when Caietas Bassa was slaine. Simon afterwards comming to Georgia, was joyfully receiued of his countreymen, and there prest about three thousand souldiers of his owne and of his neighbours; excusing himselfe that he was become a Persian, not because he preferred the Mahometane superstition before the Christian Religion; but only so to be deliuered from his long imprisonment, and by that meanes to maintaine his estate. And in this order were the affaires of Georgia assured and strengthned in the best manner that might then be.

Simon with Aliculi Chan sent for the defence of Georgia.

Now began the Spring to approch, and euery man prepared himselfe to the discontinued trauels of the wars begun: and now were met together at Erzirum, out of all the wonted prouinces, all the Turks forces, with all things necessarie for the intended war. With this armie, in all things equall with the first, Mustapha set forward, and in twelue dayes came to Chars, not perceiuing in his souldiers any signe of discontentment at all. And forasmuch as here they were to stay, and to fortifie both with walls and ditches that ruinated Citie, and that with as great speed as was possible; there was no remedie, but that beside the pioners and enginiers that were brought for that purpose, many of the Spaoglani, yea and of the Ianizaries also, must be set to worke. Whereupon they all suddenly in a tumult, began with bitter protestations to tell the General, That their stipends wherwith it pleased the Sultan to fauor them, were not bestowed vpon them to imploy their forces and vertues in such seruile works; but onely with their swords and other weapons, to exercise that force and hardinesse for which they were esteemed worthie of that honour. Whereunto the Generall answered in most haughtie termes, and not yeelding one jot to their inciuilitie, but vsing all meanes of authoritie and terrour, brought them to worke so much as hee desired. So that within the space of 23 dayes the towers and walls were erected, the ditches digged, the artillerie orderly planted vpon the walls, and the water brought round about it. Many inconueniences happened in the armie while they were busie in this worke; and namely vpon the 25 day of August, when they had almost euen finished the whole building, the soldiers endured a most sudden cold by reason of the snow that then fell in great aboundance.

And among others carefull of those matters, Emanguli Chan Gouernour of Genge, doubting to lose his honourable gouernement, by reason of the late sacke of his city, and spoile of... untry by the Tartarian; by those plots that were daily in contriuing for the

A the sending of men into Siruan to impeach the designements of Osman Bassa, and if it were possible, to driue him out of Derbent; tooke occasion to offer vnto the King, vpon paine of his head to defend Siruan, and not to suffer Osman the Turke to attempt any new fortifications, or further conquests in that Prouince. Of which his offer the King accepted, and thereupon the gouernment of Genge, and guarding of the countrey of Siruan against the forces of Osman, was frankely committed vnto him: And commandement giuen to the Gouernours of Tauris, Reiuan, and Nassiuan, and to diuers other captaines that were neerest, to be readie at all times with their power to assist Emanguli Chan, if it should fortune either the Tartarians or Turkes, with any great power to enter into Siruan: which order so taken, was thought sufficient for the B securitie of that prouince.

But how to protect the Georgian Countrey, was thought to be a matter of greater importance, euery man being almost of opinion, That some great power of the Turks should be sent thither, for the more assurance of the conquest thereof alreadie begun, and for the succour of the fortresse at Teflis, which must needs otherwise fall againe into the hands of the Georgians. This matter so troubled the Persian King, as that he seemed to haue bent his whole counsels and thoughts thereupon: when Simon a Georgian a famous captaine (sometime prisoner with Ismahel the late King, at Cabaca, and by the familiaritie hee had with him, seduced from the C Christian faith; for defence whereof he had in the time of King Tamas, chosen to liue depriued of his libertie and state) thinking it now a fit time to obtaine at the Kings hand such helpe as he had long desired, for the recouerie of his dominion vsurped by Dauid, otherwise called Daut Chan, his younger brother (who for the obtaining thereof of King Tamas, had voluntarily renounced his Christian religion) offered now vnto the King his faithfull seruice, for the defence of that part of the Georgian Countrey wherein Teflis stood (being in right, part of his owne Inheritance) against the Turks: reproouing by way of disgrace, his younger brother of cowardise, and promising the performance of great matters in himselfe, both for the defence of that still defended countrey, and further annoying of the enemie. With great content did the Persian King consent to the request of Simon, and named him Chan of all that Kingdome which he possessed before whilest he was a Christian: and sent with him Aliculi Chan into Georgia, with nine thousand horsemen, and certaine pieces of artilerie taken at Eres, when D Cassem Bassa was slaine. Simon afterwards, coming to Georgia, was ioyfully receiued of his countreymen, and there gathered about three thousand souldiers (of his owne and of his neighbours) ... himself (for he was become a Persian, not because he preferred the Mahometan ... before the Christian Religion, but only to be deliuered from his long ... Georgian allured and inuigled to ... manner that might ... approch, ... prepared ... began ... together ... profered by him ... Persian ... Persia, ... Persian ... Persian ... Persian Chars thus fortified, the Generall resolued to send succors into Georgia to Teflis; without which it was most certaine that the fortresse would be yeelded to the Georgians: but in what sort to relieue it he remained doubtfull. To send part of his armie with some valiant captaine was dangerous, and to go himselfe with all his forces, would sound (as he thought) to his disfauour with his great Lord and master; whom he had already made beleeue, that he had subdued the Georgians, and brought all that prouince to his obedience and deuotion. In this ambiguitie, the desire he had to preserue his credit with Amurath preuailed: and so hee made choice of Hassan Bassa sonne to Mahamet principall Visier of the Court, a gallant gentleman, and of great valour, to whome he deliuered betweene eighteene and twentie thousand soldiers; joining vnto him one Resuan Captaine of certaine aduenturers that voluntarily offered themselues to follow the forces of Hassan; assigning vnto him likewise fortie thousand ducats, and many loads of rice, meale, and barley, with other things necessarie both for [illegible] and war, and so sent him away for Teflis.

Hassan Bassa sent with twentie thousand to the succoring of Teflis.

Hassan with this charge set forward, fully resolued to put these succours into Teflis, or to lose all: and at length came to the famous strait of Tomanis, where the ouergrowne woods on the one side, and the deep vallies & craggie rocks on the other, would astonish a right constant beholder. When vpon the sudden, the Persians and the Georgians, vnder the conduct of Aliculi Chan and Simon, at vnawares set vpon the Turkes, and joined battell with them. For these two valiant captaines remaining for the most part in the borders of Teflis and Tomanis with 8000 soldiers, waiting for some opportunitie to annoy either them of the the fort of Teflis, or else such as should come to their succors; vnderstanding by their espials, of the comming of Hassan with this aid, had scattered themselues all alongst the said straight, in hope there to assaile the Turks, and holpen by the aduantage of the place, to driue them headlong into the deep valley, and at once to bereaue them both of their goods and life. But Hassan carefull of nothing more than how to auoid that danger, chose rather to make his journey through the thicke woods, and so as he might to escape the ambush that the enemie might lay for him vpon that straight passage. And so entring with his armie into the wood, which he was to haue left vpon his left hand, to discouer what might be plotted against him, he was hardly charged by the enemy, and constrained to fight with a thousand windings and turnings in & out, through a thousand crooked paths and doubtfull cranks, in a most confused medly, with great slaughter of his men: who not accustomed to this kind of fight, nor acquainted with the scituation of the place, were in the skirmish driuen so far, that downe they fell, and being not able to recouer themselues, were presently slaine. And thus with much ado he at length passed the strait of Tomanis. Hassan deeming himselfe much disgraced, by suffering his enemies, in number so far inferior, to haue done him so much harme, and so to haue escaped his hands; and further, considering that in such places sleights & stratagems more auaile than open forces; burning with desire of reuenge would needs stay neere vnto those straits, as if it had been to refresh his wearied army, but indeed to try if the Persians would aduenture againe to trouble him, or no: and appointed Resuan Bassa with certain bands of the soldiers of Græce, and of his own aduenturers, to lie in ambush within the couert of the strait, attentiue to euery stir of the enemie. Two dayes the Turkes armie lay thus diuided, and were now resolued the third day to remoue thence towards Teflis: when as the Persian captaines Aliculi Chan and Simon, vainely imagining that this stay of the Turkes was for feare of the Persians, foolishly returned and gaue a fresh onset vpon the flanke of Hassans squadrons. Who forthwith raising all his souldiers, and giuing a signe to Resuan, with all speed compassed in his enemies, and straightening them on both sides, tooke some of them aliue, cut in pieces other some, and put all the rest to flight. Among others that were taken aliue, was Aliculi Chan the Persian captaine, who ouer rashly charging vpon the face of Hassan, fell into his hand. The next day following (being the eleuenth day after Hassans departure from Chars) he joyfully arriued at Teflis, where he found among the poore besieged Turks many miseries; whereof some were alreadie dead, and some yet sicke: for they were so plagued with famine, that they not onely deuoured their horses, but euen the very skinnes of the same horses, of sheepe; and of dogs, and in such most miserable wants had passed the time whom Hassan at his arriual comforted with gifts and good words; exhorting them to persist constant in the seruice of their King, whose honour (as hee said) was neuer more than there to be respected. And for as much as the souldiers of the Fort did with one voyce request

The Persians assaile the Turks, and make of them a great slaughter.

The Persians ouerthrown, and Aliculi chan taken.

The miserie of the Turks in garison at Teflis.

Hassan

Hassan to appoint them a new gouernor, because they did all mislike Mahamet Bassa, who the last yeare was left by the General in that fort; Hassan remoued the said Mahamet, and put Amet Bassa in his place: and so after he had filled vp the places of the dead soldiers with a new supply, and set all things in order, he tooke his leaue, recommending the charge and custodie of that fort to their trust and valour. Hassan returning from Teflis, and being without any trouble come to the strait of Tomanis, was aduertised by his scouts, That it was so strongly possessed by the enemie, and so shut vp with artillerie, as that it was not to be passed through: for Simon thinking (as indeed it fell out) that Hassan would returne that way, had so belayed that strait, that the Turks could not without most assured losse passe the same: which thing much troubled the Bassa, and filled his head with many conceits, how he might make his journey some other way, and decline the danger prepared for him. Thus perplexed, and altogether doubtfull what to do, or which way to turne himself: Aliculi Chan the Persian (who to purchase his libertie could haue bin content to haue done any thing) offered Hassan to shew him a short and safe cut, whereby he might without danger passe with his armie out of that troublesome country; yet couenanting before, that he should promise him to set him at libertie for his so good seruice. Which his request the Bassa did not sticke in large manner to promise, although he afterwards to his great dishonor performed not the same. So bending his journey on the right hand, he was guided by Aliculi through strange and vncouth wayes, out of those woods and dangers, not meeting so much as with any one of his enemies. But when the Persian duke well hoping for his libertie, put the Turke in minde of his promise; he with deepe and feigned sighs protested, That he was right sorrie that he could not performe what he had promised to do for him, forasmuch as it lay not in his power to set any man at libertie, that was taken in battell by the soldiers of his great lord and soueraigne: yet gaue him his faith, that so far as his intreaties and fauors with the Generall Mustapha could preuaile, he would vse all the most earnest meanes he could, to procure his libertie and returne to his owne countrey.

Simon the Georgian perceiuing that the Turks were remoued, imagined forthwith, that they had taken this new way: but being afterward certified by his faithfull spies, that it was so indeed, he ran all headlong, & as it were desperat, to meet with this so happy an army. And all inflamed with rage for this great fortune of the Turks, he fell vpon the taile of the Turkish hoste: which with vnmeasurable furie he wholly destroyed, leading away with him all the people, all the horses, and all the treasure of Mahamet Bassa which he brought from Teflis, and all the treasure of Hassan Bassa likewise. As for Aliculi Chan, whom Simon most greedily sought for, he was sent away in the front of the armie, so that he was not to be rescued. Hassan holding on his way, came to Chars in the space of eight dayes after his departure from Teflis, and there presented vnto Mustapha the General, the Persian captaine Aliculi, recounting vnto him the dangers he had indured, & whatsoeuer els had hapned in that expedition. Aliculi the vnfortunate Persian was by the commandement of Mustapha carried to Erzirum, & there in the castle committed to prison. Not long after, Mustapha returned himselfe also to the said citie of Erzirum, with his army sore weakned and discontented, which was there presently by him discharged.

Simon destroied the reareward of Hassans Armie, & taketh from him his treasure Mustapha returneth to Erzirum, & there discharged his Armie.

About the same time that these things were in doing, Amurath to make a safer and more easie passage for his forces into Georgia, sent Vluzales his Admiral with a great fleet into the Euxine sea to Mengrelia, called in antient time Cholchis; who entering the famous riuer of Phasis (now Fassa) there fortified, and layd such a beginning, that it is now one of the Turks proud Beglerbegs ships, although those fortifications shortly after the departure of the Admiral, were for the present againe by the Mengrelians demolished. And this was the end of the stirres of this yeare 1579.

Of all these successes Mustapha afterwards sent aduertisements to the court to Amurath, recounting vnto him the fortifying of Chars, the deserts of Hassan, as well for the succouring of Teflis, as for the taking of Aliculi the Persian. And because the said General had the yere before perswaded Amurath, That the country of Georgia and the people thereof were brought vnder his obedience, to the end that he should not marueil at so many losses and so many battels, and therby doubt of some false informations, he declared vnto him, that al these troubles were not raised by the natural and homebred Georgians, but by two certain captains Aliculi and Simon sent out of Persia, who had made all these stirs: of which one of them now remained with him in prison, for him to determine of at his pleasure. With great delight did the Turkish Empe-

rour read all that Mustapha had written, and by two of his Gentlemen vshers sent to Hassan a battle-axe all gilt and set full of stones, a targuet of gold and pearle, and a rich garment of cloth of gold, in reward of his good seruice, for which he greatly commended him: and withall gaue order, That Aliculi should be kept where he was in the castle of Erzirum, in diligent and safe custodie.

These inuasions of the Turks much troubled the Persian King in his court at Casbin, considering, that now they had both throughly acquainted themselues with all the passages into Georgia (in the difficultie and roughnesse whereof consisted the chiefe defence of that prouince) as also that diuers of the Georgian Princes were more than inclining vnto the Turkes seruice; so that he could not but iustly feare, that his enemies would in time begin to pierce into the noble cities of Media the greater, yea and peraduenture euen vnto Tauris before any of the rest. Which his care of foreine inuasion was doubled with domesticall feares: Mirize Salmas his chiefe Visier, and vpon whom he most rested, still filling his head with ... suspition, That Abas Mirize his son (made gouernor of Heri by Tamas his grandfather) ... about in these troubles with the Turk to proclaim himself king of Persia, to the great ignominie of his father, and preiudice of Emir Hamze his eldest brother, the worthy and vndoubted heire of that kingdome. This Mirize Salmas (according to his longing desire) had married a daughter of his to the said Emir Hamze, with the consent of the king his father: but yet not content with that honour, ceased not continually with ambitious deuises, to seeke out meanes how to bring to passe, that the Persian estate might wholly remaine to his sonne in law, vndiuided and entire from the participation of his brethren: & therefore little regarding the perils that might happen from the Turks, and blinded with the desire of his owne greatnesse, he went about to turne the King (being a man very credulous and inconsiderat) against Abas Mirize; either to take him and commit him to prison, or at least to bereaue him of all authoritie and command. And the better to persuade the king thereunto, he ... nered vnto him, how little Abas Mirize his sonne had respected him in diuers occasio... and that in these late wars he had not so much as sent forth one man against the Turks, but had forbidden such as were of his iurisdiction of Heri, to come to Casbin, at such time as they were summoned both by letters and commandement, to haue passed with Emir Hamze into Siruan: by reason whereof not one of them would stir a foot, answering, That they were enioyned so to do by Abas Mirize their lord; who had not only caused himselfe to be called king of Heri, but had giuen it out, that he meant to claime the succession in the whole kingdome. These complaints much preuailed with the king, both in respect of the loue he bare to Emir Hamze his eldest sonne, and also of the credit he gaue to his Visier: especially being accompanied with the crafty packing of the said Visier; who as he was very cunning in such practises of himselfe, so did he make them much more effectual with the effeminate king, by the meanes of diuers great Ladies, and other deuices that were to him very familiar and vsual. Insomuch that the King carried away with light beleefe, did continually bethinke himselfe how to find opportunity to represse the boldnesse of his disobedient son: not forgetting for all that, to make such preparation against the Turks, as should be sufficient to stay their passage to Tauris, if they had any purpose so to do. But leauing the Persian King to his troubled cogitations for a while, let vs againe returne vnto the Turks Generall, the great Bassa Mustapha.

Mustapha discharged of his Generalship, & called home to Constantinople.

He now lying at Erzirum, after many troubles abroad, was surprised and almost ouerwhelmed with vnexpected quarrels at home, many grieuous complaints being made of him to Amurath, wherby he was induced afterwards to take from him his Generalship, and to cal him to the Court to giue account of his actions. Which seemed not to be done without cause, he hauing before raised a great discontentment in the minde of Amurath, by sending such a strong power to the succors of Teflis: whereby he coniectured, that the affaires of Georgia were not in such securitie as Mustapha had already informed him they were, & also generally offended the minds of the soldiers of his armie, who all in an vprore, accused him of improuidencie and prodigality, for that now this second yeare he had with so much ado gathered together such a number of soldiers, to the trouble of the whole empi... and infinit charge of their lord, & performed nothing worthy the glory of Amurath, or ... erable to so great a charge. Whi... complaints although they were of some moment, yet would the Turkish emperor for the great fauours he bare vnto him his antient Tutor, neuer haue construed them so hardly against him, as

as for the same to haue been induced to haue depriued him of his place, if the inueterate enuy of Sinan Bassa had not ministred strength and force to these hard accusations, and set (as it were) an edge vpon Amurath to do what he afterwards did.

But forasmuch as the course of time, and processe of the present history, bringeth now forth these two mightie champions of the Turks together (the enuious competitors the one of the others honors, who liuing many yeares together, haue left the wofull remembrance of their greatnesse and valour vnto the world, but especially vnto the afflicted state of Christendome, the large wounds by them made, as it were yet bleeding) stay with me a while, and without griefe, if thou canst, behold the liuely counterfeits of two so great enemies (who both liued within these few yeares, and the later of them died but the other day) as they are by the skilfull hand of the cunning workeman most perfectly described, and thus to be seene.

A comparison betwixt Sinan Bassa and Mustapha, two ancient enemies both to themselues and the Christian commonweale.

This Sinan was a moſt antient enemie to Muſtapha and in all things thought himſelf match. For if Muſtapha had ſubdued Cyprus, ſo had he conquered Tripolis, Guletta, with kingdome of Tunes in Affricke: and if Muſtapha were a man of great courage, and reuerend his yeares, Sinan would be his equall both in the one and the other; yea and did not ſticke to thinke

A thinke himſelfe his better too, for that in the enterpriſe of Giamen in Arabia, hee performed ſuch an exploit as Muſtapha neither durſt nor yet knew how to put in execution, to carrying away the glorie of that famous conqueſt: for which euer after there was between them a continuall heart burning, one of them enuying at the others glorie, and both in word and deed, as occaſions fell out, in all things oppoſing themſelues one againſt the other. At laſt happens this opportunitie for Sinan: who taking the occaſion of the complaints of ſo many againſt Muſtapha, cauſed a great number of them to frame their ſupplications to Amurath, which he for his part did in moſt malignant manner inforce and exaggerat againſt his old aduerſary; accuſing him, that this ſecond yeare he had moſt manifeſtly ſhewed himſelfe to haue gone vnto the wars not as a worthy General deſirous of noble and honorable enterpriſes, but B as a man that would make merchandiſe of bloud, and of his ſoldiers paies; employing the moſt liberal prouiſion of corne and mony, not as rewards of well deſeruing men, nor to the erecting of ſuch fabriks as were needfull, and might haue bin built therewithall, but onely to his owne proper gaine, ſo to inrich himſelfe with his peoples loſſes, to the great ſhame of his lord, and conſuming of the publick treaſure: adding hereunto, that if the things done by Muſtapha were well ſearched, it would be found, that he had neglected many good opportunities, attempted many things in vaine, and not done any good either to the Emperor or his ſouldiers, but onely to himſelfe: whom rather than they would follow againe as their Generall, all his people in an vprore ſhewed themſelues ready and willing to aduenture themſelues in any other ſarte greater labour that by their Lord and Soueraigne ſhould be commanded them.

C Theſe and ſuch like complaints, with the hard opinion alreadie conceiued againſt him by Amurath, were the occaſion why hee reſolued to put him from his place. Beſide that, hee thought it a thing dangerous to his ſtate, to ſuffer one & the ſelfe ſame General any long time to command ouer ſo great armies; deeming it not ſo much for his honour, ſtill to employ one man, as to ſhew that he had varietie and choice of ſubiects, worthy of ſo great a charge. And therfore being deſirous to find out the truth of that was reported to him concerning Muſtapha, he ſent the chiefe of his gentlemen porters, with fifteen others, to bring him to the court, with his Chancellor and Treaſurer, to ſhew the accounts of ſuch monies as he had receiued, and to giue vp an account of their whole office. Vnto this meſſenger had Amurath deliuered three diuers letters, which he ſhould warily ſhew as occaſion ſerued: one of them was ſo written of D purpoſe, that Muſtapha in the receiuing thereof might by the ſame meſſengers be ſtrangled: in the ſecond was the emperors warrant for the doing of that was to them commanded; & in the third was contained, that Muſtapha ſhould forthwith ſend his Chancellor & Treaſurer to the court by thoſe meſſengers. Muſtapha in the meane time by diuers means, but eſpecially by the guilt of his owne conſcience, venting the diſpleaſure of the Emperor towards him, and ſuſpecting (as the truth was) his life to be by thoſe meſſengers ſought after, at ſuch time as the Captain Porter came to his camp, found many delaies to put him off, and would not in any caſe be ſpoken withall. But when the meſſenger would indure no longer delay, he was at length admitted to his preſence, hauing a circle appointed for him, out of which hee and his companions might not ſtir or approch neerer vnto him; the Baſſaes guard ſtanding in arms round about him.
E The meſſenger perceiuing the Baſſa's warines, wilily pluckt forth the third letters, concerning the ſending of his Chancellor and Treaſurer to the court. Then began the craftie old Baſſa to find many excuſes to haue delayed the matter: but being hardly preſſed by the meſſenger, and ſeeing no other remedie, he with much difficultie deliuered them both, couenanting before with the meſſenger, to haue both their liues ſpared: who comming to Conſtantinople, where forthwith clapt faſt into the tower called Iadicula, as there to haue been ſeuerely examined of all the doings of the Baſſa. But Muſtapha after long delay comming at length to Conſtantinople, the ninth of Aprill in the Spring following, and vſing the mighty and potent mediation of diuers great ladies and other his gracious friends in court, preuailed ſo much in that corrupt gouernment, as that he was againe at length receiued into the fauour of Amurath, without any F further proceeding againſt him, his Chancellor, or Treaſurer, who by his meanes were afterwards alſo inlarged and ſet at liberty: yet was he neuer after admitted to thoſe honors, which hee perſuaded himſelfe were of right due vnto him, for his good and faithfull ſeruice of long time done to the Othoman Emperours.

Muſtapha by the mediation of certain great ladies appeaſeth the diſpleaſure of Amurath.

In this time that Muſtapha was Generall at Erzirum, Mehamet the Viſier Baſſa was treacherouſly

...ously slaine at Constantinople: after whom shortly after died also Achmet Bassa, who suc- G
...ceeded in his place: so that the said soueraigne dignity, in honor next vnto the Turkish Empe-
...rour was by rightfull succession due to Mustapha the next Bassa; but that he was not thought
...worthie of it by him that might, and of right ought, to haue gratified him therewith, as shall ...be a little hereafter declared, when we haue briefely set downe the sudden and strange death of the said Muhamet the Visier, worthie in all histories to be registred, as a mirrour for all such as administer iustice in so great place, to looke vpon.

The strange death of the great Visier Bassa Muhamet

This Bassa, a man of as great fame as euer was any that had gouernment in the Othoman empire, in the time that he all commanded, had for some light causes deprined a certaine souldier of Constantinople, of his yearely pension, which with many labours and dangers he had got- H ten to maintain himselfe; which pension, the Bassa bestowed vpon another souldier, so that the other poore soule remained in miserie, altogether vnprouided for. Vnto which miserable estate seeing himselfe now brought, and not guilty to himselfe of any fault worthy [illegible] punishment, he determined with himselfe to reuenge the iniury with the bloud of that great Bas-sa, and to bereaue him of life, that had bereft him of liuing: which because he could not by any fit means put in execution (by reason of the guard of slaues that keep the person of the Visier, so that no man can come neere him that holdeth that high place) except hee could by some means acquaint himselfe in the Visiers house, & so insinuat himselfe into his acquaintance; he resolued to take vpon him the rude habit of those religious which the Turks call Deruissars, and after their manner to present himselfe euery morning before the Visier to aske his almes: and so he did, counterfeiting withall a certaine kind of folly and lightnesse of mind, as do those I Deruissars, to make the people beleeue, that they contemne all worldly things, as men rauished only with heauenly cogitations; which yet was by some that knew him, thought to haue hapned in him, through the griefe he had conceiued for the losse of his stipend. Muhamet not only the first time, but also at all other times that this counterfeit hypocrite came before him, caused him to be comforted with his almes, and [illegible] were with a kind of priuat stipend, enioyned him euery morning to come vnto him into the Diuano, and there together with others appointed for the same purpose, to say his deuout praiers, and in singing praises to their wicked Prophet, to intreat God for his saluation: for it is a custome of all the noblemen, that at ordinary houres of praiers, al their priests assemble themselues in the Diuano, which is made ready for them, and there all together the Infidell wretches do with their vnclean mouthes mumble K vp their superstitious praiers, or rather most abhominable blasphemies. By this means did this dissembling companion so insinuat himselfe into the Visiers acquaintance, that the counterfet foole went in and out of the Diuano at his pleasure, no man gainsaying either his goingin or comming out, but daily sat in the presence of the Visier, and so hauing said his praiers, & taken his almes, with all reuerence quietly departed. At last when the crafty hypocrite thought that the time was come wherein he might most fitly execute his purpose, hauing vtterly resolued with himselfe to die, so that he might satisfie the desire he had of reuenge, so long couertly fostered in his heart; hauing conueied a very sharpe dagger secretly into one of his sleeues, he went according to his custome, to require his almes, with an assured resolution (when hee had said his praiers, and reached out his hands to receiue his woonted almes) speedily to charge L vpon the Visier, and with the dagger to strike him to the heart. According to the accustomed manner was the counterfeit hypocrite (for who would euer haue suspected so long & so traiterous a disignement) admitted into the Diuano, where Muhamet the Visier sat in his house, to giue publick audience, & after the vsual manner, before any of the suters that attended for answers & dispatch of their busines suspected any such deceit, he was admitted neere to the Visier, & sitting right against him, according to his old woont poured out those vaine deuotions which those hypocritical Barbarians vse to mumble vp in their praiers: which being finished, whilest the Visier simply reacheth vnto him his woonted almes, the traiterous villain in receiuing it suddenly drew out his dagger, and once or twice stabbed it into the Visiers breast, out of which so deadly wounds gushed out his bloud a[illegible] together. Whereupon the standers M by astonied with the strangenesse of the act, ran in, [illegible] the old hoary Visier lay all foile his own blood, deadly pale, and breathing forth his last gasp. The mischieuous murderer presently laid hands vpon, & bound him fast: but the rumor of the strange fact did by & by vnto the emperors eare: who suspecting that some of the other great Bassaes desiring to mount into

A into that high dignitie, had prouoked the traitor to do this detestable act, would needs vnder-stand of the traiterous murderer, what occasion had moued him so trecherously to kill his Visier. Who resolutely answered him, That he did it to deliuer the citie of Constantinople from the tyranny of him, by whom hee was vndeseruedly depriued of his pension. But when hee could get no other answer of him, hee deliuered him into the hands of the slaues of the dead Visier, who with most exquisit torments put him to death.

Muhamet thus dead, after him succeeded Achmetes the next Bassa, who (as is before said) shortly after died also, so that it was now Mustapha his course to succeed in that chiefe roome, for that he was the third in the order of the Bassaes. But when he had vsed all the meanes that he possibly could, to haue obtained that so honorable a place by order due vnto him; yet could he B not find so much grace in the sight of Amurath his great Lord, as to haue it granted him vnder seale, although in effect hee made him sit as Visier, and all matters of state were brought vnto him as chiefe Visier: but in his stead the seale was sent to Sinan Bassa, who was now made Generall for the Persian warres. Which disgrace not a little discontented Mustapha, fearing lest some other strange accident should in short time light vpon him.

After that Mustapha was thus displaced from his Generalship, Amurath nominated Sinan 1580 Bassa to be Generall in his stead for this expedition against the Persians, and for the preserua- Sinan Bassa chosen Generall for the Persian warre.
tion of Chars and Teflis; giuing him soueraigne authority to command, and to set in order all such preparations as he should thinke necessarie for such enterprises as he should thinke good to attempt in his first yere: who although by reason of his great fauor, he grew haughtie and C glorious, yet did he not foreslow to discourse throughly with himselfe vpon all his designements: and namely, beside the succouring of Teflis, he determined to build a fort at Tomanis, to assure the passage thither from Chars, and withall to attempt all the means he could to induce the Persian king to send Embassadors for peace, with such conditions as should be acceptable to Amurath. With these and such like discourses did he busie himselfe whilst he was yet making preparation to set forwards towards Erzirum.

Of all these changes and alterations was the Persian king aduertised, as also that this new Turkish Generall Sinan was carefull, how this long war might by some means be appeased, and a good peace concluded. Vpon which occasion, and by the persuasion of Leuent Ogli the Georgian, and of Mirize Salmas the Visier, hee was induced to send embassadors to Constantino-D ple, to demand peace of Amurath. Vpon which resolution he dispatched Maxut Chan (of some The Persian King sendeth Maxut Chan his embassador to Amurath. called Maxudes) his embassador, with direction that he should go to Sinan, and of him to receiue guides to conduct him to Constantinople with letters to Amurath, and as much as lay in him to labour for the pacifying of all these troubles: and in any case to conclude vpon it, so that hee would be content with Chars and Teflis. With these instructions the embassador departed, & at length arriued at Chars, and so came to Erzirum, and was from thence conducted towards Amasia. But when he came to Siuas, he found Sinan the Generall there encamped, gathering together his armie for the execution of his designements: for Sinan vpon the arriual of Mustapha, departing from Constantinople the fiue and twentieth day of Aprill, was now come so E farre on his way. Of the comming of this Embassadour, The Turks receiued great ioy, and newes thereof was in post sent by Cicala Bassa to the court. The Persian embassador enformed Sinan of all that he had to treat with Amurath on the behalfe of King Mahamat; and laboured earnestly to persuade him, of the equitie of the cause, and of his request: declaring vnto him, That forasmuch as both the Nations were conioyned vnder the law of Mahomet their common Prophet (though there seemed some small difference not worth those troubles) it were a very inconuenient thing for them to contend among themselues, and to seeke the ouer-throw or vtter destruction of one another: and that therefore he was in good hope to obtaine of Amurath this desired peace, if he had no other cause wherwith he found himselfe agrieued, as in truth he had not. Wherefore he besought the Generall, that he would with safe conuoy conduct him to Amurath, to the end that if it were possible, these bloudie wars might take end; F at the very report whereof, the rest of the world reioiced, and stood attentiuely waiting to see what would be the issue thereof.

This embassador, Sinan entertained after the best manner the rudenesse of his nature would afoord: and thinking that the very fame of his valor, had wrought in the minds of his enemies this resolution to come to demand peace, granted vnto the Embassador a sure conuoy to con-

him to Constantinople; and wrote to Amurath in his letters, all that he thought was fit to be demanded, representing vnto him what great and important matters (hee hoped) might now be obtained. But before he dismissed the said embassadour, he aduised him not to goe to Amurath without resolution to offer vnto him some great good conditions, and to yeeld vnto him that country which he by force of armes had before conquered: for he knew the mind of Amurath verie well, that he was resolued in himselfe, not to yeeld so much as one hand breadth of that ground which hee had woon with the sword. Which motion of the proud Bassa so troubled the Embassador, that fearing he should not be able to conclude any thing, he stood in doubt, whether to proceed on his iourney to Constantinople, or to returne backe againe into Persia: but considering better what belonged to his dutie in so weightie a busines, and hoping to receiue more reasonable conditions from the mouth of Amurath himselfe, hee gaue large words to Sinan, and so with a safe conuoy departed from Siuas, and by long iournies came to Scutari, and so passing ouer that little strait, the fourth of August arrived at Constantinople.

The admonition of Sinan to the Persian Embassadour.

The preparations of the Persian king against the Turks.

The Persian king in the mean time, stirred vp with the report of the Turks preparations; to cause it to be noised, that hee likewise intended some important matters, commanded all the Chans and Gouernors of his kingdome, to meet together with all their forces at Tauris, where hee himselfe with the Prince Emir Hamze his son met them. And after many consultations there had for the repressing of the Turkish inuasion (for as yet it was not certainly known what Sinan meant to attempt) he resolued to send souldiers into Georgia towards Teflis, whether of necessitie succours must be sent by the Turks to them of the fort: and withall, determined also to goe himselfe with all his armie from Tauris to Caracach, a place very commodious and neere, to guard both Tauris and Siruan, being scituate euen in the middest betweene the one and the other; and there to expect the remouing of Sinan; whose ambitious nature the king knowing, doubted that he to surmount Mustapha, would attempt some greater enterprise; yea peraduenture to run euen vpon Tauris. But when it came to the point that he should send some of his captaines into Georgia, he made choice of such as had best experience of those countries, and were neereſt vnto them: with whom he sent Tecomac also, and the rest whose seruice hee had before vsed against the Turkes; commanding them to ioyne their forces with Simon the Georgian, and by all meanes possible to annoy the enemie: whom if they should perceiue to bend for Tauris, they should not faile to follow him; to the end they might ioyne together with him, and so incounter the enemies army. All those captaines were resolute men, and led with them ten thousand souldiers; which being ioined with them of Georgia, amounted to the number of thirteene thousand: who arriuing at Genge, gaue knowledge to Simon of their comming, and that in his behalfe they were ready to do great matters.

Now was the Persian Embassadour with all due honour receiued at Constantinople, where he was honorably entertained by the great Bassaes of the court; but especially by Mustapha, who within two daies after suddenly died; of a surfeit taken of eating too much of muske Melons, and immoderat drinking of Zerbet (a kind of pleasant drinke which the Turks vse made of water and sugar:) but most men thought him to haue poisoned himselfe, as fearing the former indignation of Amurath to be againe inflamed by the new complaints of the Persian Embassador against him, for that he in the time of his Generalship, had dishonourably suppressed certain embassages sent from the Persian king; which he now fearing to be called in question for, the former storms as yet scarce wel appeased, made himselfe now away. After his death it was commonly reported, that if hee had longer liued, he should haue bin vndoubtedly strangled: which to preuent, he became the worthy executioner of himselfe, that had most vniustly caused others to be most shamefully murdered. Which was the more like to be true, and the rather beleeued, for that the infinit wealth he had of long time scraped together, was immediatly after his death taken into the kings treasuries, some small portion thereof being left vnto his nephews: a most certain token of Amuraths indignation against him. The Persian Embassador hauing audience the 7 of August, with many liuely reasons & much eloquence, persuaded the Turkish Emperor to desist from the war begun, as contrary to the will & pleasure of their common Prophet Mahomet: as also to the peace, which was so royally, & with so many capitulations, not long before concluded between Tamas and Solyman his grandfather; and was not to haue bin broken and wars raised, but vpon some great quarrell or iniurie done; which the Persians

Persians had not at any time offered, but had alwaies wished vnto him all happinesse; as they had manifestly declared, by sending vnto him an embassage for that purpose by Sultan Tocomac whereby hee might plainly perceiue, the good mind and zeale the Persian King had for the maintenance of the peace. And although in the short raigne of Ismahel, there was some rumor raised, that he meant to go vnto Babylonia, and fame such like newes: yet that was but a vntruth full part, and an effect of that mind which is commonly proper to such as being kept long in strait prison cannot vse their liberty with moderation, and had therefore receiued due punishment for it, by sudden and vnexpected death. But as for the king that now is, he did aboue all others imbrace amitie with his maiestie, and therefore did most earnestly desire, that it would please him to temper his anger conceiued, which had incensed him to take vp armes against a king so much his friend; being of the same religion, and better affected towards him than all the rest of the Nations in the World.

This Embassador the Turkish Emperour dismissed without any resolution at all; but only gaue order, that whatsoeuer he had to say touching this peace, he should communicate it with his Visier. Many were the discourses which hapned; for that the Turkes required all those cities & countries, which til that time he had conquered with the sword, or (as their proud manner of phrase is) whereon his Generals horse had trod, to be yeelded again vnto him: and the Embassador on the other side, had no warrant from his king to yeeld any more than that part of Georgia, which is on this side the riuer of Araxis. Whereupon the said embassador began to feare, lest he should be suspected for a spie, and so be euil intreated: wherewithall he did finde himselfe too manifestly charged by the hard speech that the Visier vsed towards him. Being thus doubtful whereupon to resolue, perceiuing himself strained to the grant of these demands, and receiuing also some threatnings withall, he determined with himselfe to enlarge his speeches with the Visier in diuers and sundrie particularities, and to giue him good hope that hee should be able to perswade with his king, the yeelding vp of so much as Amurath had and did demand. Hereupon was Maxut Chan the embassador in friendly manner and without any outrage sent from Constantinople to Chars, and commission giuen to Sinan (then at Chars) that without delay, & with all fidelity, he should cause the embassador to be conducted to Van, and from thence into Persia, whereſoeuer he did desire: all which was faithfully performed.

Sinan musters his army at Erzirum.

But to returne againe to Sinan the Generall, who from Siuas had sent the said embassadour to Constantinople (as is before declared:) & being departed thence, arriued at Erzirum, where he tooke a suruey of his army, and other prouision necessarie for this expedition: and so from thence was now come to Chars, from whence hee dispatched the Persian embassadour, much discontented that no other conclusion for peace could be wrought.

Maxut Chan reporteth vnto the king what he hath done, & is for his good seruice by him rewarded.

Maxut Chan at last arriuing at the Persian court, reported vnto the king all that had happened in this his embassage: the sum whereof was, That Amurath would not condiscend to any condition of peace, vnlesse the whole countrey of Siruan might be yeelded vnto him, for that hee had once (as he said) conquered the same. Neither did the same embassador forbeare to tell the king, the suspition Amurath had conceiued of him, to haue been a spie rather than an embassador; and of the large promises he was fain to make to the Turke, to auoid the manifest danger of imprisonment or death: all which for all that, now lay in his Maiesties power to performe or not. The king for the present remained well satisfied with that Maxut had done, and in reward of his great trauell and expences, gaue him the charge of the Chamber at Tauris, naming him the Chamberlaine of that rich and great citie. Of which new office (though very honourable and of great importance) he tooke small pleasure, for that one Emir Chan his antient enemie was chiefe Gouernor of that city, from whom he feared some dangerous trecherie: wherefore he appointed his deputie for the execution of the office, & withdrew himselfe from Tauris to Cassangich, a place of his owne, there to passe away the time vntill it should please the king otherwise to dispose of him. But Emir Chan, who still nourished in his mind the antient hatred hee had conceiued against him, tooke this as a most fit occasion to bring him into disgrace with the king: certifying him, That Maxut not contented with the great preferment it had pleased him to bestow vpon him, had in contempt of his rewards abandoned Tauris, and substituted in his place a most base person to represent the kings maiesty & to manage his treasure: and that he absented himselfe far from that citie and the court there, hauing withdrawne himselfe into the confines of Turkie, no doubt for some mischieuous intent, either to yeeld him-

him to Constantinople; and wrote to Amurath in his letters, all that he thought was fit to be demanded, representing vnto him what great and important matters (hee hoped) might now be obtained. But before he dismissed the said embassadour, he aduised him not to goe to Amurath without resolution to offer vnto him some great good conditions, and to yeeld vnto him that country which he by force of armes had before conquered: for he knew the mind of Amurath verie well, that he was resolued in himselfe, not to yeeld so much as one hand breadth of that ground which hee had woon with the sword. But to returne againe to Sinan the Generall, who from Siuas had sent the said embassadour to Constantinople (as is before declared:) & being departed thence, arriued at Erzirum, where he tooke a surucy of his army, and other prouision necessarie for this expedition: and so from thence was now come to Chars, from whence hee dispatched the Persian embassadour, much discontented that no other conclusion for peace could be wrought.

Maxut Chan at last arriuing at the Persian court, reported vnto the king all that had happened in this his embassage: the sum whereof was, That Amurath would not condiscend to any condition of peace, vnlesse the whole countrey of Siruan might be yeelded vnto him, for that hee had once (as he said) conquered the same. himselfe vnto them, or els to haue intelligence with them, and was like enough to be guilty to himselfe of the great errour he had already committed, by offering Siuan vnto the Turkish king, and making promise of so large conditions, whereby he had obtained such a sure estate for him, or conduct him, when as he had before discouered himselfe to be a fauourer of the Turkish a traitor to his owne king: and that therefore it were good to make triall of his inclination, and so peraduenture to decline some great mischiefe, tending to the danger of the Persian state. This malicious accusation slily contriued, so wrought in the mind of the suspitious king, that he commanded Emir Chan secretly to apprehend Maxut, and to bring him to the court, and if he could not by other meanes, then by torture to inforce from him the truth of all those matters. Glad was Emir to haue his enemie thus put into his hands; and thought it long vntill he had brought this shame vpon Maxut: who hauing already heard some inckling thereof, resolued with himselfe to do any thing, rather than to fall into the power of his hatefull enemie. And therefore at such time as fifteen tall fellowes were for that purpose sent vnto him from Emir Chan, who in the kings name summoned him to the court, he without making any shew that he took the matter otherwise than well, entertained them courteously, & made them great cheere: but when he perceiued them to be ouercome with sleep, which crept vpon them by reason of the excesse wherewith they had ouercharged themselues, he caused them to be straitly bound, and with long cords hanged them downe into a deep well, and there shut them vp, secretly couered. Then gathering together the most precious things he had in his house, and leauing his wiues, his children, his brethren, and nephews on horseback, fled with all his familie in the euening, and the next day arriued at Salmas, and was there friendly entertained by the Turkish Bassa, & from thence conueied to Van, where he was also courteously welcommed by Cicala Bassa, and honorably accompanied, sent to Sinan the Generall, who very glad of his comming, sent him with all diligence to Constantinople to Amurath. And this was in effect the end of the first enterparlance of peace betwixt the Persians and the Turks.

Sinan remained at Chars eight daies, and the certaine surueyed his armie and prouision; and afterwards set forward towards Tomanis, with resolution there to build a fort. But being come thither, he could by no meanes put that his designement in execution, by reason of the immoderat rain, which continually by the space of eight daies fell in such abundance, as that neither did the Sun appeare, or the skie cleare. Beside that, Sinan greatly feared lest the enemie taking the opportunitie of this rain, of the straight, and of the building, should assault his armie, and finding it in euill plight and out of order, greatly endamage it: wherefore casting off his former determination for fortifying at Tomanis, he remoued thence, to carry succours to Teflis. But as soon as he was risen with his armie, and past the strait, Tal-Ogli Captaine of the Ianizaries of Damasco, and Homar Sanzacke of Saffero, hauing receiued secret intelligence, that hard by, a little out of the way, was good store both of corne and cattell, resolued with themselues to go thither to fetch in that booty: and so with two thousand souldiers greedy of prey they set forward. Now Simon the Georgian and the Persians, following the Turks armie a far off, had diuided his souldiers into all such places as where there was either corne, or water, or any such thing as might allure the Turks to scatter themselues from the camp: and perceiuing these hungry Turkes carelesly to run headlong to lay hold on this desired bootie, he suddenly fell vpon them, and cut them in pieces, being disordered; so that of those two thousand escaped but Tal-Ogli the Captaine of the Ianizaries only, Homar the Sanzacke, and all the rest being left dead vpon the ground.

Sinan commeth to Teflis.

Sinan holding on his way, in two daies came to Teflis, where presently he called a counsell of all the chiefe men of his armie, taking order, That euery man vpon his oath, should depose the truth touching the greatnesse of Teflis: which he did onely in reproch of Mustapha the great Bassa, who most vntruly had informed Amurath, That it was as great and populous as Damasco, whereas in truth it was not in any respect to be compared vnto that so famous a City. After that, he diuided the treasure and succors he had brought, among the souldiers of the fortresse, cheering them vp with good words, and promises of great matters. And because the souldiers there in garrison complained greatly against the Bassa their Captaine, hee caused a bil of complaint to be framed against him, & finding him guilty, that he had conuerted the souldiers pay to his own vse, he condemned him to the restitution thereof, and so immediatly discharging him of his office, placed in his roome Guisuf Bey, a lord of Georgia; who for the antient enmitie betweene him and Simon, had yeelded himselfe to the Turkes, and was of them so esteemed, that Sinan trusted him with the custodie of that fort, which with so many dangers had beene maintained and defended all that day.

All things thus set in order at Teflis, Sinan with his armie departed thence, and hauing again passed the strait of Tomanis, there came vnto him Mustassed Bassa (afterward gouernour of Aleppo) declaring vnto him, That not far off was great store of corne and cattell, and no bootie but onely a few Georgians to keepe the same, and therefore wished him to send forth some to fetch it in, whereof, though it had bin much more, his armie then stood in great need. Sinan was well affected vnto this Mustassed, and therefore the easilier inclined by him to send for the aforesaid bootie: but moued with the fresh remembrance of that which had happened to Tal-Ogli & Homar, he gaue order, That to fetch in this corne and cattell there should go out 1000 horsemen and their seruants, among whom was also the same Mustassed as their Generall. Now stood Tocomes Simon, and the other Persian captains in feare of ambush, waiting when any of the Turks should come to fetch in this bootie. Whereupon the aforesaid souldiers being now come as they desired, and hauing almost charged all their mules & horses with the which best pleased them to make choice of, the hidden Persians all on a sudden issued out of their lurking places among them, and with great slaughter put them to flight, and with such furie pursued the victorie, that they slew of them 7000, carried away many prisoners aliue, and the mules and horses laden with the stolne bootie. Mustassed was the first that fled, and the first that brought the vnhappy news of that ouerthrow to Sinan: which was forthwith confirmed by the report of such as had by speedie flight escaped the furie of the enemie. Whereupon Sinan dispatched the Bassa of Caramania with a great power, charging him where soeuer he should find the enemie, to set vpon him; and presently rising himselfe with his whole campe, followed the said Bassa: but all too late; for the Persians after the aforesaid victorie, without staying had withdrawne themselues into their strong places, knowne only to such as were well acquainted with the difficult passages of Georgia: and hauing there disposed of their prey, were now returning to await some fresh occasion of new slaughter. But when they descried the whole armie of the Turks vpon the rising of a certaine hill, they were afraid to meet them, yea and stood in some doubt also, lest Sinan should discend from the hill, and so assault them: for which cause they retired themselues againe into the strength of the mountaines; yet not with such speed but that the Turks ouertooke some few of them, and slew about fiftie or threescore of them, whose heads in signe of triumph they carried a good part of the way vpon the points of their speares: and tooke prisoners about threescore and ten more.

Sinan departeth from Teflis

Seuen thousand Turkes slaine by the Georgians and Persians.

At last Sinan with all his armie hauing passed these dangerous places of Georgia, arriued at Triala, where it was told him, That the Persian king in person himselfe being already departed from Tauris, with an exceeding great armie was comming to bid him battell. At which news he caused proclamation to be presently made thorow all his army, That euery man should put himselfe in readinesse for the voyage to Tauris, whither he himselfe meant to go to meet with the king his enemy. In the mean time (as is reported) he dispatched certain posts to the Persian king, then at Carachach, to entreat him to send another Embassador to Amurath for peace, thinking by that meanes (as some do coniecture) to remoue the king from the resolution of comming to assaile him, if he had any such meaning. After this proclamation made, he discended into the open and large plaines of Chielder; where presently he mustred his whole army, and gaue it out, That before he would set forward toward Tauris, he would make triall of the readinesse and nimblenesse of his souldiers, in such sort as if they should presently ioine battel with the enemie: which without further delay he put in execution the next morning, formally ranging his whole armie in order of battell, and then sending out some few others to shew themselues vpon the top of certaine hils, as if they had been enemies that came to seise vpon his armie; he caused all his artillery to be discharged, and commanded euery man to skirmish & bestir himselfe altogether after the same manner as if the enemie had beene there present before them: where the thundring of the great and small shot, the thicke stormes of arrowes, with the brightnesse of the armor and weapons, yeelding forth lightnings as if it had bin firy beames, and the noise of drummes and trumpets and other instruments of warre, with the ensignes of blew and yellow flying in the winde, made such a medly of all things, as if it had been the turmoyle of a very battell indeed. In the end hee caused the retreat to be sounded; and then setting all his armie in order againe, made the like shew the second time, and so the third time G which was indeed performed with the great scorne and derision of his souldiers; who called it rather childrens play, than any commendation to the proud Bassa. These counterfeits of war thus finished, yet did he not set forward toward Tauris, as he had giuen it out, but loitered eight dayes in those plaines of Chielder. At which time there arriued out of Persia one Aider the Aga, as an Embassador from the King, who was by Sinan with great joy entertained. Diuers were the things by this Embassador propounded, such as had Maxut Cha before? but the conclusion of all was, that the Persian King would be content voluntarily to relinquish Chars and Teflis, and so remaine as he did before, in amitie with Amurath; and so desired Sinan to conclude a peace with his Master, if it might be: as for himselfe, this message done, he was presently to returne into Persia. For this peace Sinan promised to deale with H Amurath, so that the Persian King would send another Embassador to Constantinople. Vpon which conclusion the said Aider returned into Persia, and at Tauris declared to the King what he had seene, what promises he had receiued of Sinan, and withall exhorted him to send a new Embassador vnto the Turkish Court. After this, when the publique rumor of the com-ming of the Persian King was found to be false, Sinan in stead of going to Tauris, returned to Chars, where he idely stayed a whole moneth, to the generall maruelling and murmuring of all his armie, astonished to see themselues (to the great charges of their King, and the disfurnishment of his whole Kingdome) brought forth not for any honorable conquest, but as it were onely of purpose to make a vaine shew of war.

Sinan commeth to Erzirum, & there breaketh vp his armie.

At last he departed from Chars, for that now Winter was come on, and the frosts & snowes I did his armie great harme; and so comming to Erzirum, there presently dismissed euery man to goe and winter in his owne countrey; but remained still himselfe in the same citie. From whence he by speedie posts diligently aduertised Amurath of the succors he had left at Teflis, of the losses he had receiued from the enemie, of all that which was by Mustapha misreported, of the comming of the Persian Embassador to him, of the promise made vnto him touching a new Embassador, & to be short, of all his whole actions. Besides all this, he aduertised Amu- rath, That the enterprise of Persia was a very hard, long, & difficult matter, & such a one as needed another manner of preparation than had bin as yet appointed for it: and that if he desired to subdue Persia, it was then very necessary that he should speak with him at large, & discourse vpon many particularities, which could not so well without exceeding tediousnesse be decla- L red by writing. After that, he sent other messengers also, to solicite Amurath for his returne to Constantinople; continually telling him, That it was not possible to signifie by writing, what he purposed to report to him by word of mouth, for the better accomplishing of the enterprise begun. Nothing in the world did Sinan abhor more than this war, hauing his mind altogether bent against the affaires of the Christians in Europe, and therefore sought by all means possible for the diuerting of those wars from the East, into some other quarters. At last he wrought so much, he entreated so much, he writ so many letters, and solicited the matter so earnestly, that Amurath was perswaded to send for him to Constantinople, as soone as euer he was certified of the arriuall of the new Embassadour from Persia, of whom Sinan had before aduertised him.
For he was resolued either to grow to a peace with the said Embassadour, if he came with ho- L nourable conditions; or if he came not, or that after his comming they could not agree vpon the peace, then to put in execution those his conceits whereof hee must needs in particular talke with Sinan by word of mouth. At length the promised Embassador called Ebraim Chan, a man of great eloquence, and highly honoured in Persia, came to Sinan; whereof Sinan gaue present intelligence to Amurath, beseeching him again, to permit him to come to Constantinople. Which his request Amurath then granted. Whereupon Sinan forthwith returned to the Court, where he attended the vniuersall gouernment of the whole Empire. At his first com-ming to the presence of Amurath, (wherein he discourfed not with him of any thing, but of the comming of the Persian Embassadour) the conditions were set downe which they were to require for the reducing of the capitulations of this peace to a good end. After which M agreement the Embassadour being now come, and most magnificently receiued in Constantinople, had audience. At wich time he with much [illegible]ious speech laboured to persuade Amurath, That his King had a most ardent desire to be reconciled vnto him, and to joyne his forces with his against the Enemies of the Mahometane Religion; and that for that pur-

A pose he was now especially come thither: which his good purpose, if it were answered with like zeale on his part, there would thereof ensue the greatest vnitie and friendship that euer was betweene any Mahometan Princes. Whereunto Amurath gaue him no other answer, but that he should thereof talke with his Visier, and with him entreat of all matters concerning the peace: and so he was by Amurath entertained and dismissed both at one time.

Now had Amurath called to Constantinople his eldest sonne Mahomet (who afterward succeeded him in the Empire) being then about sixteene yeares old, to circumcise him, according to the custome of the Turkes; following therein the inueterate Law of the Hebrewes. Vnto which solemnitie many Christian Princes were solemnly inuited; who accordingly sent thither their Embassadors with great gifts and presents, in token of peace and confederacie; namely Rodulphus the Emperour, Henrie the third the French King, Stephen King of Polonia: the B State of Venice, the King of Persia, the Moore Kings of Morocco and Fez, the Princes of Moldauia, Valachia, and others. With all triumph and joy was the circumcision of this yong Prince solemnised by the space of fortie dayes and fortie nights, in the great market place of Constantinople; where all the Embassadours aforesaid had their scaffolds prepared and furnished according to their degrees and States, and receiued such entertainment as might be shewed at such a kinde of barbarous spectacle: Only the Persian Embassador, who had also his scaffold seuered to himselfe, but not regarded as the rest, reioyced not at these feasts and triumphs: for among sundrie other wrongs and scorne done by the commandement of Amurath vnto the Persian nation, (as by hanging vp certaine counterfeit pictures of Persians made of laths and C sticks, and then burning them, and in many scornefull sorts abusing them) the Turke, for the great displeasure he had conceiued for the harme done to Osman Bassa and the Turks in Siruan much about that time, and for the disdaine he had taken against Ebraim Chan (as one not condiscending to the conditions of peace which he expected, nor yeelding to any more than the other Embassador had done before, seemed to haue come as a Spie to marke the Turkish affaires, or to mocke Amurath, rather than to put in execution any good matter to pacifie the mindes of the two mightie Princes) commanded the standing before appointed for him, in disgrace of him to be cast downe, and himselfe and all his followers to be shut vp as close prisoners in the house of Mahamet Bassa at Constantinople; where he was so straightly kept, that though an hundred of his followers there died of the plague, which shortly after began to D wax hot in the citie, yet could he not obtaine so much fauor as to be remoued into some other place, but there was inforced to tarrie it out, vntill that afterward order was taken, he should be carried thence as prisoner to Erzirum. To end these solemnities, Mahomet the yong prince was circumcised, not publiquely, but in his fathers chamber, by Mechmet one of the inferiour Bassa's, sometime the Emperour Solymans Barber.

Io. Leunc. sup. Annal. Turc. pag. 82.

Now whilest Sinan as great Visier sat commanding in Constantinople, the garisons of Chars and Teflis (kept in by the enemie, and hauing receiued none other reliefe than a little which Sinan before his departure from Erzirum, had by good hap caused to be secretly conueyed vnto them) were thought to be driuen to great wants. Which thing Sinan right well knew, and fearing lest those two places which had with so much ado beene both gained and maintai- E ned, should for want of new succors fall againe into the hand of the enemie: he both boldly and freely counselled Amurath to send a new garrison to Van, for the safetie of the countrey thereabouts, and then vnder the conduct of some valiant captaine, to send succours to Teflis. Vpon which point Amurath asked Sinan his opinion, and willed him to bethinke himselfe of some fit man. Hereupon Sinan propounded diuers vnto him, but none of them pleased him; for why, he was before resolued, in despight of Sinan and of his counsel, to bestow this charge vpon Mahamet Bassa nephew to Mustapha the late Bassa, and for his sake hated of Sinan. This Bassa Mahamet he sent to Erzirum, with the title of the Bassa of that prouince, honouring him withall with the name of Generall of the armie for Teflis. And presently gaue commande- ment to Hassan the Bassa of Caraemit, to Mustaffa sometime called Manucchiar the Georgian, F to all the Sanzackes, the Curdi, and the souldiers of Erzirum, that they should resort to the standard of Mahamet their Generall, and so to follow him to Teflis. Whereupon there assembled together out of all the sayd places about fiue and twentie thousand souldiors, with all things necessarie for the reliefe of the distressed garrison which was in Teflis. Commandement was also giuen to the Bassa's of Aleppo and Maras, to repaire to Van with all their souldiers, souldiers, and there to abide till Winter: which they accordingly did, not molested nor trou- G bled by any enemie.

The end of August Mahamet Bassa departed from Erzirum, with the Bassa of Caraemit, and [illegible] armie, carrying with him money, corne, and all other things needfull for the re-lefe of the Castle, and eight dayes came to Chars, and from thence to Archelec, not troubled by any by the Archelec he found Mustaffa (otherwise called Manucchiar) the Georgian, with all his souldiers, whome the Generall most joyfully entertained, and honoured him with gifts, and withall admonished him to continue in his obedience to Amurath, and to conduct him with his armie the shortest and safest way to Teflis: for that some were of opinion, that it were best to go by Tomanis, and some other, by the way of Mustaffa his countrey: wherein Mustaffa [illegible] to the him, that the easiest and shortest way lay through his owne countrey, being H also in his opinion the safest. This counsell of Mustaffa pleased Mahamet greatly, so that hee made choice of him to be the guide of his armie, reposing himselfe wholly vpon his [illegible]nd direction: and so departed thence towards Teflis, passing through Altunchala and C[illegible]ala, both belonging to the said Georgian, abounding with all things necessarie for the sustenance of man, neither were they euer disturbed by any enemie. Hauing passed Mustaffa his country, they came to a friendly castle called Gori, from whence they discouered in certaine fields a great armie of the Georgians mingled with Persians, but apparelled after the manner of Georgia: these were those Captaines of Persia, sent from the Persian King (as in other yeares before) to aid the Georgians; who secretly conioyned with Simon Chan the Georgian, had changed their apparell, because the treatie of peace should not be disturbed, and their King accounted vniust of his word; who vnder a colour of a treatie of peace, whiles Amurath attended I nothing else but to succour and defend his conquered Countries, without purpose to annoy any other places, went about to procure the destruction of the Turks. These then as soone as they saw the Turkish armie, and perceiued that they also themselues were by them descried, sent Heraulds vnto them with haughtie words of [illegible]iance, and to offer them battell. With Mahamet Bassa refuseth battell offered by the Georgians and Persians. great griefe of minde did the Bassa receiue this [illegible]d defiance: but hauing no other purpose but onely to bring his succours safe to Teflis, he dismissed the Heraulds, and studied by all meanes he could to shun battell. That euening he was fauoured in his purpose by the great and continual raine which then fell, and serued for a reasonable excuse of his delay: but the next day prouing faire, and the Sun shining bright, both the armies marched in sight the one K of the other all day, vntill about foure houres and an halfe before night; at which time the Turks arriued neere to a riuer that seperated the one armie from the other. There the Bassa fell in consultation with Mustaffa, whether they should passe ouer the riuer before night, or stay on that side they were vntil the next morning. In which case Mustaffa aduised him to stay, as fearing lest the enemie should set vpon the armie disordered in passing the riuer, and so annoy them. Notwithstanding the General disliked this aduice of Mustaffa, hauing taken a strong conceit euen vpon the first discouerie of the enemie, that there was some intelligence & compact betweene Mustapha and the Persians, and that to that end he had maliciously persuaded him to come that way, and not by the way of Tomanis: and therefore the Bassa thinking, that if there were any such plot laid betweene Mustaffa and the enemie, to set it in some confusion, L would not in any case follow the counsell of the suspected Georgian, to stay that night; but commanded, that with the greatest speed that might be, all his soldiers with their treasure & corn should passe ouer the riuer, to the end that before night he might on the other side of the riuer incamp his army in some good place, to the scorne and derision of his enemies. Mahamet his lieutenant, a bold yong man & an hardy, was the first that ventured ouer, and after him the carriages of mony & of corne, and then the whole army, with such speed, that some of the confused multitude were drowned in the passage, being rather troden down with the horses & camels, than brought to their deaths either by the depth of the chanell, or swiftnesse of the riuer.

As soone as the Georgians perceiued that the Turkes had passed the riuer, without staying vntil they might settle themselues in any good order, they in great hast & fury ran vpon them, M and presently assailed them, whiles they were yet all in confusion and out of order: by reason whereof the Turkes, although they turned their faces v[illegible] their enemie, and made some go[illegible] resistance, yet in short time you might haue seene the ba[illegible]s of the riuer in many places staine[illegible] with the Turkish bloud, and many carkases of the Turks here and there scattered, without any apparant

A apparant losse among the Georgians and Persians. Amongst them that fell in this slaughter, were a number of Sanzackes, of the Curdi, and Mesopotamians: which the rest perceiuing, and by the ouerthrow of their owne, coniecturing the losse of others, turned their backes and fled: the like did the remnant of the Mesopotamians, and after them at last the whole armie: whom the Georgians pressed so sore in their flight, that many of the Turkes seeing no other way to escape, cast themselues into the riuer, and so (though hardly) escaped with their liues. Great was the shame, great was the confusion, but greatest was the losse they receiued, for that in the heat of the battell the Kings mony and corne was taken by the Georgians and Persians, euery man sauing only so much for himselfe as he could secretly hide vpon his owne bodie, or conuey by the meanes of some trustie slaue, which by the helpe of their swift horses B was preserued rather by fortune than by valour.

The Turkes discomfited, & the treasure and corne taken by the Georgians and Persians.

The Turks thus discomfited and spoiled of their reliefe, the next morning gathered themselues together againe, one with another cursing the heauens, the King, and their aduerse fortune: some of them also threatening the Georgian Renegate Mustaffa, as though all this mischiefe had hapned through his treacherie and secret intelligence with the enemie. Notwithstanding, when they found that they had still remaining so much money and other easements as might suffice to comfort the afflicted minds of the souldiers besieged in the fort, they resolued to hold on their way towards Teflis; and in their journy vsed such speed, that the day following they arriued there in the euening. But when they of the Fort saw their friends whom they had so long expected, arriued in such bad sort, and so euill furnished, they were C astonied & wonderfully grieued at this common losse, and all in a confusion protested to Mahamet, That they would abandon the place, if they had not forthwith necessary prouision made for them. But the Generall after he had with large promises mitigated their first furies & insolencies, presently in the morning caused a Diuano or counsel to be called in the castle, where hauing gathered together all the chiefe men in his armie, he spake vnto them in this manner:

Mahamet with his discomfited army commeth to Teflis.

The oration of Mahamet Bassa in the castle of Teflis.

For as much as it hath pleas'd God, that so great and important an occasion of victorie which was offered vnto vs for the honour and glorie of euery one of vs, is now fallen out so vnfortunately, that it
D hath not onely not ministred vnto vs any matter of triumphing ouer our enemies, as we should haue done, but rather hath made them (I know not how) to carrie away from vs both the triumph, and also our armour, our horses, our slaues, and our spoiles; yea and (the remembrance whereof doth most grieuously trouble and afflict me) our Sultans money, and our publique munition and forces solemnly deliuered to our conduct, is now become a bootie and a prey vnto them; that the honour which might haue made euerie one of vs famous among noble and valorous souldiers, is now fallen from our foreheads, and to our great detriment doth adorne the heads of strangers, or rather of our enemies: and that notwithstanding all this, we are now come to those couragious souldiers, which with their great valour haue defended this Fort euen in the middest of their enemies weapons and treacheries; and to whom we should yeeld that aid and relieue which the vertue of euery one of their mindes doth deserue, and which King Amurath had put into our hands to bring hither vnto them: there is now no remedie, but to resolue vpon some good E meanes, that we fall not wholly into the vtter disgrace of our Lord and King; and that is, To maintaine these soldiers in the custodie and defence of this fort: and though it be with all our wants, and all our own dishonors, to comfort these that haue so long time looked for vs, and so well deserued all manner of relieue. We cannot excuse our selues, that our enemies were better than wee either in number or instruments of war; for both in the one and the other we were far beyond them: neither yet can we say, that they set vpon vs by night, or at vnawares; for when we saw their number, their weapons, their horses, and finally their approch, and their manner of assault, yet we would needs passe ouer the riuer and ioyne battell with them. Which we now know hath fallen out very lamentable vnto vs, because wee were more readie to take our flight, than to endure the fight; and to vse our feet, than to occupie our hands. And therefore it is verie requisit, as well to satisfie the rigor of iustice, as to performe the dutie of souldiers, that wee suffer not our lord & king to lose his mony, which he trusted into our hands, & which we haue lost, not by greater strength
F nor by any treacherous stratagem of our enemies, but by our owne too too important feare, and too base a regard of our liues, before which, it was the dutie of euery one of vs to haue preferred the care of honour. For if by fighting and couragious sustaining the assaults of our enemies, though they had bin stronger, and better armed than we, this misfortune had hapned vnto vs, and that we could in any sort haue represented to the king and the world an honorable and bloudie battell, wee should not now haue had any need to seeke

meanes how to repay this losse, and to restore the thing that violently was taken from vs by such as were G more mightie than our selues, and these honorable souldiers should more easily haue digested with vs the lamentable calamitie. But we haue lost that money, and in very deed hauing as it were willingly bestowed [illegible] on the Georgians and Persians, to redeeme our liues, and to saue vs from their fury, are bound to re[illegible] or els for euer hereafter to be challenged as lawfull debtors to the King for it. And therefore my [illegible] mates and companions, if you will take a good course, let euerie one of vs without further consultation, put his hand into his priuate purse (if he haue not foolishly cast that also into the hands of the ra-uenous enemie) and with our owne money let vs succour the necessitie of these men, and haue regard to the honour of our King. So shall we make our slight lesse blame-worthie, we shall iustifie our actions more honestly, and that which is of greatest importance, we shall better pacifie the wrath of Amurath, which he might most iustly conceiue against vs. I my selfe before you all am most read to disburse foure thousand H duckets towards it: if it shall please you all to follow me accordingly, we shall deliuer these souldiers from their great necessitie, and acquite our selues from the intricate bonds of most troublesome disp[illegible]rs.

There might a man haue seene a thousand countenances changed a thousand manner of wayes; for one softly whispered many a curse and shame vpon the King, vpon Mahamet, yea and vpon God himselfe; another denied to disburse any thing; another determined priuily to steale away; and some said one thing, and some another: but in the end euery man was induced to follow the example of Mahamet; and thereupon hauing made a purse according to euery mans abilitie, there was collected thirtie thousand duckets among them. And presently after, word was sent to Leuent Ogli at Zaghen, to send thither graine, muttons, and other necessary prouisions, that they might the better continue the defence of the I Fort.

The Turkes assuming that they make a purse of 30000 duckets for the reliefe of the garrison of Teflis.

Two dayes onely stayed Mahamet in Teflis, and hauing changed such souldiers as desired to be dismissed, and also appointed Homar Bassa Gouernour of Teflis, in stead of Giusuf that there gouerned before, he departed. But before his departure consultation was had, Whether they should keepe the way of Tomanis, or the way they came through the countrey of Mustaffa the Georgian: and in the end they resolued to keepe the way of Tomanis, and thereupon order was taken that they should all passe the riuer. The Curdi were the first that went ouer, and had alreadie pitched their Tents vpon the farther side of the water; when the Generall began to reuoke his former order, and sent them word, That they should returne, be- K cause he was now determined to goe backe the same way he came. At which message the Sanzackes were in a rage, and in plaine termes sent him answer, That these mutabilities beseemed not them, being men accustomed to warre, but to be rather childrens play, than manly resolution, and that for their parts they were minded not to change their journy, but would go on the same way they had begun: and so forwards they went (say the General what he could) and by the way of Tomanis arriued at Chars long before Mahomet; who was much grieued at this their so great disobedience: but seeing no other remedy, he with the Bassa of Caraemit and Mustapha the Georgian, put themselues on their journey, euen by the same way they came to Teflis. At last Mahamet arriued at Altunchala, the chiefe Castle of Mustaffa the Georgian, and burning with the desire of reuenge of those losses, (which he thought himselfe L to haue receiued by the treacherie of Mustaffa) or, as some thought, seeking by this means to make Amurath beleeue, that in truth all the forepassed mischiefes had happened not through their cowardise, but through the treacherous and malicious deuices of the Georgian, and so to make their receiued losses seeme more pardonable: he deuised with himselfe how to finde out such a plot, as that Mustaffa might vpon the sudden be taken away, as guiltie of so foule a treason. And that he had deuised, was in this sort: To call a Councell into his owne Pauilion, as if hee had receiued some commandement from the Court; and hauing caused Mustaffa to come into that roome, whilest the said counterfeit commandement should be in reading, to cause his Lieutenant, with those chiefe of his band that stood about him, to fall vpon him and presently to cut off his head. This pretended Councell was accordingly called; M wherein sate the Bassa himselfe, and with him the Bassa of Caraemit, certaine Sanzackes subiect to the Iurisdiction of Erzirum, the Capagi Bassa or chiefe Gentleman Vsher, and the Generals Lieutenant; with whome he had vpon their solemne oathes for secrecie, communicated his intended deceit. The Georgian Mustapha was also called accordingly: who both Mahamet deuiseth how to betray Mustaffa the Georgian.

A both because he was beloued of moe than one; and had also vsed all diligent circumspection; but especially hauing heard in the armie some priuie whisperings of such a matter, knew full well of all that was deuised against him, and therefore prouided also for his owne defence. But as touching his going to the counsell, he thought he might not denie so to do, lest by his absence he might seeme guiltie of the fault whereof he was (peraduenture not without cause) suspected; and thereby to leaue his cities for a prey to their enemies, now in the heart of his countrie. And therfore resoluing to go, he deuised how so to do with most safetie; and so, as if need should be, he might be able to turne the mischiefe intended against him, vpon the head of the Generall himselfe. And therefore hauing chosen out fiftie of his most faithfull and re-
B solute souldiers, he commanded them to follow him to the counsell appointed in the Generals pauillion: and being come thither, to stay there ready and attentiue at his first and one only call, suddenly and forcibly to rush into the pauillion with their weapons; and rather than any wrong should be done vnto him, to shew their valour against the Turks, without exception of any person whatsoeuer. These men by nature enemies vnto the Turks, vnderstanding well his meaning, setled themselues vpon the execution: and taking vnto them some other also of their faithfull and trustie friends, followed him euen to the pauillion of Mahamet: where Mustaffa entring into the place of counsell, desired of the Generall, to know what his pleasure was; who presently caused the counterfeit commandement to be read; whereunto Mustaffa gaue an attentiue eare. But when the other Bassa's and Sanzackes began to sit downe (contrary to the maner C of the Turks, who whensoeuer any commandement of the Emperors is in reading, vse alwaies to stand vp, and not to sit downe vntill it be full read) the Georgian tooke his leaue, promising to be euer readie to performe, not onely that order of the kings, but also whatsoeuer else hee should command. And so being about to depart, the Capigi Bassi (or great Vsher) of Mahamet came vnto him, and plucking him by the sleeue, would haue forced him to sit downe. Then Mustaffa crying out aloud, drew his sword, wherwith he strucke Mahamets lieutenant, that was right against him; and with his left hand hauing raught the roll from his pate, with his right hand suddenly (to the great astonishment of all that were present) at one only blow parted his head, his necke, and his breast in twaine, euen to his very stomacke; so that he died (a strange spectacle to behold) beeing thus cut in sunder, with his cleft head and two shoulders hanging D downe vpon their seuerall sides. After this first, he redoubled his second stroke, aiming at the head of the Bassa of Caraemit: but it being defended with the wrythen rols of the turbant, it slipped downe by his eare; yet so, that with a piece of the said turbant it carried his eare quite away, with a little also of the flesh of his cheeke: and all enraged, eagerly assailed Mahamet Bassa the Generall (who now all in confusion was risen vp in the tumult) and wounded him with fiue mortall wounds; which were yet afterwards by cunning hand healed; when they had brought him euen to deaths doore. At the crie of this Georgian all his people rushed in together: vpon whose confused tumult, and the feare that Mustaffa through his furie had strucke into the Turks, the camp was presently raised: and euery man with all speed departing thence,
E put himself on his way towards Chars, whether also were brought the two wounded Bassaes and the rest that were ill handled and greatly feared with these sudden and vncouth stirres.

Mustaffa notably reuengeth himselfe of the treacherie intended against him by Mahamet the Generall.

Of all this treacherie intended against him, Mustaffa sent present information to the Turkish Emperor; finding himselfe greatly grieued, at the false suspition that Mahamet had wrongfully conceiued against him, to his great dishonor: and wrought so cunningly, that Amurath in token of his good liking and contentment, sent him both cloth of gold and a battleaxe all gilt. Mahamet on the other side entermeddling heere and there with all the art that possibly he could deuise, all hatefull and iniurious termes, sent large aduertisements of all the misfortunes that had hapned; and aggrauated to the king, both the treacheries of Mustaffa, and also the slender F securitie of those wayes and countries.

As soone as Amurath vnderstood the calamities of his souldiers, the losse of his mony, the great dishonour of his people, and the apparant danger wherein the fort of Teflis stood, when it was like to be abandoned: all inflamed with rage & anger, he called vnto him the Bassaes of his court (among whom sat as chiefe, the proud and haughty Sinan) and rated them all exceedingly; reprouing their lewd counsell, and recounting the losses that he had from time to time receiued, as if they had hapned through their defaults, and especially Sinan, as the principall occasion of all these mischiefs: who like an improuident foole (as he said) would needs relinagainst Abas Mirize his sonne (then with him in disgrace) determined with himselfe, to leaue the matters on this side of his kingdom in their present state, and to march toward Heri: whereunto he was earnestly solicited by his elder son Emir Hamze Mirize, but especially by Mirize Salmas his Visier. Vpon which resolution, committing the defence of Reiuan, Nassiuan, & that side of his kingdome, to Emir Chan Gouernor of Tauris, he set forward himselfe with his armie towards Casbin; and so marching through diuers prouinces, arriued at length at Salusa, being on that side the chiefe of all the cities subiect to the iurisdiction of Heri: which citie he tooke by force, and without delay caused the Gouernor thereof to be beheaded; although he alledged a thousand excuses for himselfe, and obiected a thousand accusations more against the seditious Visier. The king after this, departing thence, and hauing also put to death certain captains & Sultans, that were accused by the Visier to be confederats in the rebellion of his sonne, he arriued at last at the desired city of Heri. Very strong is this citie by scituation; compassed about with a good wall; and watered with deepe channels of running Springs, conueyed into it by Tamerlane their founder or restorer: beside that, there was in it many valiant captains; enemies to Mirize Salmas, ready to lay down their liues in defence of themselues and of Abas their Lord; so that the winning thereof, could not but proue both long and difficult. As soon as the king approched the city, he felt in himselfe many troubled passions arising of griefe and pittie; it grieued him to thinke that he should beget so graceless a sonne, who in stead of maintaining his state and honour, should seeke his ruine and destruction: it grieued him also to remember the bloud of his subiects, before spilt vpon so strange an occasion; & scarcely durst he enter into the cogitation, thenceforth to shed any more of the bloud of his people. Neuertheless, being still more and more solicited by his Visier, he attempted to vnderstand the mind of his sonne; and (if it might be possible) to get him into his hands. But whiles the king trauelling, with these thoughts lay with his army before Heri, Abas Mirize in the meane time, writ diuers letters to his father and to his brother; wherein he besought them, That they would make knowne vnto him the occasion of this their stir: for if desire of rule had moued them to seeke the depriuation of him, being their sonne and brother, from the honor he lawfully possessed, and which his father himselfe procured for him of his grandfather Tamas, they ought to abandon their imagination, for that he was always ready to spend his wealth and his bloud, together with his estate, in their seruice, and acknowledged his father to be his good father & king: but if they were not induced hereunto for this cause, but by a desire to reuenge some trespasses that he had committed to the preiudice of the crown of Persia, or his fathers honor, he was most ready to submit himselfe to any amends; and with all reason, to yeeld vnto them the kingdome, yea the whole world, and euen his owne life, the rather to satsfie their mindes with a more full contentation. With twice and thrice reading ouer, were these affectionate letters considered & digested: and at last, both the father and the brother perceiuing in them such liberality of words, & ouercome with pitty, or if not with pitty, yet with great admiration & contentment, they determined to put the matter in practise; and moderating their desire of reuenge, to attempt the reducing of the yong mans mind to some good passe. Whereupon they wrot backe vnto him, That no greedie desire to vsurpe his gouernment, had induced them to make so great a voyage, to trouble so much people, and to shed such abundance of bloud, but only his disobedience and presumption, in that he had caused himselfe to be called the king of Persia; and had not sent so much as one captaine to aid them in the late wars against the Turks. Glad was Abas the young Prince, when he vnderstood the accusations that were laied against him; hoping to make it manifest before all men, how the king & his brother were misinformed in these particularities: and therefore incontinently did write backe vnto them, That if they would faithfully promise him, honourably, & without any outrage to receiue his Embassadors, he would send vnto them such euident matter, and so cleere information touching those his accusations, as that they should not onely cleerely perceiue that there was neuer any such kind of thought in him, but also that he had always desired & labored the contrary: and would moreouer open vnto them such matter, as in respect of other men, and not of himselfe, might cause their comming to proue profitable and commodious to all the Kingdome of Persia. Which his request they both solemnly promised faithfully to performe, being very desirous to vnderstand, what those strange nouelties should be. Whereupon Abas Mirize sent vnto them two of his chiefe counsellors, men of great account & reuerence both for their yeres & wise-

The Persian Captaines in the meane time, with their spoyles and diuets of their enemies ensignes, were with great ioy receiued at home in Persia: but when the discord that fell out betweene Mahamet Bassa and Mustaffa the Georgian was also reported, the former ioy was redoubled; euery man beeing of opinion, that these discords might bee great impediments vnto the Turks further attempts into Persia; which it was feared they would the next yeare attempt, to the great danger of Nassiuan and Tauris. Vpon which occasion the Persian King perceiuing that hee could not haue a fitter opportunitie to imploy himself against the charge of his armie and like a king sit idle at Constantinople, standing (as it were) at ne publicke triumph to behold and heare the miseries and misfortunes of others: having before in the time that Mustapha was Generall, most vainly boasted, with the like power that he had, to fetch the Persian king out of Casbin, and to deliuer him in bonds to Amurath; but had in deed performed nothing worth the remembrance. Sinan could do no lesse but make answer to the wrathfull king, yet not with such mildnesse and modestie as in such a case hee should peraduenture haue done; but in proud and peremptorie manner, without any reuerence or regard, told him plainly, That as the last yere a little before his returne to Constantinople, fiue-cors had been conueyed to Teflis without any losse or trouble (as in truth they were) so had they been this yeare also, if he had put his aduise in execution as much as he detested and contemned it: for he did then giue him to vnderstand that Mahamet Bassa could not be such a man for so great a charge; & that it was necessary to haue chosen in his roome some taine of valour and discretion; but seeing he would needs make choice of the same he was not now to blame any other for this error but only himselfe. As for his coming to Constantinople, it was a thing long before thought most needful, not only for his aduise touching the matter of peace might be brought to some good passe, but also because it was not to the desired issue, then hee had to talke with him [illegible] throw of his enterprise: which thing as yet he had not [illegible] commissions, they should be ready to returne against the Persians, and to put in execution C what should be inioyned them by their new Generall. The fame whereof flew as farre as Soria, Iuria, Palestine, Mesopotamia, Babylonia, to Balsara, to Sinas, to Maras, to all Bythinia, Cappa-docia, Galatia, Armenia; yea and beyond Constantinople to the borders of Hungarie and Greece, in briefe, to all the Regions that were woont to come to this Warre: all which sent their Ambassadors and souldiers accordingly. And so at last Generall Ferat departing from Constantinople, and passing ouer to Scutari by the way of Amasia and of Sinas, came to Erzirum, where hee tooke a view of all his armie and prouision: and from thence in eight dayes arriued at Chars, conducted by the Persian fugitiue Meaxut Chan: and from Chars, set himselfe on his way towards Reiuan. Three daies before hee came to Reiuan, of cer- H taine ruines of an old Castle which the Turkes call Aggia Chalasi (or the Castle of strangers) he caused a new fort to be made, and left in it a garrison of foure hundred souldiers, with a Sanzacke, and certaine peeces of ordnance, and then went to Reiuan. This countrie is distant from Tauris eight or nine dayes iourney, betweene which two places are seituat Nassiuan, Chiulfal, Marant, and Sofian, all enriched with goodly gardens and pleasant greenes: but in the way are many craggie mountaines to be climed, and sundrie hard passages either for armie or traueller.

Ferat in the space of fifteene daies buildeth a fort at Reiuan 750 yards about

Heere then did Ferat encampe himselfe with his armie; and taking aduie of his chiefe captaines, where he should build the fort, they all with one consent aduised him, to seise vpon the houses and gardens of Tocomac, and there to fortifie. Which he accordingly did, enclosing the gardens with strong wals and deepe ditches round about, wherinto he conueied water from a I certaine riuer, that comming downe from the mountains, ran into Araxis. Which worke was performed with such expedition, that within the space of fifteene daies the fortresse was finished, being in circuit seuen hundred & fiftie yards. It grieued Tocomac exceedingly, thus to lose his country and dwelling, and so much the more, because it hapned so suddenly, and as it were vnlooked for. He himselfe, as soone as he vnderstood that the Turkish armie was comming to that coast, hauing withdrawne himselfe and his men of war out of the city he could not keep, sought by all means to be reuenged, if not altogether, yet in some part, of this so great an iniu-rie. And therfore he wrot vnto the king at Corazan, to Emir Chan at Tauris, to Simon in Georgia, he gathered souldiers out of the villages, and vsed all his possible indeuour to enable himselfe to annoy the enemies army: but from none of these places could he receiue any help, the K king being so far off in wars against his sonne, the Georgian being busied by hindering any re-liefe to be brought to the besieged in Teflis; as for Emir Chan (who by solemne promise vnto the king before his departure to Heri, had vndertaken the defence of that side of the kingdom against the Turks) he either would not, or could not stir, neither sent so much as one souldier, hauing as some supposed, secret intelligence with Generall Ferat, not to disturbe him in this his worke. So Tocomac destitute of all other helpe, and not able of himselfe to do much against so mightie an enemie; yet ceased not to lay such priuie ambushes for the Turkes as he could, killing of them sometimes 100, sometime 150, and sometimes mo, as they fell into his danger.
And to ease his stomacke against Emir Chan (who sitting still at Tauris as it were to behold his miserie, would not so much as shake a sword against these spoiling Turks) he spared not to dis- L patch certaine horsemen in hast to the king at Corazan, and by eloquent letters to amplifie the cowardise of Emir Chan; intermedling withall some causes of suspition, that he had some intelligence with the Turkish Generall.

Ferat hauing thus built this new fort at Reiuan, as Amurath had commanded, and furnished it with artillerie, and all other things needfull for the defence thereof, appointed Sinan Bassa (the sonne of Cicala a renegat of Genoa, and by Selymus the late Emperor, in the flower of his youth created Aga or Captaine of the Ianizaries) with a garrison of eight thousand souldiers to keepe the same. And so departing thence, by the way of Aggia Chalasi, in ten daies arriued with his armie at Chars.

Ferat had not long staied at Chars, but strange newes were brought thither, That Mustaffa M the Georgian (to whom Amurath had sent thirtie thousand duckats, by two of his Capigi and two of his Chiaus, to haue by him been conueyed to Teflis for the reliefe of them in the fo was reuolted from the Turkish obedience, and being now become a rebell, had left that fo tresse in manifest danger to yeeld, if by some other means it were not relieued. Which stran-nouelties

A nouelties exceedingly troubled the General; who to know the certainty therof, called before him all such as were the messengers of this misfortune: by whom he was certainly informed, That Mustaffa, the two Capigi, and the Chiaus, hauing put themselues vpon their way towards Teflis with the treasure, guarded with a conuoy of fiue hundred of his souldiers, in the mid way had met with his cousen Simon the Georgian; by whom hee was perswaded to returne again to his antient faith and religion, which he had to the great perill of his soule so prophane-ly abandoned, and to shake off the seruice of Amurath, which would yeeld him no other recompence than an hard and infamous captiuitie, and in the end some fraudulent and treacherous death: and that his perswasion had so preuailed with Mustaffa, that he caused the two Capigi and the Chiaus to be apprehended and presently beheaded; and diuiding the treasure B with his said cousen, had with him and his other kinsmen vowed a solemne and perpetual con-federacie: and so hauing withdrawne themselues to their woonted passages, lay there in wait for such succors as should by the Turks be brought to Teflis.

When Ferat vnderstood these and such other particularities, he all in a furie swore that hee would not returne to Erzirum vntill he had put all the countrey of Mustaffa to fire and sword: yet first he thought it needfull to relieue Teflis, which would otherwise be in danger to be yeelded to the enemy: and for that purpose made choice of Hassan Bassa, who in the last yeare of the Generalship of Mustapha, had most couragiously conueyed the like succours, and taken Aliculi Chan. Vnto him therefore did the General assigne fortie thousand duckets, with other prouision necessarie for that seruice, and for the more securitie, appointed him fifteene thou-C sand of the most choice and valiant soldiers in all the armie, to conduct the same. In ten dayes space Hassan Bassa went and came from Teflis, hauing in his journey to and fro had many skirmishes with the Georgians, wherein he lost some few men, without any other losse worth the remembrance.

After this, the General sent one Resuan Bassa with six thousand souldiers to spoile the countrey of Mustaffa the Georgian the late renegate, but now become a rebell to the Turke: which Resuan, without any long stay ouerran all his territory, burnt his townes, and committed most vncouth outrages, which extended euen vnto the poore insensible trees, and carried away with him many captiue soules, with much corne and cattell, like a raging tempest destroying whatsoeuer came in his way. Now was the General also retired to Ardachan, whither came Resuan D to meet him with his foresaid bootie. But because they had now performed what they had before intended, and the approch of Winter perswaded their returne, they remoued from Ar-dachan, and by the way of Olti retyred to Erzirum, from whence all the soldiers were licensed to depart to their seueral places of abode, and a memorial sent to Amurath, of all the actions had beene performed; and especially of the good seruice done by Hassan Bassa; who for the same, was now once againe honoured by the King, with cloath of gold, a battleaxe and targuet all gilt.

Ferat commeth to Erzirum, & there breaketh vp his armie.

About this time one Podolouius a gentleman of Polonia, sent by Stephen King of Polonia, to Constantinople, by the leaue of Amurath to buy certaine horses in Anatolia; returning home-wards with foure and twentie goodly horses which he had bought, was notwithstanding the E Great Turks Passe, by his commandement stayed vpon the way, all his men (in number foure and thirtie) slaine, excepting one boy, who getting into a wood, escaped, and Podolouius his head strucke off. The horses brought backe to Constantinople, were by the appointment of Amurath, some bestowed into his owne stable, and the rest giuen among the Bassa's, oftentimes pointed at with the fingers of the Turks, in derision of the Polonian King. This Amurath commanded to be done in reuenge of an outrage done by the Polonian Cossacks against the Turks; whereof newes was but euen then brought to the court.

The death of Hama Chadum Amurath his mother.

The nine and twentieth day of Nouember of this present yeare 1583, died Hama Chadum the widow of the late Emperor Selymus the second, and mother of this Amurath, and lieth buried by her husband Selymus, and his fiue sonnes, strangled by their brother Amurath.

Ferat raiseth a new armie.

F All the rest of this yeare 1583 Ferat spent at Erzirum, and afterwards sent out his ordinarie commandements to all the accustomed cities, to summon the souldiers against the next Spring in the yere 1584, gathering together a greater number of pioners and enginiers than euer had been gathered in these warres heretofore: and withall gaue it out, That he would go to Nassi-uan, and there do great matters. At which report the Persians were much mooued, and began

gan to cast many things in their heads about it: but aboue all others the king, who vnderstanding at Casbin of all that had before hapned at Reiuan, and of the new preparations of the Turks, began to feare that they would this yeare passe to Tauris, or at least (as was reported) to Nassiuan, and in those places build new fortresses, to the great danger of the Persian Empire: and [illegible] retaining still such forces as he brought with him from Heri, and commanding as many [illegible] could out of all the cities that were subiect vnto him, to follow him to Tauris, he arriued there with his army not long after the arrival of Ferat Bassa at Erzirum. This vnexpected comming of the Persian king with so great an armie to Tauris, filled the world with expectation of great matters to haue bin done by him against the Turks: insomuch that Ferat the Generall, before he would proceed any further, thought it good to aduertise Amurath of the matter: declaring vnto him, That his desire was to go to Nassiuan, and there to build a fortresse according to his commandement, so to lay open a passage to Tauris: but hauing receiued certaine intelligence, that the Persian king was come to Tauris with an huge army, [illegible] to encounter him; he thought it his dutie not to put in execution his aforesaid determination, without his expresse commandement. Vnto whom Amurath presently wrot backe, that the matter so standing, he should not go to Nassiuan, but onely imploy his forces to assure the passage to Tomanis and Lori, that so the fort of Teflis might the yeare following be relieued by some small band, without sending of any great armie for the conueying of succours thither. This new commandement of his Lord, Ferat kept secret to himselfe; causing the rumor of his going to Nassiuan to be more and more increased; of purpose to feed the opinion that the Persians had before conceiued of his comming thither; and so deluding them, with lesse danger to build the forts he had intended, for the quieting of those most dangerous passages of Lori and Tomanis.

Vpon this resolution Ferat hauing gathered together his people, with all things necessarie for his purpose, remoued with his armie from Erzirum toward Chars, where hee stayed ten dayes to take a new suruey both of his souldiers and [illegible] prouision. And so departing thence, set forward toward Lori; sending before him Hassan [illegible] with fiue thousand light horsemen to scoure the country euen to Tomanis, and to learne what he possibly could of the enemies purposes, and the state of Georgia. Which thing Hassan dutifully performed, speedily scouring ouer all the woods, and disclosing all the passages from thence to Lori, and so to Tomanis, without meeting with any vpon whom to assay his valour, more than certaine robbers vpon the high way, whom he caused to be slaine (as men altogether ignorant of the Georgian and Persian affaires) and their heads to be set on the tops of their launces, and so returned againe to Lori: where hauing stayed one day, he met with the Generall, to whom he recounted all that had happened in that his excursion. Ferat being come to Lori, there incamped his army. This place did sometime belong to Simon the Georgian, well strengthened with an high castle, compassed about with very deepe ditches, and a thicke wall almost a mile in circuit, but was then somewhat weakened with time: it is distant from Teflis about two dayes journy of a carriers pace. Vpon this castle Ferat seised; and hauing repaired the walls, and strengthened the breaches, he placed therein Ali Bassa of Græce, with seuen thousand souldiers for the defence thereof, and planted vpon the walls two hundred small pieces of ordnance. And so when he had set all things there in good order, departed thence with his armie towards Tomanis, hauing before commanded Ali Bassa, at some conuenient time to fortifie Saitan Chalasi, a castle about ten miles distant from Lori, and therein to place a conuenient garrison of souldiers and artillerie.

Ferat cutteth downe a thicke wood at Tomanis, & burneth it, & lieth vpon the strait.

Foure dayes were they going from Lori to Tomanis, being ordinarily but one dayes worke from the one place to the other: but now the General would needs so make it, to take the spoile of those rich fields, abounding with corne, cattel, & fruit, and to leaue vnto the country people a lamentable remembrance of his being there. At last being come to Tomanis (in times past a castle of Simons, but by reason of these warres, by him then abandoned) he began to consult with the other captaines, how and where the Fort should be erected, for the assurance of that country. But after many discourses, it was at last concluded not to fortifie in that castle, as being too far from the strait, to make that dangerous passage [illegible] and secure, but to go a little further, and to build a fortresse vpon the very mouth of the strait. So the Armie marching forward a few miles, at the very enterance of the narrow passage found the ruines of another Castle, and

A and there remained stayed themselues. This steepe headlong castle was so compassed round about with a thicke wood, which hindered all discouery a farre off, that it was not conuenient to sound such a castle there; from whence their ordinance could neither auaile them to whom the defence thereof should be committed, neither indamage those that should come to offend it. And therefore the Generall commaunded, that euery man with all his endeauours should lay to his hand for the cutting downe of that thicke wood, and making way through the thicke and thin, to lay it for an open champaigne, that was before the receptacle of a thousand dangerous treacheries. In very short space were the trees laid along on the ground, the place made light some and open, and a very commodious situation prepared for the foundation of a castle.

B The plot of the old ruined castle was compassed about with a wall of a thousand & seuen hundred yards, and in the midst thereof was erected a strong Keepe, sundrie lodgings and chambers builded, and 200 pieces of ordnance distributed vpon the new walls. After that, the Generall sent Resuan Bassa and the Bassa of Caraemit, with 20000 of his most choice souldiers, to conuey succors to Teflis: who marching closely together in the direct way, in foure dayes arriued at the sayd fort; wherein they bestowed their supplies, and changing the Gouernour there of, substituted in his roome one Bagli, being then vpon this occasion only called a Bassa. Whilest Resuan yet lay thus incamped vnder Teflis, Dauit Chan the brother of Simon, who in the beginning of these wars, at the comming of Mustapha the Turks General into Georgia, had fled out of Teflis, came now with all his familie, and offered himselfe as a subiect and deuoted vassal to the Turkish Emperor: whom Resuan entertained with great promises and large

The compasse of the castle built at Tomanis by Ferat.

C assurances of all good successe, according to his desire.

In the meane while newes were brought to Simon, That General Ferat staying at the straits of Tomanis with his armie, had sent Resuan Bassa with a far lesser number than indeed he had, to succor Teflis: Vpon which report he tooke courage to encounter Resuan, and to giue him battell. Vpon which resolution without further delay, being accompanied but with 4000 Georgians, partly subiects of his owne, and partly of Manucchiars, he with all speed possible went against Resuan. But whilest Simon was going thitherwards, General Ferat fearing the worst, had alreadie by chance dispatched away the two Bassa's of Caramania and Maras, with 10000 souldiers, to the end that joining themselues with the souldiers of Resuan, they should at all aduentures be so much the stronger. Now Simon going resolutely on, found Resuan incamped

D with 6000 souldiers only, at the foot of an hill, on the backe side whereof lay all the rest of the armie; and presently gaue a charge vpon him: when the souldiers behind the hil being aware of his comming, were readie all at once with their weapons to receiue him. Who now perceiuing his error, repented himselfe to haue so rashly assaulted his enemies, seeing now no other remedie but to be vtterly vndone. But seeing that he had now so far ingaged himselfe, as that he could not by flight but increase his griefe, and make the issue more lamentable; with these few souldiers which he had, he endured the furie of the great armie of Resuan, so that on both sides there was joined a most cruell battell: wherein the strange and vnusuall valour of those few Christians was much to be wondred at. Yet in the end the huge number of the Turkish swords

E and speares so preuailed vpon that small number of the Georgians, as that they were brought to great extremitie: yea Simon himselfe hauing his horse slaine vnder him, fell down headlong to the ground, and in his fall was very neere to haue bin taken prisoner, as was his lieutenant and many other his followers, had he not bin relieued by an vnexpected and maruellous chance: for whiles the battell was euen at the greatest heat betweene them, Resuan discouered the two Bassa's of Caramania and Maras, who (as is before said) were newly sent by General Ferat to succour him; but both by the said Resuan, and also by the rest of his Armie, were indeed thought to be Persians: whereupon they were incontinently surprised with a sudden feare, insomuch that they now became very doubtful of the victory, wherof they thought themselues before assured. In this suspence and doubtfulnesse of minde the battell was also intermitted, Simon in danger to haue bin taken, escapeth by a strange chance.

F and the victorie by the sight of those their friends disturbed: whereby the Georgians, and especially Simon, whose estate was almost desperat, tooke the opportunitie to escape and saue themselues; leauing behinde them most sure signes of their valour among the Turkes, of whom many remained there slaine, many wounded, and many filled with great merualle and vnexpected feare. Thus escaped poore Simon with the remainder of his followers into his knowne places of refuge, there to bewaile the death and captiuitie of his subiects. But Resuan after he had discouered the Bassa approching towards him, to be his knowne friends and Welwillers, fretted in himselfe exceedingly, that Simon had so escaped his hands: yet holding on his way to Tomanis, he arriued there in great triumph, drawing the standards of Simon all along the ground, and causing many of the heads of the Georgians to be carried vpon his souldiers speares, to the great joy of Generall Ferat, to whom he deliuered all the prisoners taken in the battell: and wicked Dato Chan, who hauing in times past renounced his first faith, was become a Christian, and now againe despising the vaine superstition of the Persians, had yeelded himselfe to the vanitie of the Turks, and made himselfe a voluntarie subiect to Amurath.

Now was the yeare so far spent, that euery man began to feare the Winters approch; and therefore the Generall determined to remoue thence, and to withdraw himselfe into places of more safetie. And so hauing set all things in order in the new fort, he appointed Hasan to be the Bassa of Tomanis, and left with him eight thousand select souldiers chosen out of all the armie, for the defence of that fort and the country thereabout. Deepely had Ferat laied vp the outrage committed by Mustaffa the Georgian (being now returned to his old name of Manuchian) in taking away the kings treasure, and killing the two Capigi and the Chiaus: and therefore he resolued with himselfe, not to returne to Chars or Erzirum, vnlesse he had first passed into the country of the said Georgian, and in most cruell manner reuenged those notable iniuries before receiued. In three dayes he arriued at Triala, and there incamped. But hauing there such an vnwonted dearth and scarcitie of all things rise in the armie; but especially of victuals, that euery fiue bushels and a halfe of wheat was sould for fiue hundred duckets, to the vniuersall calamitie of the whole armie.

From this place, the Generall was minded to go on forwards towards the country of Manuchiar; but whiles he was vpon the raising of his tents, one Veis Bassa of Aleppo came vnto him and told him, That it was not good now to spend the time in wandering about those countries, for that there were three very great enemies confederate together, to make this enterprise very difficult, and almost impossible and desperate: one was the season of the yeare, being now full of snowes, frost, and tempest; another was, the want and scarcitie of all things necessarie, especially of victuals; the third was, the people of Georgia, who by a common vniting of themselues together, and peraduenture aided by the Persians, might worke some notable mischiefe against the armie. This speech of Veis so much offended the Generall, that he most sharpely rebuked him, and with bitter termes reproued him, telling him flatly, That hee well perceiued that he was brought vp among mountaines and villages, and of a villaine (as he was) vpon some superfluitie of grace, or foolish importunitie, aduanced to the honour of a Bassa, and that therefore he should not haue presumed so much as to thinke it lawfull for him, so impudently and malapertly to come and giue him such aduertisements; whereas it had beene his dutie rather to haue held his peace, and to haue hearkened to the commandments of his betters and superiors, yeelding himselfe obedient and deuoted with all his power to performe the same. With this rebuke the Generall passed on to Archelech, burning and in a manner destroying the countrey before him, though indeed it was in amitie and confederacie with the Turks. But the inhabitants of Archelech vpon the comming of the Turkes had abandoned the Citie, and for feare withdrawne themselues into the mountaines. In Archelech Ferat incamped, and stayed the space of 4 daies among the rocky crags, and in a barren soile yeelding necessarie sustenance neither for man nor beast; so that euery man there endured vnspeakable miseries: yet for the space of foure dayes the souldiers with patience endured this so great a calamitie. But in the end, the fall of an huge snow being added to these extremities, did so greatly increase their griefes, that all the Ianizaries and Spaoglans of Constantinople arose in a tumult, and comming before Ferat, in despightfull and contemptuous manner with very haughty and resolute termes said vnto him:

The insolent speech of the mutinous souldiers against Ferat their Generall.

And how long shall we endure this thy tedious and insolent gouernment? Where is the due commiseration that thou oughtest to beare toward the Vassales of thy Soueraigne, thou rusticall and vnreasonable Captaine? Doest thou thinke happely, that wee keepe our Harlots as thou doest vnder thy sumptuous pauilions, all fat and in good plight, with delicate viands, whilest others liue in miserie? Doest thou beleeue that we haue as thou hast, our daintie sugars, [illegible], and conserues, whereby to restore vs, in the common calamitie of others? And that wee haue at command meat and pretious wines, which thou mingleste with thy cleere and pleasant water, partly prouided for thee by the art of the canning Doctors, Doctors, and partly brought to thee from far places? From this day forward it will be no longer endured, that so much people should continue in this famine, afflicted with nakednesse and many other inconueniences: and therefore get thy selfe vp and returne toward Erzirum; otherwise we shall be enforced to do that which will breed more displeasure vnto thee, than to any man liuing.

The Generall in a great agonie presently called a Councel, wherein it was concluded, That they should all send their strong lumpter horses to Ardachan, and the rest to follow him into Manucchiars countrey, whither he had appointed to go onely to make an inrode, and with the spoile and bootie of that countrey to refresh the minds of his soldiers, afflicted with the miseries both past and present. This commandement of the Generals they all readily obeyed, as well because he promised them a speedie voyage, as also for that euery man desired the sacke of Altunchala and other the territories of Manucchiar. So Ferat holding on his journey thorow certaine low vallies betweene the high and craggie mountaines, continually accompanied with great famine and scarcitie, at length brought his armie to Clisca, a place belonging to Manucchiar, but as then for feare of the Turkes quite abandoned and forsaken by the inhabitants; who with their wiues and children, and all the best stuffe they had, were fled into remote and safe places vntill the furie of the enemie was ouerpassed. In the fields neere vnto this place (bounding with corne and cattel, and plentie of fruit) the General refreshed his whole armie; and hoping that all the soldiers would like it well to stay a while in that such ease, determined with himselfe to erect a fort in that place. And with this resolution gaue commandement to Resuan Bassa to go vp to the tower, and in the top thereof to set vp an ensigne, with a proclamation and publique report, That he would in the name of Amurath there erect a fort, and fortifie it as he had done the other forts before. Resuan accompanied with Amurath the Bassa of Caramania, according to the commandement of the General, in the top of the tower set vp an ensigne or two: which as soone as the souldiers had espied, the forenamed Ianizaries and Spaoglans, thinking themselues too much abused by the General, arising againe all in an vprore, replenished with furie and indignation, ran vp in a rage to take downe the Ensignes that were set vp vpon the tower, and taking them in their hands, rapt the said Resuan once or twice about the pate, discharging withall a thousand iniurious and despightfull words vpon him, and sharply rebuked him. And then returning to the General (who was now come thither himselfe to countenance the action of Resuan) with gestures ful of despight, contempt, and disdaine, reuiling him with many shamefull and scornefull termes, they protested vnto him;

The mutinous soldiers against Ferat threaten their Generall.

That they were not come to the wars, to exercise the occupation of masons and dawbers, and to be employed in such vile and dishonourable offices; but only to manage their weapons, and thereby to demerit their ordinarie wages, and to purchase to themselues glorie and renowne at the Kings hand. And therefore if he loued his head, and would not see those armes turned against himselfe, which hitherto had been the reuengers of the enemies iniuries, he should resolue with himselfe, to leaue these new buildings and these vnseasonable designements, and giuing place [illegible] the contrarie season of the yeare, to haue due care of their common desires and necessitie.

Whiles they were yet thus expostulating the matter with him, one more bold than the rest, and more forgetfull of his dutie, did not sticke to assault the General, and to threaten him to wreake his fury vpon him: which in that tumult had haply beene done, had not the Bassa of Caramania lent the General his owne horse, and so conducted him to his pauilion. Yet was he neuertheless still pursued by the tumultuous soldiers, and againe sharply accused for the stay that he made there, and for not resoluing presently to remoue thence: and at last after many reprochfull speeches, told expressly, That if he did not the next morning remoue out of those quarters, without all faile he should lose his life for it. For all that, Ferat disdaining to yeeld to them that should of dutie haue been readie and obedient at euery becke of his, and seeking by all meanes (notwithstanding all this stirre) to stay there so long time as should be sufficient to build a fort, that would so much offend Manucchiar; answered them againe:

The stout answer of Ferat.

That he made no account of their threatening him with his life, which hee had alwaies offered to lay downe for any seruice of his King. But if they had no care to serue their Soueraigne in this new building, dieg, they might go their wayes: as for himselfe hee was resolutely minded to obey his Lord in whatsoeuer he had commanded him; for the honour of whom euery one of them ought to thinke their liues very well imployed.

The soldiours mutine against the Generall vpon displeasure taken.

Vpon this answer there followed diuers raisings and cursings against the King, against the Ge[illegible] against them all; and in this confused tumult euery man betooke himselfe to his weapons .. euery corner was heard grumlings and whisperings full of wrath and indignation; so that there was a great feare of some dangerous euent, but greater was the suspition of the Generals life. And now euery man had withdrawne himselfe to the guarding of such things as he esteemed most; when suddenly and in a trice you might haue seene the pauilions of all the Bassa's and Captaines fall downe flat to the ground, all the cords thereof being cut in sunder by the wrathfull soldiers; and as it were in a moment, all the muttons and other cattel the Generall and Bassa's led with them for their ordinarie vse, were seised vpon by the same souldiers, and guarded with all diligence possible. And so far was it off that any t.. durst challenge or reuenge this their insolencie, that they themselues turning afresh vpon their General, being now in a maze and deadly feare, began now the third time to threaten him, That if he did not forthwith remoue from those Countries, and turne his journy towards Erzirum, those vallies and fields should without all faile become the sepulchres of the Bassa's, and those hills retaine the eternall memorie of so bloudie a day.

With a little liberalitie might the General haue done with this people what soeuer he had listed, but being loth to gratifie them in any thing, he was inforced to perform their proud and arrogant demands, and to his great shame, to obey them, whom with right visage he might haue made obedient to himselfe: and therefore to auoid their despightfull threats, to his exceeding great reproch, he was glad euen as they had commanded, to remoue out of those quarters. The first day he arriued at Ardachan, v.. th the great trouble of all his souldiers: for whereas the journey was wont to be two dayes .. ke ordinarily, as well in respect of the length of the way, as the difficultie of the passage; the General would now needs haue it done in one, the rather thereby to grieue his souldiers. But of this his wilfulnesse he receiued euen the same day the iust reward; for that the Chariots wherein his women rid were conueyed away, together with the Eunuchs that were their keepers: some say by the Georgians that lay in wait for such a prey; others say by the Ianizaries, who the more to dishonor their General, wrought him this iniurie.

Great was the reproch that Ferat receiued in the armie, but far greater at Constantinople, when these newes were there knowne; but there was no remedie, he must now perforce endure it, and discontented as he was, keepe on his way towards Erzirum. In Ardachan he tooke a suruey of his army, and there gaue his soldiers leaue to depart: himselfe afterwards ariuing at Erzirum, hated of all his soldiers, enuied by his captaines, derided for the losse of his women, and fallen into the disgrace of euery man. No lesse than the rest was the Turkish Emperor discontented with him also: first for that he had don nothing worth speaking of, in reuenge of the shamefull iniurie done by Manucchiar the Georgian, and yet so mightily discontented his soldiers: and secondly, for that without any care he had suffered Aliculi Chan the Persian prisoner to escape away, about whose flight it was thought he could not chuse but haue some intelligence. For Ferat, after he was by new order from the Court, to diuert his journey from Nassiuan, to the straits and narrow passages of Georgia, being desirous to be throughly informed of those dangerous ways; in this second yeare when he remoued from Erzirum, tooke Aliculi Chan out of prison, of purpose to vse him as his guid in those dangerous straits, and therefore caried him vnder a gard (whatsoeuer it was afterwards) of his most faithfull vassals; still entreating him well, and taking such order as that he wanted nothing: at last being come to the straits of Tomanis in Georgia, where the Castle (as it was before said) was erected, he from thence secretly escaped into Persia. The manner of his escape is diuersly reported: some say, That Ferat in discharge of his promise, for his good direction had gratified him with his libertie. Others say, That Ferat corrupted with money, gaue him opportunitie to escape: some others (with more probabilitie) That his escape was made neither .. money, nor discharge of promise but by the onely vigilancie of Aliculi himselfe, and the neepinesse of his keepers; and tha watching the opportunitie of the night (a friend to all escapes) he started away. Howsoeuer euer it was, in fine he was deliuered from his long captiuitie, to the discredit of Ferat, and returned into Persia, to performe such enterprises against the Turkes, as shall be hereafter declared.

The dangerous passage from Reiuan to Teflis secured vnto the Turkes.

General Ferat (before his departure out of Georgia) had commanded Aly the Bassa of Græcia (whom he left, as is before declared, in the new castle of Lori) to fortifie a certaine castle called Saitan Chas (in our language, The castle of the Deuill) which he with great diligence performed, and left therein fiftie pieces of artillerie, and a thousand souldiers vnder the charge of a Sanzacke: and so quieted the passages from fort to fort, as that all the waies from Reiuan to Chars, and from Chars to Teflis, were made easie and safe; and all the meanes taken away whereby the enemy might be able to plot any new treacherie vpon those passages: which was no small piece of good seruice.

The Persian king in the meane time lying at Tauris with his armie, vnderstanding that the Turks had changed their purpose from Nassiuan to Georgia, so that there was no further need to imploy his armie against them for the defence of Tauris or Nassiuan; at last resolued with himselfe to licence his souldiers to depart, and to apply himselfe to more priuat reuenges. For calling Emir Ghan vnto him, whom hee had left Gouernour of Tauris, and Generall for that part of his kingdome; he required of him the occasion, why he had not performed the great promises which he had made to him before his departure to Heri, nor done his indeuor to hinder the Turks Fabrick at Reiuan: and why he went not out with other souldiers appointed for that purpose, and namely with the Turcomans (as he had promised) to reuenge so great an iniurie, and in best manner he could, to haue indamaged the Turkish forces? Sundrie excuses did Emir Chan alledge for the colouring of his manifest default, but none sufficient to cleare him of the crimes obiected against him by the king and the Sultans: wherefore he was by the king adiudged to haue his eies burnt out with an hot yron, & so depriued of his sight, to be despoiled of all his goods and shut vp in close prison. Which heauie doome was without further delay accordingly put in execution: whereof within the space of a few moneths, the wicked Chan (but yet a famous soldier) miserably died in prison. Whose death so highly offended the Turcoman nation (who had him alwaies in great estimation) that they absolutely denied their defences for the crowne of Persia: and the more, when they heard that the king had bestowed the roome of Emir Chan vpon Aliculi; who although he had in many respects deserued all preferment, yet for that he was an antient enemie to certaine Turcoman captaines, they would not in any wise indure that he should be exalted to so great an honour. And therefore they waxed more disdainfull and ill affected towards the king, wherby the Persian forces became the more weakened and diuided.

Emir Chan beuing his eies put out, dieth miserably in prison.

The Turks notwithstanding the league yet in force betwixt Amurath and Rodolph the Christian Emperor that now is, did many times make incursions into the vpper part of Hungarie, burning the country villages, and carrying away the people into captiuitie: but in their returne, they were oftentimes cut off by the Emperors souldiers and slaine. Which being reported at Constantinople, much moued the Turkish tyrant: but when he vnderstood that his men had without any cause made those inrodes into the territorie of the Christians, and so receiued the foresaid losses, he was againe appeased, and in the beginning of this yeare 1584, renewed the league betwixt him and the Emperor for eight yeares more.

Ferat from Erzirum aduertised Amurath of all that had hapned in his late expedition; desiring him to command what he would haue taken in hand the next Spring. But besides this information from him, there wanted not many others which did the like also, although in another manner: declaring vnto the king (and that in an odious sort) the whole proceedings of Ferat, the escape of Aliculi Chan, the shameful losse of his women, his quarrels with the Ianizaries, his falling out with Veis Bassa, a man well regarded of Amurath himselfe, the disorders of his whole camp for his want of discretion; and to be short, the particularities of all such actions as had not altogether so honorably bin by him performed that yeare: causes of themselues sufficient to induce the king to remoue the said Ferat from his Generalship. To which occasions, were also added sundrie other secret respects: for euer since the last departure of Ferat from Erzirum, Amurath had still in his head, the next yeare following to attempt the enterprise of Tauris, and thereby to stirre vp through the World a famous report of his conquest correspondent to his greatnesse. Now among the captaines whom he esteemed to be worthy men, to

to whom he might with truſt commit this ſo great an enterpriſe, hee bethought himſelfe of Iſman Baſſa, left at Sumachia in Siruan by Generall Muſtapha in the first yere of this war: who hauing in that prouince remained euer ſince, had without any helpe of the Tartarians, by his owne induſtrie and valor, to the great contentment of Amurath, brought that large country into a reaſonable obedience to the Turkiſh Empire: and that which moſt of all pleaſed the Turkiſh [illegible], had in a countrie ſo far diſtant, maintained his armie, wherewith he had done all this without any expences at all to his king; hauing now a good while leuied his ſouldiers ſtipends vpon the lands and territories of that region; and ſtill exerciſed a kind of gouernment and ſoueraignetie ouer thoſe places. Of all which his good proceedings, he had cauſed intelligence from time to time to be ſent vnto the court: by which means, and other fauorers which hee had about the king, there was foſtred in the minde of Amurath a wonderfull good opinion of him, ſo that now without delay he reſolued to ſend for him to Conſtantinople: & for that purpoſe, before Ferat was arriued at Erzirum, he had diſpatched certain Capigi & Chiaus to call this famous warriour vnto him: yet wanted there not ſome (and thoſe not of the meaneſt ſort) that went about to hinder both his comming to the court, & alſo theſe deſignements of ſo great importance. For Sciaus the chiefe Viſier (who rather for the comelineſſe of his perſon and alliance with the king, than for any other his vertues, was mounted to that high room) did greatly feare, leſt Oſman, whoſe courſe it was to ſit next vnto him in the order of the greateſt Baſſaes, partly for his experience in matters of war, and partly for the good affection the king did beare vnto him, ſhould at his comming to Conſtantinople perſuade the king to what he liſted, and ſo peraduenture take from him the chiefeſt office, & get into his hands the whole gouernment of the empire, whereby ſo great wealth was to be gained. Wherefore to rid himſelfe of theſe feares, he caſt about by all meanes to keepe him from comming to the court: but becauſe that to attempt the ſame openly, might proue a matter both difficult and dangerous, he thought it better to make triall of a more commodious and ſecret meanes. This Sciaus in conſideration of many gifts beſtowed vpon him by Mahamet the Cuman-Tartar king, had many times excuſed him to Amurath of diuers accuſations which Oſman by his letters had laid to his charge; For not aiding him in the ſubduing of Siruan, as he was both by promiſe and dutie bound: and for all his ouerſights alleadged ſuch reaſons in his behalfe, as if they did not altogether perſuade Amurath to be kind vnto him, yet at the leaſt not to carrie a mind of reuenge againſt him: and had ſo far proceeded in countenancing this Tartarian king, that there was betwixt them confirmed an interchangeable amitie and mutuall confederacie. Him Sciaus imagined to find willing and ready by al means poſſible, to hinder the comming of Oſman his enemy to the Court, if he were but made acquainted with the matter. And therefore Sciaus, as ſoone as he vnderſtood the certain reſolution of Amurath, to call Oſman to the court, ſecretly wrote to the Tartar king, who lay incamped neere to the hauen of Caffa vpon the Fens of Meotis; certifying him, That Oſman was to come to the court; and that therefore it were good for him to call to mind, how great an enemie he had been to him, and how much he had endeuoured by letters to Amurath, to turne all his hatred and diſpleaſure againſt him: and withall, That if he was able to doe ſo much by letters, as if Sciaus had not defended him with verie reaſonable excuſes, the king had executed his wrathfull indignation vpon him to his great danger; hee ſhould then imagine with himſelfe, what Oſman ſhould be able to do, when he ſhould come in perſon to the preſence of Amurath, and without any mediator, between themſelues determine of all matters what they ſhould thinke conuenient. Theſe, and peraduenture worſe Letters which Sciaus wrote to the Tartar, miniſtred matter enough vnto him to reſolue to do what he might, not to ſuffer ſo pernitious an enemie of his to arriue at Conſtantinople: and eſpecially perceiuing that Sciaus, in whoſe breaſt hee repoſed all his hope and all his protection, did ſo greatly feare his comming. Wherefore to rid himſelfe of that feare, he commanded twelue thouſand ſouldiers, that changing their weapons and apparell, they ſhould go and lie in wait for Oſman in the borders betweene Cholchis and Iberia, towards the Tartarian Nomades, by which way hee was to come; and ſo making an aſſault vpon him, to bereaue him of his life. Hoping that ſuch an outrage once done, could not, or would not, be imputed to his procurement, but rather to the Tartar Nomades, or to the Mengrellians, or to the Georgians, or to the Muſcouites, or to the robbers by the high way; and to bee ſhort, rather to any body elſe, than to him. This commandement of the Tartar King, was accordingly by the ſouldiers

A ers put in practiſe: who without further ſtay ioyned themſelues together, and ſo rode towards the place appointed.

And now were the meſſengers ſent from Amurath, come to Oſman, who preſently put himſelfe on his way towards Conſtantinople, hauing left behind him at Derbent and Sumachia, two Baſſaes, thought to be the moſt ſufficient men in Seruania: hauing alſo appointed very good orders in the ſame, and an aſſured eſtabliſhment of all thoſe countries and places which Muſtapha firſt had ſubdued, and he himſelfe had afterwards maintained vnder the obedience of Amurath. He had alſo prouided for the ſafetie of his own perſon, in paſſing thoſe troubleſome and dangerous paſſages through which he was to trauell, by chuſing out foure thouſand ſouldiers which he had tried in diuers battels, and brought vp vnder his owne diſcipline; through

B whoſe valor, he doubted not ſafely to paſſe through the treacheries of the Albanians, and the populous ſquadrons as well of the Tartarians as of the Mengrellians.

Thus departed he from Derbent, and coaſting along the rocks of Caucaſus (that at all times of the yeare are all white and hoarie with continuall ſnowes) leauing on his left hand Media, Iberia, and Cholchis; and on the right hand, the famous riuers of Tanais and Volga, euen at his first entrance vnto the ſhores of the Euxine ſea, hee was by the aboue named twelue thouſand Tartarians, being apparelled like theeues that lie vpon thoſe ways, ſuddenly aſſailed & fought withall. But like as an huge rocke lying open to tempeſt and waues, ſtanding faſt and vnmoueable in it ſelfe, reſiſteth the thunderings and ruſhings of the great and fearefull billowes: ſo ſtood Oſman faſt and firme, & couragiouſly ſuſtained this treacherous aſſault, turning the bold

C countenances of his reſolute ſoldiers, againſt the rebellious multitude of thoſe traiterous ſquadrons: who, as is their manner in the beginning, vſed great force, but finding ſo ſtout reſiſtance in thoſe few, whom they had thought with their only lookes and ſhoutings to haue put to flight, they began at length to quaile. Which Oſman quickly perceiuing, couragiouſly forced vpon them, and in a very ſhort ſpace, and with a very ſmall loſſe of his own, put thoſe Tartarians to flight, killing a number of them, and alſo taking many of them priſoners: by whom Oſman was afterwards informed (as the truth was) that their king for feare that he had conceiued, leſt when he came to Conſtantinople he would procure his deſtruction from Amurath, had ſent this armie to ſeeke his death. Of which treaſon Oſman cauſed a perfect proceſſe to be made, together with the diſpoſitions of the Tartarian priſoners, which he ſent the ſhorteſt way

D he could deuiſe to Amurath at Conſtantinople, with letters declaring all that had paſſed, inflaming him to reuenge ſo dangerous an iniurie & ſo wicked a practiſe. Amurath receiuing theſe aduertiſements from Oſman, according to the neceſſity of the matter, tooke order that Vluzales his Admirall with certaine gallies well appointed, ſhould paſſe ouer to Caffa to fetch Oſman; and withall to carrie with him Iſlan, a brother of the Tartar kings, commanding Oſman by letters, that he ſhould (to the terror of others) put to death the trecherous king, and place his brother in his roome.

This Tartar King was one of thoſe mightie Princes, who baſely yeelding to the Othoman power, led vnder them a moſt vile and troubleſome life, as their tributaries and vaſſals, alwaies

E at command: whoſe yonger brother Iſlan (preſuming of the ſufficiencie of himſelfe & the fauor of the people) going to Conſtantinople, became a ſuter vnto the Turkiſh Emperor, to haue his eldeſt brother thruſt out of his kingdome, as a man for his euill gouernment hated of his ſubiects, and to be placed himſelfe in his roome. Which his ſute was ſo croſſed by the Embaſſadors of the king his brother (who ſpared for no coſt in the behalfe of their maſter) that the ambitious youth was ſent from the Turks court to Iconium, and there clapt faſt vp in priſon: where apparelled like an Eremit, he led his life altogether conformable to his miſerie, with ſuch a kind of externall innocencie, as if he had been void of all hope or ambitious deſire of a kingdom, but rather like a forlorn and vnhappy wretch with vain affliction & impious deuotion to prepare himſelfe to a laudable and honorable death. But whileſt he thus liued, ſequeſtred from all worldly cogitations, vpon the diſcouerie of the king his brothers rebellion he was ſh

F more than poſt haſt ſent for to Conſtantinople, and put into the gallies bound for Caffa, with letters to Oſman of the tenour aforeſaid. Now in the meane time Oſman had by cunning meanes got into his hands this Tartar king, being as is reported betraied by his owne counſellours, corrupted by the Turkes gold: whome with his two ſonnes Oſman vpon the receit of the aforeſaid letters from Amurath, cauſed to be preſently ſtrangled with a bowſtring, and Iſlan his younger ger brother to be saluted king in his place, yet as vassall to Amurath. This shameful death, G e vsuall reward of the Turkish friendship, was thought iustly to haue hapned vnto his Tartar king, for that hee long before, supported by Amurath, had most vnnaturally deposed his aged f[illegible]her from that kingdome, iust reuenge now prosecuting his so great disloyaltie.

[illegible]mbarked himselfe at the forenamed gallies at the Port of Caffa, passing ouer the Euxine [illegible] entering into the Thracian Bosphorus, arriued at Constantinople; where hee was receiued with great pompe and singular significations of good ioue. But with most evident and expresse kinds of ioy was he saluted by Amurath himselfe, when by his owne speech H and presence he declared vnto him euery particularity of the matters that had hapned in his long and important voiage, and in liuely maner represented vnto him the perils & trauels that he had passed, & the conquests that he had made in Siruan. Afteral which discourses, Amurath who longed after nothing more, than to see the Persian king somwhat bridled, and the famous citie of Tauris brought vnder his owne subiection, began to enter into conference with [illegible] about that enterprise, and in the end would needs know throughly of him, what issue he co[illegible] promise him of this his desire, and in what sort by his aduice and counsel the forces should be imploied, and the armies disposed for the subduing of that city, which ouer all the nations of the world was so famous and so great an honour to the Persian kingdome. To all which demands his answer and resolution was, That forsomuch as the matters of Georgia were now well setled, the trecherous passages by the new built forts assured, and the prouince of Siruan vnder his obedience established, there was now no cause why hee should any longer foreslow so famous an enterprise, but by the conquest of Tauris, and erecting of a fort in that proud city, I to bring a terrour vpon all Persia, and to raise a glorious renowne of so mighty a conquest among the Nations of Europe: for the accomplishment whereof, he thought that either the same armie, or at the most a very little greater would suffice, so that it were raised of the best and choisest souldiers.

Amurath de-mandeth Os-mans opinon concerning the enterprise of Tauris.

Osmans reso-lution.

By reason of one of the letters which Sciaus Bass[illegible] written to the late Tartar king, and by the instigation of the yong Sultan Mahomets mother (zealous of the neere alliance of the great Bassa with her husband, as preiudiciall and dangerous to her sonne) Amurath had in the open Diuano depriued the said Sciaus from the office of the chiefe Visier, and hardly pardoning him his life, at the intercession of his wife, being his sister, had banished him the court, so that hee liued afterwards about Calcedon, vpon the borders of Asia, not far from Constantinople, K in a close pallace he had there built for his own pleasure: in whose room he appointed Osman to be chiefe Visier; & to honor him the more, nominated him the Generall of his army against the Persians. Such power hath Vertue, that euen from the very scum of the rascal sort, and out of the rusticall rout of mountaine peasants (which notwithstanding cannot be truly iustified of this Osman, his father being Beglerbeg of Damasco, and his mother, the daughter of the Beglerbeg of Babylon) it doth oftentimes in the course of this variable world draw diuers men into Princes courts, and aduance them to the highest dignities. Truth it is, that from a priuate souldier, though wel born, he by sundry degrees grew vp to the highest honor of that so great an Empire, and was at one instant created the chiefe Counsellor and Generall of the Othoman forces. Great was the ioy that Osman conceiued hereat; & great was the desire he had to make L himselfe worthy of so honorable fauors; & the greater confidence he perceiued that Amurath had reposed in him, the more eagerly was he spurred on to do any thing possible whereby he might shew himselfe to haue deserued the same. And therefore aduising with himselfe, that forasmuch as the greatnesse of the enterprise required a greater armie than was leuied in former yeares, so it was necessarie also for him the sooner to send out his aduertisements into all his subiect prouinces, and by his own example to stir vp the other captains and souldiers euen in the Winter (though it were as yet somewhat troublesome) to passe ouer to Scutari, and from thence to Angori, to Amasia, to Siuas; and there in those Territories to driue out the time, vntill his souldiers which were summoned, were all gathered together. And because vp-on this his great speed it might peraduenture fall out, that the enemie misdoubting his pur- M pose for Tauris, might prouide a greater armie than they would otherwise, he caused it to be giuen out, That he must goe for Nassiuan; to the end, [illegible] the Persians so beguiled, should n regard the gathering of so mightie an Armie as they would haue done if they should ha[illegible] heard of the Turks comming to Tauris: and so the generall couzening rumor flew, not onely throughe

Osman Bassa made chiefe Visier & Generall of the armie.

A through all the cities subiect to the Turkes, but into the countries of the Persians also: who notwithstanding being very iealous of the citie of Tauris, and fearing that the matter would fal out, as indeed afterward it did, ceased not to make most curious & diligent inquirie about it. And although the disgrace offred to his Embassador at Constantinople, dissuaded him from sending any other for treatie of peace; yet to spie out the secrets of the Turkes, and to vnderstand the certaintie of their purpose for Nassiuan or Tauris, hee sent diuers messengers to Osman, as if he had meant to feele his mind touching a peace, but in verie deed for nothing els but to sound his designements: which for all that, he could not with all the cunning he could vse possibly discouer, but still remained doubtfull as at the first, the Fame stil running for Nassiuan.

B In the beginning of this yeare, now growing towards an end, Amurath sent one Mustapha, one of the meanest of his Chiaus, vnto Stephen king of Polonia, to excuse the death of Podolouius [illegible] shamefully murthered as is before declared) as if the same had happened by the insolency of certain souldiers, and not by his commandement: who the better to color the matter, had brought with him two base fellowes, as authours of that outrage, for the king to take reuenge vpon; but were indeed no such men as they were pretended to be, but rather (as it was thought) men before condemned for some other fact worthie of death, and now sent thither to serue that purpose: for whom the Chiaus (in proud and threatning maner in the name of his Master) required to haue present restitution made of all such goods as the Polonian Cossackes had not long before taken from the Turks, and the captain of the said Cossacks to be deliuered C also vnto him, to be carried to Amurath: and so hardly vrged the matter, that (notwithstanding the vnworthie death of Podolouius and his followers, and the taking away of his horses) al the goods taken by the Cossackes, were forthwith restored: which the Chiaus almost in triumphant manner presented vnto Amurath at Constantinople.

This Summer also, Amurath disporting himselfe with his Mutes, was almost dead. These Mutes are lusty strong fellows, depriued of their speech; who neuertheless certaine by signes can both aptly expresse their own conceits, and vnderstand the meaning of others: these men for their secrecie are the cruel ministers of the Turkish tyrants most horrible commands; and therefore of them had in great regard. With these Mutes mounted vpon faire & fat, but heauy and vnready horses, was Amurath, vpon a light and ready horse, sporting himselfe (as the maner D of the Turkish Emperors is) riding sometime about one, sometime about another; & striking now the horse, now the man, at his pleasure, when suddenly he was taken with a fit of the falling sickenesse, his old disease; and so falling from his horse, was taken vp for dead: insomuch, that the Ianizaries supposing him to haue bin indeed dead, after their wonted maner fel to the spoiling of the Christians and Iews, & were proceeding to further outrages, had not their Aga or captain to restraine their insolency, to the terror of the rest, hanged vp one of them taken in the manner, and certain others in the habit of Ianizaries. Neuertheless, Amurath shortly after recouered againe, and to appease that rumor of his death (openly vpon their Sabboth, which is the Friday) rid from his pallace to the Temple of Sophia; where I with many others saw him E (saith Leunclauius) his countenance yet all pale and discoloured.

This yeare also happened such a chance as had like to haue raised new warres betwixt the Turks and the Venetians: which, forasmuch as it is worth the reporting, I thought it not good in silence to passe ouer. The widow of Ramadan Bassa, late Gouernor of Tripolis in Barbarie, with her sonne, her familie, and a great number of slaues of both sorts, being about to depart from Tripolis to Constantinople, had rigged vp a faire gallie for the transporting of her selfe and her substance, reported to be worth eight hundred thousand duckats: vpon which galley for her more safety, she had ioyned two others, as consorts. Thus embarked, she came to the mouth of the Adriaticke; where sailing by Corfu, she was by force of tempest driuen into the gulfe of the Adriaticke. At which time one Petrus Emus, one of the Venetian Senatours, with certaine gallies, had the charge for the keeping of that sea against pyrats, and all other ene-
F mies whatsoeuer. He hearing of the Turkes comming into the gulfe, without delay set vpon them; and being too strong for them, tooke them all: and hauing them now in his power, exercised most barbarous cruelty, as well vpon the women as the men: for hauing slain the men, in number two hundred and fiftie, and the son of Ramadan in his mothers lap, he caused the women, being before rauished, to haue their breasts cut off, and afterwards to be cast ouer-boord nto the sea, being in number about forty. The brother of Emus chancing vpon a beautiful vir- G gin, was by her most earnestly intreated to haue spared her honor; and the rather, for that (as she said) she was a Christian, taken prisoner about twelue yeares before in Cyprus; since which time she had liued in most miserable captiuitie among the Turks, & being now fallen by good hap into the hands of a noble Venetian, was in good hope to be set at liberty inuiolated: which she most humbly besought him for the loue of God to do, and not to imbrue his hands with her guiltlesse bloud, or to dishonor himselfe by forcing of her. But all she could say preuailed nothing with the cruel & vnbridled youth, who after he had at his pleasure abused her, cast her The villanie discouered. with the rest into the sea. It is thought that Emus suffered this so great an outrage (and so farre vnbeseeming the honor of the Venetians) to be don, to the intent that none should be left aliue to bewray the greatnesse of the bootie, or of the villany there committed: which was neuer- H theless (God so appointing it) reuealed by one of the Turks, who saued by a Surgion of Crete which knew him, & afterwards comming to Constantinople, openly declared the same. With the odious report whereof, the Turks were so enraged, that in euery corner of the citie a man might haue heard them threatning vnto the Venetians most cruel reuenge: yea they had much adoe to hold their hands from the Bilo or Gouernor of the Venetian Merchants in Constantinople, & to forbeare to spit in his face, as he went in the streets. At that time was one *Iohan.

Franciscus Maurocenus* (or as they commonly call him, Moresin) Bilo at Constantinople: who vnderstanding that Amurath in his rage was about to send one of the great Gentlemen of his Court, whom the Turks call Zausij (the great Turks vsuall Embassadors) to Venice about that matter, found meanes to haue him staied at Constantinople, and another of lesse authority sent Amurath sendeth a messenger to Venice, to expostulate the iniurie don vnto his subiects. to expostulate the matter with the Senat, and in the name of Amurath, to require to haue the I offendour punished, and the gallies with the slaues and goods restored: so should the league betwixt him and them continue firme, whereas otherwise he should be constrained by force of armes to reuenge the wrongs done to his subiects. This message being by the said messenger deliuered at Venice, the Senators after diligent examination of the matter, returned this answer: That the widdow of Ramadan with her familie comming to Zacynthus, an Island of theirs, was there honourably entertained, and presented with certaine courteous Presents; but departing thence, and comming to Cephalenia, another of their Islands, her people running on land, contrary to the conditions of the league, made spoile of whatsoeuer they could light vp-on, sparing neither man nor beast: of which their insolencie their Proueditor vnderstanding, K and making after them, found them in armes within the gulfe; and comming neere vnto them, was neither by them saluted, as the manner at sea is, neither was any top saile strucke, in token that the command of that sea belonged vnto the Venetians, al which they ought by the league to haue done: for which their outrages and proud contempt, their Proueditor had taken so sharpe a reuenge: neuertheless, they promised in that case to do what beseemed them in reason and Iustice to doe, for the satisfying of his desire. With which so reasonable an answer, Amurath seemed to be well contented; but being indeed loth to intangle himselfe with warres great woman had in those gallies foure hundred Christian slaues, all which vpon the taking of the gallies were (as the manner is) set at libertie, for whom the Venetians made restitution of as many others of the Turks.

Ramadan Bassa, the husband of the aforesaid great Ladie, was Gouernor of Tripolis in Barbarie, and of the countrie thereabouts: who hauing wars with one of the barbarous kings of the Moores, went out against him with all his forces, wherein were certaine companies of Ianizaries, sent by Amurath from Constantinople. Now in this countrey, as in many other places of Affricke, are great and desart sands, ouer which whosoeuer is to passe, must prouide himselfe both of victualls and skilfull guides; without which they are not without danger to bee passed. Ramadan with his armie vnprouided both of the one and the other, hauing entred these M desarts, was at length brought to that case, that he could neither go forward, neither [illegible] Ramadan Bassa slain by the insolent Ianizaries. losse of his men returne. Yet at length hee retired, [illegible] ot home, but not without the lo[illegible] some of his people, and the manifest danger of his whole armie: for which his improuide. the Ianizaries fell into such a rage, that not respecting the honour of the man, or regarding the displ[illegible]

A displeasure of their soueraigne, they fell vpon him and slew him. At which their insolencie if Amurath did winke, and passe it ouer vnpunished, let no man maruell: for why, the ancient obedience of those martial men is not now as it was in former times, when they were with a more seuere discipline gouerned; but now growne proud and insolent (as the manner of men is liuing in continual pay) with weapons in their hands doubt not to do whatsoeuer seemeth vnto themselues best, be it neuer so foule or vnreasonable. Which although it be in many places of this Historie to be seene; yet for the more manifestation thereof, I thought it not amisse here briefely to set downe an example or two of their notorious insolencie.

Not many yeares before, the Ianizaries in Cyprus with like insolencie slew Achmetes Bassa Achmetes Bassa Gouernour of Cyprus, slain by the Ianizaries.
B gouernor of that Island: pretending for the colour of so foule a fact, that he had defrauded them of their pay, and oppressed them of the country with intollerable exactions. Amurath highly offended with this their disloyalty in killing their General, whom they had neuer before complained of; thought it much to concerne the majestie of himself, and the repressing of the like insolency in others, not to suffer it to go vnpunished: and for that purpose sent another new gouernor into Cyprus, with ten gallies furnished as well with other necessarie prouision, as with such a conuenient number of soldiers as might suffice to chastise the insolencie of the chief offendors. This new gouernor arriued in Cyprus, dissembling the secret commandement he had for the executing of the transgressors; by certaine trustie men gaue it out among the Ianiza-ries, That Amurath was so far from being angry with the death of Achmetes, as that he thought him worthily slaine by the Ianizaries, for defrauding them of their wages, and oppressing of C his other subiects. Which report the new gouernour had of purpose giuen out, to put them in securitie, and without further trouble to bring them into his danger. Hereupon the Ianizaries cheerefully and with all due reuerence receiued their new gouernour: but shortly after to be sure, they by an vnexpected guile when as nothing was lesse feared, compassed in all the new come soldiers, and slew them euery mothers sonne; and not so contented, seised also vpon the Another insolencie of the Ianizaries. gallies that brought them. Which second outrage, though Amurath tooke in euill part, as seeing his majestie therein contemned, yet was he content to passe it ouer, being loth to add domestical troubles to the great wars he had in hand with the Persian.

But to end this matter with the opinion of one of their owne greatest Bassa's, concerning Busbeq Legationis Turcicæ, Epist. 3. these masterfull men. It fortuned that whilest Busbequius (Embassador for Ferdinand the Empe-D ror, vnto Solyman) lay in the Turks campe, at such time as Solyman in person himselfe was gon ouer the strait in Asia, to countenance his eldest son Selymus against his younger brother Baiazet, That vpon a light quarrel (though heauily taken) betweene the followers of the said Em-bassador, and certain Ianizaries washing themselues at the sea side, the Embassador for the quieting thereof was glad to vse the helpe of Rustan the great Bassa, Solyman his son in law: who vnderstanding of the matter by a messenger sent of purpose, aduiseth the Embassador to cut off all occasion of contention with those most naughtie fellowes: asking him further, if he knew not that it was now the time of war, in which time they so raigned, as that Solyman himself was not able to rule them, but stood in feare of them. Which speech fell not rashly from Rustan, a man right well acquainted with his Lord and masters griefe: for that most notable prince fea-E red nothing more, than lest some secret and dangerous treason should lie hidden among the Ianizaries, which breaking out vpon the sudden, might worke his final destruction: whereof hee needed not to seeke for any farther example, than to his grandfather Baiazet. For, as true it is, That great are the commodities of a perpetual armie of a Princes owne; so are the inconuno-dities also not small, if they be not carefully met withall: but especially for that the prince is euer in doubt of rebellion, and that it is still in the power of those armed souldiers, at their pleasure to translate the kingdome to whom they list. Whereof there haue bin many great examples, although there are many wayes for the remedying of the same.

But now that we haue by occasion of the occurrents of that time a little stept out of the way, 1585 let vs returne again vnto the wars of Persia, the chiefe obiect of Amuraths hautie designes. Now F according to the commandements gon out thorow all the cities of the Empire, the souldiers of all sorts began to flocke together: and all those that were either desirous to be established in their former charges and gouernments, or ambitiously sought to be now promoted, repaired to Osman, as vnto a king, and the soueraigne moderator of the Turkish empire, presenting him very large and liberal gifts, wherby he gathered together a huge heape of infinit treasure: and so

entertaining them with all affable curteſie, and promiſing both rewards and honours to ſuch would follow him in his purpoſed expedition, he leuied a wonderfull great number both of men and moneys. And now was the time come that called him away to go towards Erzirum, where he was greatly expected of his huge armie there aſſembled together. And notwithſtanding [illegible] dearth of victual that commonly raigneth in thoſe quarters, yet thither he muſt, [illegible] about the latter end of the moneth of Iuly, in the yeare 1585: and there taking a view [illegible] his whole armie, and of all the prouiſion neceſſary for ſo important and famous an enterpriſe, he dayly labored to haſten his departure. In this citie of Erzirum were met together all the ſoldiers of the prouinces that were wont to ſend helpe, but yet in greater number than euer was gathered by any General before: for that euery man forſooke his owne priuate buſineſſe, and vpon aſſured hopes of new rewards and vnwonted honours, were all induced to follow the fame of this their new Viſier and General: only the people of Ægypt & D[illegible]ſco were buſied with other more priuate quarrels at home, whereof becauſe they were [illegible] great importance, and alſo fell out at this very inſtant (leauing Oſman with his armie for a while at Erzirum) I will in as few words as I may make a briefe rehearſal.

Haſſan Baſſa the Queenes Eunuch ſent to Caire to gouerne there.

Amurath had heretofore taken Haſſan Baſſa the Eunuch out of the Seraglio, from the charge he had there to ſerue in the Queenes Court, and at her inſtance ſent him as Baſſa to Caire the great citie of Ægypt. Which great office, beſide the honour belonging vnto it, is alſo beneficial to them whoſe good hap it is to be aduanced thereunto: the riches, the multitude of people inhabiting therein being ſo great, that it ſeemeth not to be one citie, but rather to containe within the large circuit thereof many cities. This man being exceeding couetous, and therfore deſirous to handle the matter in ſuch ſort, as that he ſhould little need to ſeeke for any more ſuch grants at the Kings hands; ſought by all manner of meanes to oppreſſe the whole nation, and by all importunities to wring and extort from them rewards and bribes, without regard of honeſtie or reaſon. By which his ſiniſter and corrupt dealing he had now made himſelfe ſo odious and intollerable to the people in generall, t[illegible]ey in great number, and many times, began to go to Conſtantinople, and with humble [illegible]ctions to requeſt the King to take from them ſuch a cruel and vniuſt Gouernor: ſo that generally in the Court there was no talke but of the villanies and miſchiefes that were reported of the couetous Eunuch. At laſt Amurath ſeeing theſe publique exclamations went daily ſo far, as that he could not for ſhame let them go any farther without due puniſhment, he reſolued with himſelfe to call him to the Court: and hauing ſent vnto him certaine meſſengers, admoniſhed him ſundry times to returne home. But the Eunuch loth to leaue ſo fit an occaſion to enrich himſelfe, did ſtill delay his returne, alledging diuers feigned excuſes for his longer ſtay. Which thing when Amurath vnderſtood, thinking himſelfe thereby deluded, he determined to prouide for ſo great a diſorder, and by puniſhing of the miſchieuous Eunuch, to ſatisfie in ſome part the diſcontented mindes of his oppreſſed ſubiects in Caire.

Ebrain Baſſa in ſpeech to marrie Amurath his daughter.

There ſat at that time among the chiefe Baſſa's of the Court, one Ebrain (or as moſt cal him, Ibrahim) by nation a Sclauonian, a young man of the age of 32 yeares, or thereabouts, of verie faire conditions, and of a reaſonable iudgement; vpon whom Amurath himſelfe had determined to beſtow his owne daughter to wife, and ſo to make him his ſon in law. And therefore being now minded to remoue the Eunuch from his office, and to ſatisfie the citie; and being alſo willing withall to giue meanes to his ſaid ſonne in law to enrich himſelfe; he reſolued to ſend him as general Syndic & ſoueraigne Iudge into Ægypt; giuing him in particular charge, to remember how wickedly his predeceſſor had dealt before him. And ſo this new Baſſa took his iourny towards Ægypt, although there ran before him a great rumor of his comming, and of the great authoritie wherewith he was ſent. At which report, as the Ægyptians reſted content and ioyfull, ſo the Eunuch waxed very ſad and ſorrowfull: perſuading himſelfe, that this alteration could not but engender ſome ſtrange iſſue and effect againſt him. Whereupon adviſing himſelfe to prouide better for his owne affaires and the ſafetie of his life; he reſolued
L
not to ſtay the comming of the new Gouernour; but departing out of Ægypt, hee with great care and circumſpection for feare of meeting with Ebrain, trauelled towards Conſtantinople in hope to appeaſe the Kings wrath, or at leaſt by mediation of bribes, and by the interceſſion of the Queene, to finde him more fauourable than hee ſhould finde Ebrain; who without doubt would not haue ſpared any extremity or cruelty, to haue bereft him both of his goods

A goods and life together. Amurath aduertiſed from Ebrain, of the ſudden flight of the Eunuch Baſſa out of Ægypt, and hearing withall, that he kept not the highway from Caire to Conſtantinople, began to feare, leſt when he came into Soria, he ſhould flie into Perſia to the King, and ſo worke him double and treble damage; as one that had already gathered a huge treaſure, and hauing long liued in the Court, knew the moſt ſecret affaires thereof, and had learned all the priuie deuices and faſhions of the Seraglio. Whereupon he with all diligence diſpatched his Imbrahur Baſſi (whom we call Maſter of his horſe) with fortie of his Capigi (all gentlemen Vſhers, and officers of moſt ſecret and neereſt roomes about him) with charge and commandment, that if they met him they ſhould bring him to the Court; vſing all the aid and aſſiſtance of his people that might be requiſit: and for that purpoſe deliuered vnto him very effectuall B and large letters, after the beſt manner of the Court. This meſſenger with his appointed traine departed, and without any extraordinarie inquirie, found the Eunuch in Soria, incamped in the plaines neere vnto the citie now called Aman, but in times paſt Apamea, the principall city of that countrey. As ſoone as the Eunuch vnderſtood of the comming of the Imbrahur himſelfe, The warineſſe of the craftie Eunuch. he gaue order to his guard of ſlaues, which in great number with ſpeares and arcubuſes did ordinarily keepe his pauilion, that they ſhould not grant entrance into his tent to any, but onely vnto the Imbrahur himſelfe, and if need were, by force to keepe the reſt of the Capigi from comming in. Which order was in very good time giuen; for as ſoone as the kings officer had diſcouered the tents of the fugitiue Baſſa, in all haſt he ran towards the ſame, & ſeeking out the greateſt among them, went preſently thither, to haue entred with all his followers: but the C ſlaues being in armor, oppoſed themſelues againſt them, and permitting only the Imbrahur to enter in, entertained the reſt of his traine without. The Imbrahur being come in, read vnto him the commandement which he had from the King to bring him to the court; and moſt inſtantly mooued him, that without any further reſiſtance, he would quietly go with him. To whom the warie Eunuch anſwered, Behold, how without any calling of the King, or conducting by you, I come of my ſelfe, well aſſured to finde not onely pardon and pitie, but alſo fauour and grace in the ſight of my Lord, whoſe vpright and milde nature the wicked treacheries of my falſe accuſers cannot abuſe, to the preiudice of me an Innocent. And ſo without more ado they went all to Conſtantinople: the Eunuch ſtill ſtanding vpon his guard.

The politique and craftie Eunuch had in this meane time diſpatched diuers poſts with let-D ters to the Sultan ladies, certifying them of his comming, & principally beſeeching the queen to protect him, and to appeaſe the kings wrathfull indignation that haply he might haue conceiued againſt him: and ſo at length they arriued at Scutari. As ſoone as Amurath vnderſtood The Eunuch caſt in priſon at Conſtantinople, and his euill gotten goods confiſcated. of his comming thither, he cauſed all the treaſure which he had gathered, to be taken from him, with all the reſt of his priuat ſubſtance, and the wretch himſelfe to be clapt vp in priſon in the Iadicula or ſeuen towers. Where after he had languiſhed many dayes, ſtill fearing ſome
E deadly blow, he at length receiued from the Queene, an vnexpected, but moſt welcome aduertiſement, That he ſhould be of good cheere and quiet himſelfe, for that his wealth had alreadie ſaued his life, and that ſhe hoped in ſhort time to procure him alſo his libertie. Which indeed ſhe brought to paſſe; for ſhe her ſelfe made earneſt petition to Amurath her husband, that foraſmuch as he had bereft her Eunuch of all his goods, he would yet at leaſt deliuer him out of priſon, and reſtore him vnto her againe. Which requeſt of the Queenes was granted accordingly, and the Eunuch enlarged: but the treaſure that he had ſo vniuſtly ſcraped together in Ægypt, that remained ſtill among the gold and other Iewels of the Kings.

But Ebrain Baſſa with his new commiſſion now arriued in Ægypt, had in ſhort ſpace by far more ſiniſter means than had the Eunuch before him, ſcrapt together ſuch an infinit heap of riches, as was able only of it ſelfe to make him worthy of his promiſed wife, and therfore he was called home to the court, to accompliſh the intended mariage. With this commandment to returne to Conſtantinople, hee receiued alſo in charge, to make his journey through the people of Druſia; and ſuch as he ſhould find loyal, to confirme them in their due obedience, & to make F them pay their antient duties; but ſuch as he ſhould find ſtubborne and diſobedient, he ſhould quite root them out and deſtroy them. This commandement Ebrain preſently put in execution, and hauing packed vp together all the riches hee had gathered in the time of his gouernment, and raiſed good ſtore of ſouldiers in that prouince, he tooke with him thirteen Sanzackes, ther were ordinarily accuſtomed to ſit as aſſiſtants vnder the gouernment of the Baſſa:

in

in the ruling of the populous territories of Caire, and so set forwards towards Gaza, pas- G sing ouer those vast and huge wildernesses of sand that lie betweene Caire and Gaza. From Gaza, joyning the Sanzacke thereof with him, he went to Ierusalem; and from thence, caussing the Sanzacke there also to follow his traine, he turned by Saffetto, by Lezium, by Naplos (called [illegible] past Samaria) still taking with him the Sanzacks of all those places, and at last turned [illegible] towards Damasco: so that before he joyned with the band of Damasco, hee had gotten together eighteene Sanzackes, with all their squadrons of soldiers and slaues. Besides these, he had also his owne priuat Court, which was wonderfull populous, and two hun- H dred Ianizaries of Constantinople, whome Amurath would needs haue him to take with him at his departure from the Court, so that he had in his armie almost twelue thousand horsmen.
From Damasco, Feis the Bassa was come as far as Ierusalem to meet him, with all the soldiers vnder his gouernment, in number about two thousand persons. Besides that, there came vnto him by the way of Sidon, the Aga of the Ianizaries of Cyprus, with all the band of the [illegible]eso-late and destroyed Island: which captaine with his souldiers was transported ouer in[illegible] the maine, in those gallies that by the Kings appointment were sent to fetch Ebrain: who now strengthned with all these souldiers, had purposed the vtter ruine of the disobedient Drusians, and the raising of his owne glorie, by triumphing ouer them.

The Drusian people what they are.

These Drusians, against whom these great preparations were now made by this new Captaine, and of whom the Turkish Emperor is so suspicious and doubtfull, are supposed to be by discent Frenchmen, the reliques of those that with great deuotion did in times past fight those memerable and Christian battels in Iurie, and recouered the holy citie: but being afterwards I brought low, partly by the plague, and partly by the fury of the Barbarians, mingled their seed with the circumcised nation, and so together with their authoritie & command, lost also their first faith and religion: yet so, that they grew into an hatred of the Turkish superstition, & abhorring the circumcision of the Iewes, betooke themselues to a new Prophet of their own called Isman, whose doctrin they follow. The right Drusians liue vncircumcised, neither do they forbeare wine, as do the Turks: they make it lawfull among them (most vnlawfully) to marrie with their owne daughters: the Turkish gouernment they haue sought by all means to eschue, and notwithstanding all the endeuors and attempts of the Turkish tyrants, but especially of Se- lymus the second, yet haue they alwaies bin subiect to their owne naturall princes, and would neuer admit any captaine or gouernor of the Turks within the countries which they possessed. K They are a people very warlike, stout, resolute, and religious obseruers of their own superstitio-on: in battel they vse the arcubuse & scimitar, yet some of them at this day do serue with lances and darts: they are apparelled after the manner of the Easterne people, with a turbant on their heads, & breeches they neuer weare, but in stead therof they couer those parts with their coat, which reacheth down to their knees, buttoning it vp before: their feeding is grosse, & of aboue Cæsarea and Palestina, and within the riuers of Orantes & Iordan, stretching it self euen to the plaine of Damasco, neere to the hils that compasse it about vpon the coast of mount Li-banus. They were all in times past good friends & confederats, so that they were greatly esteemed: but now being at variance through greedinesse and couetousnesse, they were diuided a- L mong themselues, one seeking the destruction of another. At this time they were gouerned by fiue chiefe captains or gouernors: one of them was called Ebne-Man, & of the Turks Man-Ogli; another Serafadin; the third Mahamet Ebne-Mansur; the fourth Ebne-Frec; and the fift Ali-Eb- ne-Carfus, by the Turks called Ali-Carfus-Ogli. Vnder these (who indeed carry the title & au-thoritie of an Emir, that is to say, King or Chiefe) there are diuers their lieutenants or deputies whom they call their Macademi or agents. Ebne-Man or Man-Ogli inhabited the mountaines and fields that are contained vnder the iurisdictions of Cæsarea, of Ptolemaida, of Tyrus, and of Sidon, and had his residence for most part vpon the hil, in a towne called Andera; he was ve-rie mightie in men and armour, and since the time that by treacherie his father was murthered by Mustapha then Bassa of Damasco, alwayes a deadly enemie to the name of the Turkes. M Ebne-Frec, Ebne-Carfus, and Ebne-Mansur were alwayes great friends; but now especially at the comming of Ebrain Bassa they shewed themselues more straightly confederated together. Serafadin and Man-Ogli were euer opposite against them: so that the one side procu ring the ouerthrow of the other, they lost their strength, and left no meanes to defend themselue-

A selues against the Turks, who had long lien in wait for their libertie. Now as soone as the news came among them, That Ebrain being departed from Caire, was comming into Soria to subdue them; the three confederates aboue named resolued among themselues to go and meet this great Bassa, and to submit themselues vnto him, of purpose to turne all the intended mischiefe vpon Serafadin and Man-Ogli their enemies. And so hauing packed vp great store of money, cloath of silke, cloath of woollen, and cloath of gold, with many loads of silkes, and other things of exceeding value, euery of the three being accompanied, one with some two thousand, another with some three thousand men, they put themselues vpon their journey towards Ebrain, and met him at Ierusalem, where he was already arriued. This their comming Ebrain tooke in wonderfull good part, and courteously accepted those their rich and great presents B which they brought him; and by the offers of their fidelitie, and the grieuous accusations they made against the other two Drusian lords their enemies, began to conceiue great hope of his intended enterprise: for why, he saw that nothing could more easily compasse their ouerthrow, than this their discord. Being thus accompanied, he came by the way of Damasco, to the champaigne of Bocca, and there incamped. This was in the month of Iuly this yere 1585. The whole armie that was with Ebrain, reckoning also the soldiers of the three Drusian lords, was about the number of twentie thousand horsemen strong. In this place there came people out of all quarters thereabouts, with presents to honour the Bassa; to whom he likewise yeelded such small fauors as his couetous nature could afford them.

Three of the Drusian lords met Ebrain at Ierusalem with rich presents, & a great traine of men.

From this place also Ebrain presently sent letters to Serafadin and Ebneman, whereby hee in- C uited them to come vnto him, to acknowledge their obeisence vnto the Sultan: for that otherwise they might assure themselues to be in short time depriued both of their estates and liues. For all that, Man-Ogli would not by any meanes come in. But Serafadin being poore both in wealth and forces, resolued to come, in hope by rich presents to purchase his attonement with the great Bassa. And therefore hauing packed vp together diuers loads of silke, great store of money, and many cloathes of good value and beautie, and also attended vpon with diuers of his subiects, he arriued at last at the pauilion of Ebrain, with these his rich presents; which were there readily receiued, and he himselfe with great attention heard: whose speech in effect tended to no other thing, but only to perswade the Bassa, That he had alwaies beene a deuoted vassal vnto Amurath, and that he had carried a continuall desire to be imployed in any D his seruice; and that now being led by the same affection, and assured of his fauour, by the friendly and courteous offers made him in his letters, he was come to shew himselfe vnto him to be the same man, and so profered him whatsoeuer lay in his slender power to performe. Whereunto Ebrain made no answer at all; but onely asked him the cause why he liued continually in discord and brawles with the three Emirs (who also sat at that time in the same pauilion.) Whereunto Serafadin answered, That it was not long of him, who as one desirous of peace, had not at any time taken vp armes, but in the just defence of himselfe, against the iniuries of those his enemies, who because they were more mightie than he, sought continually to oppresse him. Hereat the three conspiratours arose, and with their grim lookes bewraying their inward hatred, falsely charged him to haue beene euer the authour of those brawles: ad-E ding moreouer, That his insolencie was at that time growne so great, as that no strange vessell durst for feare of him arriue at the ports of Sidon, Tyrus, or Berito; nor any merchant or merchandise passe ouer the plaines, but that those countries, as though they were a prey and spoile to the theeues of Arabia, were generally shunned of all trauellers both by sea and land, to the great hinderance of the Sultans customes. Serafadin would hereunto haue gladly replied, but preuented by Ebrain, and surcharged with many iniurious words, was commited to the custodie of the two hundred Ianizaries of Constantinople. And so being by them brought into a rotten tent that was appointed for him, was euery night from thence forward put in the stocks fast chained, and continually guarded with a trustie guard of the same Ianizaries. In the mean time came the answere of Man-Ogli, who wrote backe vnto the great Bassa Ebrain as fol-F loweth:

The poore and the leaſt among the ſlaues of the grand Lord,

The Sonne of Man.

Ebrain perceiuing by this letter the reſolution of Man-Ogli, reſolued alſo in himſelfe to go vpon him with all his army, and either by force or ſleight to get him into his hands; or at leaſt to draw from him ſo many arcubuſes, and as great gifts and tributes as poſſibly he might: and therefore riſing with his campe, and turning himſelfe toward the country of Man-Ogli, he burned and deſtroyed foure and twentie of his townes, and ſo mounting vp certaine rockes of Libanus, vpon the top of a large hill (that ſtandeth ouer Andara and other places belonging to Man-Ogli) he incamped himſelfe. But whiles the armie was thus marching forward, Veis Baſſa of Damaſco with a great part of his people, and his ſonne the Sanzacke of Ieruſalem, with his ſoldiers likewiſe, to the number of fifteen hundred perſons, hauing ſeperated themſelues from the reſt of the army in manner of a rereward; as they were buſie in raiſing their tents, vpon the ſudden were furiouſly aſſaulted by a great band of Druſians of the faction of Man-Ogli, and diſcomfited. Which victory the Druſians ſo proſecuted, that they became lords of the pauilions, the wealth and armour of the Turks: and leading away with them their horſes and their carriages, put to the ſword fiue hundred perſons, and ſcarce gaue any leiſure of eſcape either to the Baſſa the father, or the Sanzacke his ſonne, who fled ſtraight to Ieruſalem, and neuer returned again to Ebrain; but Veis his father ſtill followed the army with thoſe few which he had left, and was thought worthie of all men to be pitied. M

Vpon the hil aforeſaid, Ebrain continued twenty foure daies together, with aboundance of all things neceſſary for victual: during which time he attended nothing els, but to try all deuiſes how he might draw money and preſents from Man-Ogli, or how he might traine him into his

A his hands. For the compaſſing whereof, he diſpatched one Gomeda (Ebne-Manſurs Agerit) to Man-Ogli, being in Andrea; to tell him, That foraſmuch as he would not giue credit to the promiſe which was made him, nor to aduenture himſelf into the hand of his friend, he ſhould ſend vnto him all the arcubuſes he had: for that the Sultans pleaſure was, that his people that went not to the wars in his ſeruice, ſhould not be furniſhed with ſo great ſtore of weapons, to the danger of their neighbors, and of the ſubiects themſelues. With great griefe of mind Man-Ogli beheld the meſſenger, as the man whom he well knew to be the Agent of his deadly enemy; yet in regard of him that ſent him, he forbare to doe him iniurie, or to giue him any reproch; telling him, That all his people and weapons were diſperſed abroad ouer his territory, ſo that he could not tel what arcubuſes to ſend him: with which cold anſwer Gomeda returned. Which

B thing when Ali Baſſa of Aleppo vnderſtood, he offered himſelfe to the Generall, that he would goe vnto him, and that to ſome better purpoſe. Many reaſons did Aly Baſſa vſe to perſuade the warie Druſian to come and yeeld his obedience to Ebrain, ſwearing that no harme ſhould be done vnto him: and withall promiſing him great and honourable fauors. But neuer could hee remoue the reſolute and prouident mind of Man-Ogli, or win him to yeeld himſelfe into the hands of a man, whom he thought to be ſo murderous: yet at laſt with much adoe, he preuailed ſo much with the Druſian Lord, that in ſigne of the reuerence he did beare towards the Generall, and of his obedience towards Amurath, he was content to ſend a Preſent to Ebrain. And thereupon gaue him 320 arcubuſes, 20 packs of Andarine ſilkes, and fiftie thouſand ducats to carrie to the Baſſa for a gift, and to reconcile him vnto him. For the better effecting

C whereof, he ſent his owne mother to the great Baſſa, who in the behalfe of her ſon performed a very worthie meſſage, excuſing him as well in reſpect of his enemies that ſat there ſo neere vnto him, as alſo in regard of his oath which he had ſolemnly ſworne, That for the trecherie of Muſtapha hee would neuer commit himſelfe into the hands of a Turke: and therefore befought him to accept of the gifts that were ſent him; and withall a mind and heart moſt ready to ſerue and obey the king in all occaſions; and that hee would hold him excuſed, for that his excuſes were both iuſt and reaſonable. Whereunto the Turke replied, That although ſhe had found ſo foule a fault in Muſtapha, who vnder the aſſurance of his promiſe and fidelitie had betraied her husband: yet for all that ſhe ought not to feare any ſuch wicked or infamous act at

The notable diſſimulation of Ebrain Baſſa.

D his hands, who ſtood vpon his honor and the word of a ſouldier: and ſo by oath proteſting all faithfull and conſtant friendſhip towards him; in token of his ſincere meaning, he caſt a white vaile about her necke, and put another vpon himſelfe, and the third he gaue her in her hands; willing her to report to her ſon the oaths he had made, and to carrie him that vaile, and bring him with her, proteſting no otherwiſe to intreat him, but as a friend & a brother: the peaceable old woman went her way accordingly; but ſhee neither could nor would go about to alter the purpoſe of her ſon, but returned to Ebrain ſuch anſwer as did not greatly pleaſe him. After which time, he ſought more than euer he did before, to get the wary Druſian into his hands, or at leaſt, without regard of ſhame to draw from him mo Preſents and weapons. And therefore

E once againe he ſent the craftie Gomeda, to exhort him vpon faith and promiſe giuen, to come vnto him: but for all the craft & lying ſpeeches that the trecherous meſſenger could cunningly vſe, he could obtaine nothing of the Druſian Lord, but good words onely. Yet at laſt after much fineneſſe he preuailed ſo much, as that Man-Ogli was contented by him to ſend another Preſent to Ebrain, with an expreſſe condition notwithſtanding, that he ſhould cauſe Ebrain to depart out of thoſe quarters, & that hee ſhould not himſelfe returne any more to requeſt any thing farther of him. Which he very largely promiſed, only deſiring him to ſend a good number of arcubuſes, thereby to content the Baſſa fully: ſo he gaue him fifty thouſand ducats more, and foure hundred and foureſcore arcubuſes, with a thouſand Goats, an hundred and fiftie Camels, an hundred and fifty Buffes, a thouſand Oxen, & two hundred Weathers. With this rich

F preſent came Gomeda to Ebrain, declaring vnto him that this hee had got from him, vpon promiſe that hee ſhould not moleſt the Druſian any more. For which promiſe ſo made, Ebrain ſharpely reprooued Gomeda, and threatned to make him know what it was to take vpon him ſo dangerous a liberty: and for the greater deſpight both to the one & to the other, Ebrain would needes haue Gomeda himſelfe to returne again with like meſſage to trouble the Druſian. Whereunto although hee went in great feare of ſome miſchiefe by the hands of Man-Ogli, yet was there no remedy but needes hee muſt follow the commandement of him, in whoſe power it was to

ke from him both his honor and life, and therefore on he went. But as soone as Mau Ogli saw Ebrain thinking as truth was, that he came againe about his wonted requests, he was with the very sight of him so farre moued, as that he was euen at the point to haue throwne a dart at him, and so to haue dispatched him, had not the regard of more dangerous effects staid his fury: yet spared he not with ignominious words and deadly threats to disburden his choler. Notwithstanding he could do no lesse but accomplish the effect of his fraudulent requests; and so wrought with him, that he drew from him foure burdens more of arcubuses, ten swords and ten gilt daggers, certain siluer belts, ten packs of silke, and some few pence: causing him withall to protest vnto him, neuer to suffer himselfe to be persuaded to come againe vnto him, for if he did, he threatned to kill him, happen after what might of it. With exceeding ioy and triumph did Ebrain receiue this present, and thinking now with himselfe that he had gotten a sufficient booty from him, he determined to rise with his armie, and to sacke all the rest of Mau-Ogles countrie. Which he performed accordingly, and being conducted by Emir Ebne-frec, burnt Andrea the place of Mau-Ogli his residence, and in two daies burned and destroyed nineteen other of his townes, with vnspeakeable cruelties committing all things to fire and sword. After all this sacking and rasing, Ebrain sent diuers messengers to Mau-Ogli, to trie whether he would yet be persuaded to come vnto him; but nothing could moue the resolute Drusian to commit himselfe into his hands, but rather increased his constancie to auoid a most certain death. Now the great Bassa still thirsting after bloud and reuenge, vnderstanding by a spie, that the captain of Andrea (being one of the factors of Mau-Ogli) with three hundred and fifty souldiers was got vp to a certain hill, into a place of great security, he sent Emir Ebne-frec to intice him, and to tell him, That seeing his Lord Mau-Ogli would not come and yeeld himselfe, hee should come vnto him; which if he would do, he would assuredly in despight of Mau-Ogli, make him a Sanzack of some of those places which he most desired. The ambitious & vnhappie Macademo suffered himselfe to be easily perswaded, & being accompanied with his three hundred and fiftie followers, went with the said Ebne-frec, and came at last to the pauillion of Ebrain, hauing first caused his aforesaid men to stay behind in a valley two or three miles off. But Ebrain would not so much as see the Macademo, although both in respect of the nimblenes of his person, and also the fiercenesse of his lookes, he was worthie to be looked vpon: but commanded him to keep in a seuerall place from Serafadin, and in the mean time deuised how he might with least losse of his own men, put to death those three hundred and fiftie the Macademoes followers: which was by training them, by means of the said Ebne-frec, into a certain vineyard, and so hauing brought them into a strait, suddenly to set vpon them and kill them. Which was accordingly performed: for being by the trecherous Emir brought into the place appointed for their slaughter, fearing nothing lesse, they were suddenly inclosed by the Turks Sanzackes or Ianizaries, and slain euery mothers son. This massacre thus finished, Ebrain commanded the Macademo to be brought before him, and without delay to bee stripped and flaied quicke: who being come, stourly vpbraided Ebrain with his promise and his oath; and amongst other speeches which he vttered whiles they stripped him; said, Cut me off my members, and first putting them into the priuities of that infamous Ebrains wife, put them afterwards into the mouth of himselfe: for so (I trow) he will be contented and satisfied with my flesh. And to them that were the executioners of his painfull death, he said, It is your great good fortune indeed, that with such violence and needlesse deformitie, yee are now able to spill my bloud, and to take my life from me: whereas none of you all had bin able, or once durst, man to man, to haue drawne one drop of it from me, no nor to haue endured my countenance. But go too, proceed in your wicked and vnsatiable desire of my bloud, and fulfil the cruell command of your Visier: for in the end there will also light vpon you the iust reward of this so villanous a fact. With these and other such like speeches the miserable wretch was stripped, and three great slashes made on his backe, where they began to flea him; he in the mean time not ceasing to blaspheme their religion, and to curse their king, and their false Prophet also. But the barbarous souldiers proceeding in their cruell action, made other like gashes vpon his breast and stomacke; and so drawing the skin downward, could not bring it to his navell before he was with the extremity of the pain, dead. After this, Ebrain caused the followers of Serafadin in number about a hundred and fifty to be cruelly slaine, and all his countrie most miserably wasted: he himselfe still remaining in chaines.

Emir Ebne-frec inticeth Mau-Ogli into Macedemo to beetrayed to come to Ebrain.

The Macademo by the commandement of Ebrain slain quicke.

Whilest the fire and sword thus raged in the Drusian countrie, Ebrain by speedie posts sent to

A to Sidon, where his gallies lay at rode, commanded, That disbarking foure thousand souldiers, they should sacke all those countries alongst the sea coast euen as far as Cæsarea in Palestine, sparing neither age nor sex, nor any person of condition whatsoeuer. Which his cruell command was presently put in execution; and three thousand soules brought away captiues, great booties made of much rich merchandise, many townes burnt, sundrie castles rased and laid euen with the ground; and to be short, all the whole countrie of Serafadin and Mau Ogli laied vtterly waste and desolate.

Ebrain was now in readinesse to depart for Constantinople, where he was by Amurath expected; as wel for his gold, as the accomplishment of the mariage. But bethinking himselfe, that whatsoeuer hitherto he had don, would be accounted either little or nothing, vnlesse he prouided in some sort for the quieting of those people vnder the Turkish obedience, he determined to nominate one of the three Drusian Emirs that came to him to Ierusalem, to be Bassa of all those Regions. And because Emir Aly Ebne-Carfus was the richest and most obedient of them all, he thought good to commit that charge vnto him, and honored him with that dignitie, yet not without a bribe, but for the price of an hundred thousand duckats. Wherefore hee apparelled him in cloath of gold, gaue him a horsemans mase, and a sword all gilt, and deliuered vnto him the kings commission, causing him withall, to sweare faith and obedience to Amurath. And so hauing (at least to shew) set in order the affaires of those mountains, which an hundred of the Turks great captains had in former time vainly attempted, he returned to Damasco, where he staied twelue daies, by shamefull shifts extorting mony from diuers persons. C At last hauing no more to do in those parts, hee turned himselfe towards Gazir and Baruto, places vnder the gouernment of Ebne-Mansur, where he arriued with all his army, and found the gallies which he had left in the port of Sidon, now in the hauen of Baruto, as he had before commanded. Now vpon a certaine hill aboue Baruto neere vnto the Sea, Ebrain had pitched his owne tent only and none other; and hauing sent all the rest of his best and goodly things which he meant to carrie with him to Constantinople aboord the gallies, shrowded himselfe only vnder that narrow and base tent. Thither he called Ebne-Mansur, and in pleasant manner told him, That now it was time for him to make paiment of the debt of an hundred and three score thousand duckats, which hee ought the King his Lord for the custome of Tripoli and Baruto: for that he could not longer stay in those quarters, but was to returne to Constantinople, which he knew not how to do, vnlesse he carried with him the discharge of that D debt. Whereunto Ebne-Mansur made answer, That it would not be long before his Macademores would come with his monies, and that then he would without further delay make paiment. Which thing Ebrain well knew to be but an excuse, and therfore determined with himselfe to thrust him into the gallies, & because he could not carrie the mony vnto the king, yet as the least to bring him his debtor. But forasmuch as he doubted to put this his determination openly in execution, for feare of some insurrection amongst the people, as well for that he was within the territories of the said Ebne-Mansur, as for that he saw him greatly beloued and E fauoured of the other two Drusian Lords, Ebne-frec and Ebne-carfus, he therfore thought it better policie by concealing this his purpose, to shew him in his outward actions al good countenance, and by secret and subtile meanes to take him prisoner. Whereupon he deceitfully told him, That forasmuch as he was to stay there for his businesse that night, and was resolued the next day to make a road into the country of Mau-Ogli, he therefore praied him to do him the fauour to be his guide, and for that purpose, when he should send for him at midnight, that he would come vnto him very secretly, because he was minded to depart without any stir, onely with fiue hundred men in his company. The Drusian Lord verily beleeued the matter that so it was, & and withall was in good hope by that means to find some way to escape his hands. Whereupon being called vp at midnight, he readily went to the tent of Ebrain, who presently charging him (whom all men thought he had especially affected) with many abhominable and foule termes, caused a chain to be cast about his neck, & his arms, and so fast bound to be carF ried into the gallies. And yet not so contented, tooke the spoile of all his country, wherby there was leuied such a prey as was marruellous to behold: for besides mony (whereof there was a very huge sum) the store of cloths of silke & gold, was such, & so great, as might better beseem some great Prince, than such a mountain rusticall Lord as he was. When the Bassa had conueied all this into his gallies, hee sayled to Tripoli, where he found Serafadin in the custodie of Ebne-Mansur in chaines sent to the gallies.

...tie Bassa and Aly Bassa: and hauing staid there some few daies, wherein he committed sundry villanous & abhominable robberies, he caused the said Serasadin to be put into the gallies, with all his silkes, and other wealth, and so departed for Constantinople: where at such time as hee entered into the channell of the citie, accompanied with foure and twentie gallies, he was encountred and receiued by a wonderfull number of his friends and fauorits, and saluted with an honourable peale of artillerie out of the Seraglio. Iohn Thomas Minadoi the best reporter of this Historie, as also of the late wars betwixt the Turks and the Persians, being then at Constantinople, and hauing (as he reporteth of himselfe) good means to see the bountiful and beautifull Presents which the spoiling and rauenous Bassa gaue the Turkish king, reporteth the summ thereof to haue been a million of gold, besides the yearely reuenue of Caire, amounting to six hundred thousand duckats, with threescore horses most richly garnished, of singular beautie, but especially of the Arabian race, a liue Elephant, and a liue Giraffle (which is a beast like a Camell and a Panther) two great Crocodiles dead, a Chaire of massie gold richly wrought with precious stones; a Casket also beset with precious stones and gold; many packes of most fine clothes, woollen and silkes, certaine other clothes with fringe of gold and siluer and the Barbarian cutworke, most fine linnen of Alexandria, and al the arcubuses taken from the Drusians: besides sundrie rich Presents giuen by the proud Bassa to the great Ladies of the court, reported by Leunclauius to haue bin worth two hundred thousand Sultanines:

But now forasmuch as we haue before made mention of the Sanzacke of Ierusalem, and his flight, it shall not be altogether impertinent to our historie (though somewhat out of time) in few words to declare what passed betweene him and the Arabians of Palestine, a little before the comming of Ebrain the great Bassa into those quarters: by which little, the desirous reader may easily perceiue, the wofull and troublesome state of that sometime most blessed and fruitfull, but now most miserable and barren land of Iurie, and of those places in Holy-Writ so much renowned.

The land of Iurie much troubled with the Arabian theeues and robbers.

In the confines of Sodome, and in the places not only betweene the lake Asphaltites and Damasco, but also in the Plaines and in the vallies of Iericho, and of Samaria, and in other places about Bethlehem, Emaus, Bethanie, Bethfage, Capharnaum, Nazareth, Leuir, Bethsaida, Naplos, and other townes of name thereabouts, there doe haunt and liue certaine Arabian captaines, who spreading themselues euen as far as Rama and Ioppa, ouerrun at their pleasure all the countries there round about, and continually commit grieuous outrages as well against the said Cities, as also vpon the goods and wealth, not onely of the inhabitants there, but also of strangers: yea and their insolency oftentimes groweth so great, that they dare to assaile the fenced cities, besides the spoiling of trauellers, that by reason of their businesse haue occasion to passe from one city to another. They are good horsemen, but vse no armour: their horses are very swift to run, and spare of diet; and are themselues bold and aduenturous theeues. These Arabians hauing had intelligence, that the aforesaid ambitious youth, appointed Sanzacke of Ierusalem, was in mind to raise all the Sanzacks thereabout; and ioyning himselfe with them, and his father the Bassa of Damasco, to restraine their insolent libertie, and to worke their destruction; resolued with themselues not to stay, vntill he and his confederates were readie, but rather by sundrie inuasions vpon him, euen vnto the gates of Ierusalem, to prouoke him to come out into the field. And the rather to induce him so to do, they compassed with a certain Subbassi of Bethlehem, their friend, to encourage and animate the Sanzacke thereunto, by promising vnto him good successe and prosperous euents. The ambitious young man, seduced with the glorious persuasions of the false Subbassi, of whom he made good reckoning, and prouoked by their insolencies, resolued (as they had wished) to issue out of the citie into the open field; and thereupon hauing armed an hundred of his vassals, and raised all the horsemen that were vnder his gouernment, to the number of six hundred, he made accordingly, and with their arrowes and Indian Canes ouerwhelming his arcubuses, as if it had bin a raging floud, wrought him great woe: when in the very nicke, the battel yet being at the hottest, the traiterous Subbassi fled towards Bethlehem, and left the souldiers of Ierusalem in the hands of the Arabians, who put most part of them to the edge of the sword, and scarcely gaue liberty to the Sanzack to saue himselfe by flight. The Sanzack certainly informed of this fraud of the dissembling Subbassi, to be reuenged vpon him, began also in like manner to dissemble with with him, feigning that he would once more trie his forces against the same Arabians; and so vsed the matter, that the Subbassi arming himselfe, came vnto him, without any suspition of the mischiefe intended against him. But as soon as he was come, the Sanzacke tooke him aline, and presently caused him in most cruell manner to be slaine quicke.

The Subbassi of Bethlehem slaine quicke.

Thus hauing passed ouer the troubles that staied the people of Ægypt and Damasco, and the countries thereabouts, from reforting to Osman the Turks great Generall at Erzirum: let vs againe returne thither where we left him, taking a view of the preparations against the Persian; and prosecute those affaires, which of all others most exercised the forces of the two mightiest Mahometan Monarchs; and with the expectation thereof, filled the world, from the East to the West.

The straight commandement from Amurath, together with the fame and reputation of Osman the Generall, had drawne together such a world of people of all sorts to Erzirum, as that it seemed not the power of one king alone, but rather the vnited forces of many kings. Wherfore Osman perceiuing that hee had gathered together too great a number of people, and too huge an army, and that it might so fal out that he might want victuall for so great a multitude (neither so greatly fearing his enemies forces, as that he needed to lead so populous an armie against them) determined to discharge a great number of such as he thought most weake, and least able to endure trauell: so that out of this great multitude he drew out about fortie thousand persons, who liberally according to euery mans abilitie redeeming the ordinarie perils of the warres, returned home to their owne dwellings. And so in Osmans armie remained the number of an hundred and fourescore thousand persons or thereabouts. With this multitude the Generall departed from Erzirum (about the eleuenth of August this yeare 1585) towards Tauris, continuing for all that, the speech for Nassiuan. But he had scarce matched two daies, when diuers souldiers of Græcia and Constantinople presented themselues before him, vpbraiding him with great improuidencie, and telling him, that they began alreadie to feele the want of victuall, by wanting the same day their ordinarie allowance of corne for their horses: so that if in the beginning, and as it were in the entrance of so long a iourney they felt such want, they could not tell with what iudgement or discretion he meant to lead so great a companie so far as Nassiuan; nor by what cunning conceit he had presumed to sustaine so great an armie in the seruice of their Lord. Osman quietly heard their complaints, and presently prouided for them, by causing such store of barley to be distributed among them, as they desired; and seuerely punished the officers that had the charge for the allowance of corne, who most couetously began to make merchandise of the common prouision, by conuerting it to their own priuat vses. And hauing thus quieted their troubled mindes, he proceeded on his iourny, and by the way of Hassan Chalassi and of Chars, arriued vpon the Calderan plaines, famous for the memorable battels there fought betweene Selymus and Hysmael. In these Plaines hee tooke a generall reuiew of his army, wherein there wanted a number, that by reason of sicknesse being not able to continue the iourney, were inforced to stay behind, some in one place some in another. Remouing thence, he tooke the way not to Nassiuan, as he had still hitherto giuen it out he would, but now directly to Tauris. Which so sudden an alteration of the iourny as soone as the souldiers of Græce and Constantinople heard, they fel into a great rage, and comming againe before the Generall, reuelled with him in this sort to his face:

The number of Osmans armie.

And what are we, thou villaine, thou Turke, thou dolt, whom thou handlest in this sort? Wee are neither oxen nor sheepe of the mountaines, for the leading of whom thou thinkest thou art come out: neither can we brooke these thy lies and deceits. If thou hast publickly professed to lead vs to Nassiuan, and by that speech hast trained vs from the farthest bounds of Græcia, to what end now, after thou hast wearied vs so much, doest thou deceiue vs with such vanities, and prolong our iourney, and set before vs such strange and important dangers as our minds neuer once thought on? But if this was thy first purpose and intent, and that now, not foolishly or by chance, but vpon premeditation and good aduice thou changest thine opinion, why diddest thou dismisse so many souldiers, as might haue made the armie more terrible and stronger for the enterprise of Tauris? Doest thou thinke that by suffering others to redeeme their liberties, and so to increase thy riches, thou shalt set our liues to saile, and to make vs slaue to the Persians?

The most insolent speech of the souldiers of Constantinople and Græce vnto Osman their Generall.

At these arrogant speeches, the General was exceedingly troubled; seeing his good meaning, and the earnest desire he had to aduance the maiestie & glorie of his king, taken in so euil part,

Osman wisely appeaseth his mutinous souldiers.

The most insolent speech of the souldiers of Constantinople and Græce vnto Osman their Generall.

At these arrogant speeches, the General was exceedingly troubled; seeing his good meaning, and the earnest desire he had to aduance the maiestie & glorie of his king, taken in so euil part,

Osman wisely appeaseth his mutinous souldiers.

and those his best souldiers so highly offended. And although he could indeed haue readily G vsed the sharpest and hardest prouisions and remedies for it, that in such occasions are ordinarily applied: yet vpon good aduice he forbare so to do, and in stead of rigor and punishment, resolued to take by more easie meanes. Whereupon causing many of the Captaines and chiefe amongst those seditious souldiers to come before him, hee first perswaded them, That the former speech for Nassinan was not raised at all by him, nor that he was minded at that time to goe for Tauris: but all that was done, he had done to fulfill the commandement of the Sultan, who had charged him so to doe, to the end to lessen the Persian preparations; which they would vndoubtedly haue made farre greater, if the speech had beene giuen out at the first for Tauris. Which his princely care of their safetie they for their parts ought willingly to further, for that in so doing they H should still preserue that great opinion which both the king and the world had conceiued of their valour and fidelitie. Neither needed they to feare, that the souldiers which were dismissed might weaken the armie, for that they themselues were not onely sufficient to pierce into Tauris, and to open the way vp. on the enemies, but to daunt them euen with their lookes; and that those which were discharged, had but purged the hoast of all cowardise, and left nothing in it but vertue and courage. By this milde answere of the Generall, the tumultuous souldiers were sufficiently pacified, but much better apayed and contented they were, as soone as he put his hand to the common purse, and bestowed among them all a small quantitie of monies: for by this his kinde vsage, all their stomackes were ouercome, and they themselues became so willing and so couragious, that now they durst venture not to Tauris onely, but to Casbin, yea euen to the farthest parts of all the Persian kingdome. I

These important outrages thus appeased, the Generall turned himselfe with all his armie towards Coy, a citie scituate beyond Van, in the middest betweene Tauris and the Martian Mere, where he refreshed his armie with all things he could desire. From Coy he passed to Marant, a citie subiect to the Persians; plentifull also of all things needfull for man or beast. From thence he leaned downe towards Soffian; a fruitfull place, subiect also to the Persians; from whence he began to discouer Tauris. Great was the ioy of the whole campe, and now the mutinous souldiers of Græce and Constantinople could highly commend the aduice of the Generall, or rather of Amurath himselfe, in giuing out the rumor of Nassiuan for Tauris, as the only means whereby they were in quiet come so far, the Persians being wholly occupied (as they supposed) about Nassiuan: insomuch that euery man being waxen couragious, and replenished with ioy, without any feare at all began proudly to plot vnto themselues nothing but sackings, pillings, taking of prisoners, rauishments, robberies, and all those insolent & outragious actions that vse rashly to proceed from the greedie affections of those barbarous victors; especially they of the Vauward, who being desirous of boorie, and to discouer the enemies countrey, descended downe towards certaine pleasant gardens full of all sorts of trees, springs, & fruits: where hauing satisfied their appetites, they withdrew themselues to a certain little riuer neere to a bridge called The bridge of salt water, and there staid at pleasure attending the comming of the army. But euen whiles they were thus inioying the water, the fruits, the shade, the greene grasse, and other delights of the place, the Persian Prince Emir Hamze, king Mahomets eldest sonne, who with ten thousand good souldiers had closely couched himselfe, L watching stil when some of the enemies bands should come down to those resting places, suddenly set vpon them with such speed, courage, and fury, that as if it had bin a lightning and in a manner without any resistance he ouerran all those Turks, and dispersed them, putting to the sword about seuen-thousand of them. And so leading away with him many prisoners, horses, slaues, with sundrie ensignes and Turkish drums, he withdrew himselfe back towards his blind father, who lay then encamped about 12 miles from Tauris with fiftie thousand souldiers or thereabouts; Aliculi Chan Gouernour of Tauris beeing left in the citie with 4000 souldiers onely. A greater army than this, not exceeding the number of threescore and foure thousand men, was not the Persian king able to leuie, the principall occasion whereof was the death of Emir Chan, for which the Turcoman nation being waxen rebellious and disobedient, would not by any meanes be brought to defend that citie, whereof Aliculi Chan their capital enemie was now Gouernour: and from Gheilan and Heri there came not so much as one souldier to relieue the necessities of Persia. So that with these small forces in comparison of the enemies, the Persian King had no stomacke to meet the Turkish armie in plaine battell, but fought

The Turks reioice vpon the discouerie of Tauris.

The Persian prince ouerrunneth the Vauward of the Turks armie.

A sought how he might with as little losse to himselfe as possibly he could, make trial of his forces, and by all politique meanes to weaken and annoy his strong enemie.

Osman vnderstanding of this discomfiture of his vauward, forthwith dispatched Sinan Bassa the sonne of Cicala, and Mahamet the Bassa of Caraemit, with fourteene thousand souldiers to pursue the victorious Prince: who in their pursuit vsed such expedition, that at length they ouertooke him in the way towards his fathers campe. But as soone as the Prince saw the Turks so neere him, that without a dangerous and shameful flight he could not auoid the battel, couragiously he turned his face, and joined with them a most bloudy conflict: which being begun two houres before night, was most fiercely maintained vntill that the darkenesse of the night bereauing them of the vse of their weapons, enforced both the one side and the other to retire. Osman sendeth two Bassas with 14000 soldiers to ouertake the Persian Prince.

B Which was done with the notable losse of the Turkes, who in this second conflict (as it was commonly reported) lost six thousand men; and had (as it was thought) suffered a generall slaughter, had not the night interrupted so vncouth an action, well worthie of a thousand daylights. So that hitherto the Turks sustained the losse of more than ten thousand soldiers, and yet had scarce discouered or seene the citie which they so greedily longed after.

The next morning the Turks campe remoued and came within two miles of Tauris, where they incamped. But whilest they were setting vp their tents, Aliculi Chan issuing out of the citie with all his garrison and such of the citizens as were fit to beare armes, set vpon the face of the vauward, being now renewed, and with many cunning turnings and windings so charged them, that with great losse he forced them to retire euen vnto the maine battell; where after C he had espied the great artillerie, he without hurt withdrew himselfe againe to the citie. The confusion of the Turks in this skirmish was notable, for in a very small time the vauward was disordered, and almost three thousand slaine. But Aliculi not so contented, in the shutting in of the euening sallied out of the citie the second time, and swiftly running along that side of the armie that lay towards Tauris, slew the Bassa of Maras, and did great harme in that quarter: which done, without any staying he fled to the Kings campe, and forsooke the defence of that sorrowfull citie which he could not hold. Neuertheless the Taurisians, as many of them as remained in the citie, gathered themselues together to the gates of the citie, well armed, prepared to make a bloudie entrance for the Turkes whensoeuer they should come. All the night was spent in watching without rest on either side, and yet nothing attempted: but vpon D the breake of the day, a great multitude of the seruile sort of the Turkes, and of the common rascal rout, without any order from their captaines, armed with corselets, speares, & swords, went to the city with resolution to haue sacked it, and so to haue enriched themselues with the spoile and pillage of that wealthie citie. But when they came to the guarded gates of the Citie, they found there contrarie to their expectation, a terrible rescue, and were inforced there to joine an hard and mortal battell; so that the walls, the entrance, yea all the ground thereabouts was bathed with bloud, and as it were couered with weapons and dead carkasses. And yet for all that, though the Persians stood fast and firme at the arriual of this seruile rout; at the last they were constrained to yeeld the entrance, being ouercome by the multitude of them that out of the campe flowed in vpon them like a floud; and retyring into the citie, now asto- E nied and amased on euery side, they fortified themselues in their houses vnder the ground, and in the corners and winding turnings of the streets; from whence with their arrowes and some few arcubuses, they did the Turks that entred, great harme. Yet were they not able to kil and destroy so many of their enemies, but that at the last they were too mightie for them, and wrought many grieuous mischiefes in that wofull city. And so a great number of this rascall people that remained aliue, returned to the Turkish campe, carrying away with them too manifest tokens of the poore oppressed citie: wherein the miserable women and impotent soules stood embracing & straining the doores & posts of their houses, and kissing their natiue soile, with prayers, mournings, and complaints, bewailing their present miseries, and yet fearing worse to come. Osman the General now made acquainted with these calamities, caused pro- F clamation to be published, That no man should be so hardie as to molest the Taurisians, and in the meane time went himselfe about the citie, viewing throughly the scituation of it, and surueying the place wherein he might both incampe himselfe safely, and with better foundation and greater securitie erect a castle or fort, for the more assurance of that conquered countrey. A great slaughter in the Gates of Tauris.

The description of Tauris.

The Citie of Tauris seated at the foot of the hill Orantes, about eight dayes journey from from the Caſpian ſea, and is ſubiect to windes, cold, and ſnow; yet of a very wholeſome aire, abounding with all things neceſſarie for mans life; and wonderfull rich, with perpetual courſe of merchandiſe brought thither out of the Eaſt, to be conueyed vnto the Weſt; and alſo of others brought out of theſe Weſterne parts, to be diſperſed into the Eaſt. It is verie populous, for it feedeth almoſt two hundred thouſand perſons: but yet open to the fury of euery enemie without walls, and vnfortified. The buildings (after the manner of thoſe of the Eaſt) are of burnt clay, rather low than high. For all things it carrieth the name, and was the place of the Perſian Kings reſidence, vntill ſuch time as that the late King Tamas remoued his ſeat from thence further into his kingdome to Casbin: neuertheleſſe both before & ſince, although it had been ſundrie times moleſted by the inrodes and furie of the Turkiſh Emperors, yet was it ſtil in great eſtimation and renowne.

Of this citie Oſman Baſſa hauing taken diligent view, cauſed his tents to be pitched on the South ſide thereof, where was a ſpacious garden all flouriſhing and beautiful, replenished with ſundrie kind of trees and ſweet ſmelling plants, and a thouſand fountaines and brooks deriued from a prettie riuer, which with his pleaſant ſtreame diuided the garden from the city of Tauris; and was of ſo great beautie, that for the delicacie thereof it was by the countrey inhabitants call Sechis Genet (that is to ſay) the eight Paradiſes; and was in times paſt the ſtanding houſe of their Kings, while they kept their reſidence in this citie; and after they had withdrawne their ſeat from thence to Casbin, became the habitation and place of aboad for the Gouernors of Tauris. Of theſe gardens and places Oſman made choice to build his caſtle in; whereof he gaue the modell himſelfe, and commanded that all the whole circuit of thoſe pleaſant greenes ſhould be inuironed with walls, and trenches digged round about them to conuey the water from the aforeſaid riuer. Which was accordingly begun with the greateſt care that poſſibly might be; the foundation of the imbattelled walls laied, the ditches digged fourteene foot broad, and a mans height in depth: and in the ſpace of ſix and thirtie dayes the whole worke finiſhed and brought to an end; greate ſtore of artillery mounted vpon the wals, and diuers baths, lodgings, and ſuch other houſes neceſſarie for the Turkiſh vſes, built within the caſtle. The firſt day of this building Oſman fell ſicke of a feauer with a bloudie flix, which haply was the cauſe both of the ſlowneſſe of the building, and of many other loſſes that afterwards happened, as ſhall be hereafter declared.

The caſtle of Taurus built in 36 dayes.

Eight Ianizaries with certain Spaoglans found ſtrangled in a Bath at Tauris.

Fiue dayes after the building of the caſtle was begun, newes was brought into the Turkiſh campe, That eight Ianizaries and diuers Spaoglans were ſeene ſtrangled in a bath within the citie of Tauris. Whereupon the Zaini, Spahini, and Ianizaries came preſently vnto the General, declaring vnto him, That although he had with too much clemencie giuen order, That no man ſhould hurt or moleſt the Tauriſians, and that according to his pleaſure, euery man had vſed modeſtie towards them, and obedience to him; yet the Tauriſians themſelues had moſt audaciouſly ſtrangled in one of their baths eight Ianizaries and certaine Spaoglans, which iurie and inſolencie (they ſaid) in their iudgement was not to be ſuffered. This outrage ſo moued the General, that without any further delay he commanded the citie to be ſacked, leauing it wholly to the pleaſure of his ſouldiers: who forthwith ſo vſed the matter, not as if they would haue reuenged an iniurie, but rather at once haue brought an vtter deſtruction vpon the whole citie. Euery place was filled with ſlaughter, rauiſhment, rapine, and murther; virgines were deflowred, men children defiled with horrible and vnſpeakeable ſinnes; yonglings ſnatched out of their parents armes, houſes layed euen with the ground and burnt, riches and money carried away, and in briefe, all things ruinated and waſted. Neither were theſe miſchiefs committed once onely, but the ſecond followed worſe than the firſt, and the third vpon that worſe than the ſecond: ſo that it was a miſerie almoſt inexplicable, to behold that citie ſo populous, ſo rich, ſometimes the court and palace of the Perſian Kings, and honour of that Empire, now ſubiect to the furie of the Turks, plunged in calamitie and vtter deſtruction.

The miſerie of the Tauriſians.

The wofull aduertiſement hereof ſore troubled the Perſian King, but the young Prince his ſonne much more: who moued with the paſſions of moſt inward griefe, diſdaine, and deſpaire, and deſiring nothing more than reuenge, reſolued to attempt any thing whereby to requite ſo great a wrong. In which reſolution hauing confirmed his army, he commanded 500 of his horſemen to preſent themſelues euen to the very ſight of the enemies tents, and as it were to dare them to battell. Which thing they performed accordingly, and made a gallant ſhew of

of themſelues. At the diſcouerie whereof, the Turks imagining that the Perſians were come in great number to aſſaile the armie, order was giuen by the ſicke General, That Cicala Baſſa and Mahamet the Baſſa of Caraemit, with the people of Grecia, and all their own forces ſhould go to encounter the enemy: who preſently with their enſignes diſplaid, vnder wich there ſtood about foure and thirtie thouſand ſtrong, beſides a number of ſeruile people, yet men exerciſed in labors and perils, in all well neere fortie thouſand, ſet forward. Now the fiue hundred Perſians with a maruellous cunning kinde of skirmiſhing dallied with the Turkiſh ſouldiers, and drew them forward for the ſpace of eight miles & more: and being brought ſo far on, and now forewearied with the skirmiſh, were luſtily aſſailed by the Perſian prince, who with part of his armie (to the number of about twentie thouſand perſons) couragiouſly ſet vpon the two Baſſa's, and joined with them the deadlieſt and cruelleſt battel that euer was written of. Wherin the Perſians hauing giuen a moſt perillous onſet, and done great harme, it was thought that they would haue contented themſelues with ſo luckie an incounter, and ſo retyred: which the Turks minding to preuent, and not to returne without a notable victorie, hardly preſſed vpon them, hoping in the end to put them to flight, and ſo to giue them a bloudie and deadly ouerthrow. But the Perſians hauing quietly and with great aſſutance for a reaſonable ſpace endured their charge, at laſt as if they had been freſh men, made head vpon them afreſh, and began a moſt terrible battel anew, wherein the Baſſa of Caraemit (aboue named) was put to flight, and being wholly diſmaied and diſcomfited, fled backe againe to the campe, carrying with him the moſt manifeſt tokens of the vnhappie iſſue of the battell. Cicala the other Baſſa notwithſtanding valiantly and with great cunning ſtill ſuſtained the furie of the Perſians, labouring by all meanes to encourage his ſouldiers, and to haue reſtored the battell: but when he had done what he could, ouercome at laſt by greater valour, he was inforced to betake himſelfe to flight alſo; and ſo altogether diſcomfited, came to the campe without any enſigne; hauing left behinde him eight thouſand of his ſouldiers dead vpon the ground.

Eight thouſand Turkes ſlaine.

The Perſian prince encouraged with this ſo fortunate a victorie, by ſpeedie heraulds ſent to the ſicke Viſier (whom he thought notwithſtanding to haue bin in health) and gaue him to vnderſtand, that if he were willing to fight, he was readie for him, & in what ſort ſoeuer it pleaſed him to accept a battell, to make him good account of his valour; and to cauſe him to know, not onely that Amurath his Maſter had moſt vniuſtly raiſed this war, but alſo that he had being good for himſelfe not to haue taken the ſame in hand. Of this offer Oſman accepted: but being not able himſelfe to go and anſwer the prince in perſon hand to hand, by reaſon of his ſickeneſſe, which euery houre mortally increaſed, he ſent out all his captaines with his armie to dare him battell.

The prince lay ten miles or thereabouts diſtant from the campe of Oſman, towards whome the Turks ſet forward in this manner: The maine battell was guided by the Baſſa of Caraemit and Sinan Cicala, with all the ſouldiers of Aſſiria and Babylon; the left wing was led by the Baſſa of Natolia, with the band of Grecia; and the right wing was conducted by Amurath Baſſa of Caramania, with the people of Soria; to the number of threeſcore thouſand: beſide ſuch as were left behind at Tauris, with the truſty guard of the Ianizaries, and the artillery, for the ſafeguard of the ſicke Viſier. In this order they confronted the Perſian prince, who was himſelfe in the midſt of his armie, with all his people in very good order, hauing on the one ſide the ſoldiers of Perſia and Hircania, and on the other them of Parthia & Antropatia, in all to the number of fortie thouſand. The Turks feared nothing more, than that the Perſians fetching a great compaſſe about, ſhould with all celeritie and furie ſet vpon their tents, and the riches they had laied vp together in their pauilions; and therefore at euery motion of theirs they continually feared this ſudden outrode, whereof they had ſuch eſpeciall care, that retyring themſelues as much as they might; and feigning as if they had giuen place to the Perſians, it wanted not much but that they had brought them euen within the iuſt leuell and marke of their Artillerie. Which the Perſians perceiuing, without any further dallying hardly began to aſſaile the maine bodie of the battell. The Prince himſelfe being entred amongſt the ſouldiers of the Baſſa of Caraemit (who as General ſuſtained the place of Oſman) and preſſing into the midſt of the battell, diſpatched euery man that came in his way; and hauing ſingled out the Baſſa from the reſt, ſmote off his head, and gaue it to one of his Followers to carrie vp on the top of his Launce. Which beeing openly deſcried, brought a great terrour vpon the Turks ks, and exceedingly encouraged the Persians, who embrued with the bloud of their ene- G mies, and entermingling themselues more and more among them, made of them a most confused and general slaughter; wherein beside the Bassa before named, there died also the Bassa of Trabszonda, the Sanzacke of Brusia, with fiue other Sanzackes, and as it was commonly reported, twentie and Turks moe. It fell also to the lot of Amurath Bassa of Caramania to be there taken prisoner, with diuers other common souldiers. But night comming now on, and the Persians being come somewhat too nigh the Turkish artillerie, they gaue ouer the fight, and withdrew themselues backe to the place where the King lay incamped with the rest of his armie.

But now were diuers dayes spent, wherein the new fortresse at Tauris (as we haue before said) was fully finished, when the souldiers of Grecia and Constantinople, wearied to see their H friends and fellowes thus slaine before their faces, and hauing also safely layd vp in their own custodie such preyes and booties as they had gotten in the sacke of the citie, resolued with themselues to procure their owne departure, and so much the rather, for that the Winter was now fast comming on. And forasmuch as the General was through the immoderate flux of bloud brought weake, and in despaire of life, and quite abandoned of all hope by his physitions, and therefore not to be spoke withall; they were faine by the mouth of such as were their trustie friends about him, to represent vnto him the necessitie of their returne, and withall after many reuerend intreaties, caused it also to be signified vnto him, That if he stood obstinate, I and would needs stay dallying out the time in those dangerous places where no such need was, they should be inforced to withdraw themselues and to forsake him. Osman, who had now nothing els to doe in those countries, but onely to leaue some conuenient garison in the new fortresse at Tauris, liberally promised to satisfie their requests, by departing thence the Giaffer Bassa of Tripolis, an Eunuch made Gouernour of Tauris. next morning. So calling vnto him Giaffer the Eunuch Bassa of Tripolis, a man of a crafty and cruell nature, made him gouernour and keeper of the new built fortresse at Tauris. And the more to incourage him to take that charge vpon him, gaue him freely for the space of three whole yeres, not only the office and authorie, but also the rents and reuenues of the Bassa of Caracmit, lately slaine by the Persian Prince, and withall honored him with the title of a Bassa of the Court: so that hauing finished his three yeres office of Caracmit, he was then to go and sit among the soueraigne seats of the Bassa's of the Porta. The Bassa seeing so faire & so high a way for him to mount to those high honours (greater than which there is none in the Turkish K Empire) readily accepted the offer, and dispatching his lieutenant to Caracmit, to the gouernment of those countries in his absence, with an hundred of his owne followers, setled himself Osman the General departeth from Tauris, & commeth to Sancazan. in the said fort with a garrison of twelue thousand soldiers, furnished with all necessary proui-sion vntil the next Spring. The General hauing thus set all things in order, and carefully prouided for the safetie of the fortresse, departed according to his promise, and the same morning (which was the foure score and seuenth day after his departure from Erzirum) came to a place called Sancazan, seuen miles distant from Tauris.

The Turks were now vpon the point of their incamping, in a confused disorder and hurly-burly, when those that were hindermost in the army heard the neying of horses, and the noise of drums & trumpets, as it it had bin the comming of an armie. Which when the whole camp L vnderstood, they ran all headlong & disordered as they were, to the rescue, on that side where the noise of the horses and warlike instruments was heard. But whilest the Turks were thus intentiuely busied on that side to expect the comming of the enemie, the Persian Prince with-side; who hauing discouered the Camels and other carriages whereupon their bootie, their spoiles, and their riches were laden, which they had taken in Tauris, beside much of their pro-uision of victuals for the sustenance of the armie, he turned vpon them, and with a prouident and safe conuoy had taken for a prey eighteene thousand of the Camels and Mules well loden with the same booties and victuals, which the Prince sent presently away with six thousand of his souldiers, and he himselfe with his two and twentie thousand Persians entred into the Turks M armie, who now to withstand his assault, had on that side also made head against him. A gallant thing it was, and terrible withall, to see what a mortall battell was made, what sing prowesse shewed euen presently in the fore front of the battell; for in a moment you might haue seene the Tents and Pauilions turned vpside downe, and their incamping Lodgings reple-

A replenished with dead carkasses and bloud, victorious death ranging and raigning in euery corner. The Turks themselues were astonished and maruelled to see their enemies (so few in number, and intermingled among so populous an army of warlike people) more like fatal ministers of death, than mortal men, to brandish their swords ouer them, as if it had lightned, & to make so general a slaughter; and do to this day with great admiration recount the valor & prowesse of the Persians. But they all now doubting lest the enemie in this fury should forcibly haue en-tred the very lodgings of the sicke Visier, it was commanded (not by himselfe, for he lay now at the last gaspe; but by him who at that time commanded in his name) That without delay the artillerie should be vnbarred and discharged: which in that medley and confusion of both armies, without any exception or distinction of persons, ouerthrew both friends and foes, and B did more harme perhaps among the Turks themselues, than among the Persians: for at the first thundring noise thereof the Prince with all speed retired; after whom presently followed all the rest: so that the Turks which remained behinde, were more annoyed with the deadly shot than were the Persians, who flying away, could not feele the damage, but that the Turkes must first be well payed for their labor. The Turkes pursuing the flying Persians, made shew as if they would gladly haue ouertaken them: but night comming on, they feared to proceed any further than they might without danger returne. In this battell of Sancazan were slaine twen- Twenty thousand Turkes slaine.
tie thousand Turks, without any notable losse of the Persians.

Among the rest, in the same place died the Visier Osman, General of the late dreadfull, but Osman the Visier and General dieth at Sancazan.
now desolat army; not by the hand of the enemy, but consumed with the vehemency of an C ague, and flux of bloud. Whose death notwithstanding was kept secret from the whole army, euery man verily thinking, that it was but only the continuance of his sicknes, because the charets wherin he lay, were still kept close: and in his name Cicala Bassa (for so he had appointed in his wil) gaue out answers & commandments to the whole army. Neuertheless it was disclosed to the Persians by means of three yong men, who in the life of Osman hauing charge of his jewels and treasure, were with the best thereof and the fairest of his horses fled to the Persian king, to whom they reuealed the death of the General. The Persians, who before had thought it not possible for so great cowardise and dishonorable kind of fighting & ordering of an army to haue proceeded from the vertue and valor of Osman, of whose worth they had too manifest a trial and experience in times past; now vnderstanding of his death, were thereby incouraged D to attempt the vtter ouerthrow of the Turkish remnant, and so to giue them an honorable fare-wel. Wherupon the Persian prince with 14000 men followed the Turks, who had now raised their campe, and were remoued to a certaine riuer of salt water, not far from Sancazan, where the Prince caused a few tents to be pitched, about foure or fiue miles distant from the Turkish campe, the aforesaid brooke running in the midst betweene the two armies. Now the Prince had purposed to haue assailed the Turks in the morning, whiles they were loding their carriages, hoping in that confusion to haue wrought them some notable mischiefe: which his de-signement was reuealed vnto the Turks by one of his spies whom they had caught. And therfore they did neither rise so early in the morning as their manner was, nor load their stuffe vn-E til such time as they were all armed, & on horseback ready to receiue their enemies. By which their wary and vnusual maner of rising, the Persians perceiued that their purpose was by some means discouered. And yet considering that if they should lose this occasion, they should find no other good opportunitie to annoy them before the next Spring, they vtterly resolued to aduenture the assault: and hauing obserued that the enemies artillery was on the right side of the armie, they in the sight of euery man began to enter on the left. But the Turks presently so vncouered and vnbarred their artillerie against the assailants, as was to their great losse & danger. Howbeit they were so nimble and so quicke to shroud themselues vnder the enemies armie, and to auoid the mischieuous tempest, that being come now very neere the Turks squadrons, they must needs joine battel with them. The Persians had purposed before, as soone as they saw the Turks begin to stir, to retire, and so to draw them on into a very filthie and deepe F marish; which being then drie, was not feared or doubted of any, but only by those that were acquainted withall or borne thereabouts. Which their policie the rebel Maxut Chan, and with him Dant Chan (as being wel acquainted with those places) perceiuing, gaue notice thereof to Cicala Bassa, who presently caused a great compassing wing to be made, commanding them to set vpon the Persians, and to charge them home: which was forthwith put in execution, so that

the poore old king and the prince. This ſo ſudden and ſo dangerous a rebellion, whereby not only ſo honorable and ſo neceſſarie an enterpriſe was to be abandoned, but the whole ſtate of G the kingdome like to be indangered, exceedingly grieued al good men, but moſt of all the old king and the prince his ſon: who no leſſe carefull of his rightfull ſucceſſion, than was the aged king of his preſent eſtate, both now hazarded by this rebellion; wholly incenſed with griefe & anguiſh of mind began to caſt a thouſand deuices in his troubled head, what conrſe to take, and what to reſolue vpon. To abandon the ſiege it grieued him aboue meaſure, and to ſuffer ſo pernicious a rebellion to go forward, ſeemed too dangerous for the ſtate of Perſia: and to prouide for both theſe miſchiefes at once, was altogether impoſſible. In theſe huge waues of contrarie thoughts, he reſolued at laſt to turne himſelfe againſt the Turcomans, and to ſuppreſſe that re- I bellion, as moſt dangerous to the State. And ſo with twelue thouſand ſouldiers, and a part alſo H of the kings ordinarie guard, all couragious and hardy men, he followed after the rebellious Turcomans; and marching directly toward Casbin, he ouertooke them at a place called Cali-ſteza, a daies iourney on this ſide Casbin, and there ioyned battell with them. Wherein many of them being ſorie for that they had done, would not ſo much as draw their ſwords againſt the Prince: many others fled alſo away for feare, ſo that he eaſily obtained a wiſhed victorie ment preſently beheaded: ſo was alſo Caliſe the Sultan, and diuers other captains of this peſtilent conſpiracy. Yong Tamas was alſo taken, & by the direction of the Prince ſent to the caſtle of Cahaca. Fiue thouſand Turcomans of the late followers of the rebell Mahamet, fled out of the battell towards Babylon by the way of Siras, and yeelded themſelues to Solyman Baſſa of that citie; who afterwards repenting themſelues of their folly, ſought to returne againe into I the fauor of their king, but all in vaine: ſo that being become rebels to the one, and ſuſpected to the other, they did at one time loſe their countrie, their libertie, their honor, & the fauor of all men as well friends as foes. The Prince after this victorie held on his way to Casbin, and there ſtaying, laboured to gather the diſperſed Turcomans, eſpecially thoſe that (mooued with the honeſtie of the cauſe) would not beare arms in ſo vniuſt an action; intending afterwards to returne to Tauris, to attend the beſieging and conqueſt of the fort. This was the end of this dangerous rebellion, the chiefe cauſe that Tauris was not againe recouered out of the hands of the Turks, to the great weakening of the Perſian kingdome.

Giaffer Baſſa ſendeth to Cicala Baſſa for aid. Now Giaffer the Eunuch Baſſa Gouernour of the Caſtle of Tauris, fearing leſt the Perſian K Prince would with a greater army again return to the ſiege: perceiuing himſelfe to wax euery day weaker and weaker, by reaſon that many of his men ſecretly fled from him, beſide them that periſhed with ſickneſſe, and others ſlain in aduenturing too boldly to goe abroad to ſeeke for victuals; ſent aduertiſement thereof to Cicala Baſſa at Van: ſignifying further vnto him by writing, That if the prince ſhould again returne to aſſault the fort, he ſhould of neceſſitie be enforced to yeeld it: and that therefore as he tendered the honor of his Sultan, he would be care-full to ſend him ſuccour, whereby he might be able to maintaine the fort: adding moreouer, That now it was moſt eaſily to be done, becauſe there was no forces of the enemies in thoſe quarters, ſauing onely a few which remained about the king, lying 12 miles off from Tauris.
Cicala moued with the importance of the enterpriſe propounded, and withall deſirous to gain L ſome credit of glorie and renowne with his king, entertained the aduices of Giaffer, and getting him to horſe with a train of three thouſand harquebuſiers and good ſtore of munition, ſet forward toward Tauris. The Perſian king aduertiſed therof; ſent out ſpies to learn what way they held, meaning to meet them and to ſet vpon them: but theſe ſpies comming neere to Salmas, were apprehended by the forerunners of Cicala, and beeing put to torture, reuealed at laſt, how that their king was in armes, & on his way towards Sancazan. At which news Cicala was greatly aſtonied, as well for the danger whereinto the forces and munition which he had with him were likely to fall, as alſo for that by any loſſe which his troups ſhould ſuſtain in this expedition, the city of Van (being indeed the greater and moſt noble frontier towne in all thoſe countries) muſt needs be in hazard to be loſt, hauing left in it but his lieutenant with a verie few ſol- M diers. Whereupon hee determined to relinquiſh this dangerous enterpriſe, and to withdraw himſelfe backe to the defence and preſeruation of the citie committed to his truſt and go-uernment. But although theſe expected and deſired ſuccours were not conueyed to Tauris as was intended, yet had Giaffer as good fortune as hee could wiſh: for the preparations of the Prince

A prince were ſo long and troubleſome, and his returne ſo much prolonged, that there was time enough yeelded vnto the Turks great Generall now newly choſen (as by and by ſhal be declared) to go with a ſtrong army into thoſe quarters, and ſo to preſerue all that which the only expedition and celeritie of the enemie might haue put in great hazard, and almoſt haue brought to a deſperat caſe.

In the mean time, Amurath the Turkiſh Emperor was greatly troubled at Conſtantinople in making choice of a new Generall: on the one ſide, Oſman Baſſa hauing by his laſt will left Sinan Cicala to be his ſucceſſor, as a man of approued valor; and the many dangers he had run thorow in the late ſeruice about Tauris, with the great fauours he had in the court, did not a little en-cline the king to his election: on the other ſide, he heard of a publicke rumor ſpread amongſt B the ſouldiers, that they could by no means endure to be commanded by ſo young a captaine; and that ſome in plaine termes ſhould ſay, That they would not obey him: Which cauſed Amurath to doubt, that ſome dangerous diſcord might thereof enſue in the armie, if he ſhould proceed to make choice of him. Then there was alſo Ferat Baſſa, the ſame man which had alreadie ſuſtained that charge before Oſman, who now very ambitiouſly ſought againe for this honour, hauing of late performed ſome good ſeruice to the good liking of the King. Of any other to make better choice he had none, ſo that he ſtood in great doubt what to do. In the end, becauſe hee was in good time to prouide for his affaires, he made choice of Ferat Baſſa, the ſame man whom he had before made proofe of: a man of great fidelitie, of an honorable carriage, and already experienced in the leading and commanding of ſuch an armie to whome he C granted the ordinarie authoritie, to mannage at his pleaſure ſuch affaires of the empire as concerned his iourney. Vpon this reſolution, generall precepts were ſent out to all cities within the kingdome, to the Baſſaes and other Gouernours, with ſpeciall commandement, That all their ſoldiers, together with their taxes, tenths, munitions, victuals, armor, artificers, and to be ſhort, all their neceſſary furniture & prouiſion ſhould be ready and in order, vpon the firſt warning ſhould be ſent them the next Spring. Great prouiſion of money was made, and in Soria The returne of Soria ſix hundred thouſand ducats. (beſides the ordinarie ſumme that is beſtowed vpon the yearely pay of ſouldiers in Reiuan, Erzirum, Lori, Tomanis, Teflis, and Chars, which ſwallow vp all the reuenue of that countrie, and of the citie of Tripoli, amounting to the ſum of ſix hundred thouſand duckats) there was taken vp in preſt of priuat merchants in the citie of Aleppo onely, the ſumme of threeſcore D thouſand Cecchini, to be repaied vnto them with the firſt monies that ſhould be receiued by the officers of his cuſtome houſes. A matter that moued an extraordinary grudging among the people, for that it ſeemed to euery man a very ſtrange and intollerable exaction, beſide ſo many grieuances laied vpon them, for corne, for carriages, for pioners, and for workmen, to endure this burden alſo of lending their money, without hope of reſtitution thereof: yea and indeed euery man did greatly wonder how they were thus ill aduiſed, to make it knowne to the Chri-ſtian Princes what ſcarcitie and want of money they had. The Generall had alſo with him foure hundred pieces of artillerie, & did beſide ſo worke the matter, as that Maxut Chan (who was appointed Baſſa of Aleppo) was granted vnto him to be the guide of his armie, as he had been of Oſmans; and that Cicala Baſſa of Van (ſcarce his good friend) was remoued from thence E and ſent farther off out of his way as Baſſa to Babylon.

1586 And thus hauing put all things in readineſſe, he departed from Conſtantinople in the month Ferat departeth from Conſtantinople, and commeth to Sinas. of Aprill, in the yeare 1586; and paſſing ouer the ſtrait into Aſia, came to Siuas ſomething later than he ſhould haue done, beeing hindered partly by the Plague which then raged exceeedingly in Conſtantinople, and partly by other occaſions incident to ſuch actions. At Siuas he ſtaied ſo long for the comming together of his army, and in muſtering men, that it was the latter end of Iuly before he departed thence; ſtaying indeed the longer at Siuas, by reaſon of the exceeding dearth and want of victuals at Erzirum: which dearth was alſo ſo great in Aleppo, that a Venice buſhell of wheat was ſold for twelue Cecchini.

Ferat yet making his aboad at Siuas, but readie to depart, was aduertiſed by certaine Poſts F ſent from Giaffer the Baſſa of Tauris, how that the Perſian prince was hourely expected with a great armie, and that if he did foreſlow to ſend ſuccours, and to preuent the comming of the prince, and ſo giue him time & leiſure to aſſault the caſtle, he doubted greatly how he ſhould be able to hold the ſame. Vpon which aduertiſement Ferat preſently remoued, and ſo haſted his iourney, that about the beginning of Auguſt he was at Erzirum: and ſtill hearing more and more

…e of the princes comming, staied not there, but hasted to Van: where hauing gathered to- G gather all his souldiers, and taken a new suruey of his army, he departed thence, and being presently come into the open and large champaines, to make proofe of the readinesse of his soul-diers, he marshalled them in such sort as if he should forthwith haue ioyned battell with the enemie, and so in seemely order marched on.

The Turkish Generall continually feared, lest the Persians should come vpon him with some sudden assault: besides that, the constant report of the Princes comming to Tauris with his armie, much increased his troubled thoughts. But on the other side, he reposed great confidence in the conspiracie that was now plotted against the life of the Prince, with the priuity of Aliculi Chan the protector and champion of Abas Mirize of Heri: who vnder colour of ac- I companying the Prince to assist his forces, had resolutely concluded with himselfe, and abso- H lutely promised Abas (hauing also giuen intelligence thereof to the Turkish General) to rid the Prince Hamze of his life; or at least (which he thought might more easily be brought to passe) in the sundry reuolutions & variable chances of the battel, at some time or other to make him fall into the hands of Ferat, and so to settle his lord and master Abas in his estate. Vpon these trecheries Ferat grounding himself, began with greater confidence to dispose his designements and some wat lesse to feare the fame of the huge preparations of Persia against him. Which preparations in truth, as by most wicked deuices and malicious conspiracies they were turned quite contrarie from that end whereunto the Prince Hamze had continually appointed them; so if they had bin employed with such faith & fidelitie as so righteous a cause required, with- I out all doubt the writers of our time should haue had matter enough in this 86 yeare to shew and represent vnto the world such accidents as should be nothing inferior to those of the yere before going. But forasmuch as rebellion and discord, the two infernall ministers of the diuel, haue for the vtter vndoing & ouerthrow of the glorie of Persia, continually fauored the Turks armie, no maruell it is that the Persian nation cannot want of any reuenge taken for the indignities offered them by their enemies; and that our writers cannot chuse but write of the true and vndoubted victories of the Turkes, and the bare shadowes of the Persian exploits; which notwithstanding many Christians vainly beleeue, because they most earnestly desire them to be true; although they do see to the contrary, the manifest prospering & euident conquests which the Turks haue in diuers their States and Countries.

The glorie of the Persian kingdom ouerthrowne by rebellion and discord.

The Persian Prince about the latter end of Iuly arriued at Tauris with the greatest part of K his armie, where he (contrarie to the opinion of all men) staid not, for what cause is vncertaine.
But vnderstanding that Zeinel Bassa of Salmas, by nation a Curdo, lay encamped before the ci-tie, who of a Persian was become a Turke, and had done great harme against the State of Persia; he determined suddenly to set vpon him, and to chastise him for his rebellion. According to which resolution, being accompanied with twelue thousand souldiers, he rode to Salmas, where finding Zeinel with all his people encamped as he had been before enformed, he gaue him the assault. Zeinel more readie to flie than to fight, & his soldiers as readie as he, fled presently, and fel before the Persians, so that the Bassa himselfe with a few others had much adoe to escape and saue themselues in the closest corners thereabouts, leauing the citie committed to his charge, for a prey vnto the angrie enemy: who entering into the same, sacked and spoi- L led it, exercising thereon all such cruelties, as partly the natural desires of souldiers vse to practise, and partly such as the Turks themselues shewed vnto them in that miserable and most lamentable sacking of Tauris the last yere. The like spoils did the Persian army in al those quarters round about, and so would haue peraduenture returned to Tauris, but that certaine spies arriued vpon them, with aduertisement, That the Bassa of Reiuan being issued out of his fortresse with fifteen hundred harquebusiers, had committed the like outrages in the villages and fields thereabouts, as the Prince had done about Salmas. With which newes the prince was greatly moued; and immediatly rising with his armie, and marching towards Reiuan, not far from the citie encountered the Bassa: who discouering the enemies forces afar off, began in great disorder to flie and retire into his fort, leauing the greatest part of his souldiers (making M not so much speed in flight as himselfe) to the fury of the prince, who put them al to the sword and did what harme he possibly could in all the places thereabouts.

At the very same time great troubles arose in the Drusian country: for Man-Ogli the valia Drusian (of whom we haue before spoken) in reuenge of the iniuries don vnto him & his people

A ple by Ebrain Bassa, and by a valiant kinde of restitution to recompence himselfe of all those bribes and Presents which by so many shifts and subtilties were by the couetous Bassa wrung from him (as is before declared) had now taken vp armes, and hauing wasted and sacked all the territory of Ebne-Mansur and of his other enemies who had yeelded their obedience vnto the Turks, without let forced all that country with sudden inuasions and inrodes, euen very neere vnto the cities of Balbecke and Tripoli, and did there exceeding harme. For redresse whereof, Amurath was glad to dispatch away from the court Ali Bassa borne at Aleppo, with the title of the Bassa of Damasco, and with authority to muster fresh souldiers, and so wholly to attend the vtter subuersion of Man-Ogli. But comming thither, he found all againe quiet, so that his presence in that countrey serued rather for a reconciliation and peace making amongst them, B than for the prosecuting of any further warre; which at that time was most necessarie for the Turks to be auoided, as well for want of mony in the common treasurie, as for the exceeding scarcitie of victuals.

Now the Persian prince hauing made an end of the outrodes and spoiles before mentioned, retired himselfe to Tauris, and so towards his fathers campe, where the rest of his army was now arriued, to the number of about fortie thousand: of whom the Prince dispatched away the soldiers of Heri to the number of eight thousand, vnder the conduct of the traiterous Aliculi Chan their Generall: and part also of the Turcomans, vnder the leading of Emanguli Chan; with speciall charge, That they should by the way in places of most aduantage, meet & receiue the enemies army, and in those narrow & troublesome passages to do them what mischiefe C they possible could. Which the Prince thus appointed, thinking by this meanes to weaken the enemies forces, and so at their arriuall at Tauris, to come vpon them with all his power, and so vtterly to destroy them.

Both these captains departed accordingly, making shew that they would with all affection accomplish the commandement of their Prince: yet neuer was there heard any seruice of moment put in execution by them: for Aliculi ful of treason, after their departure began to alledge many forced reasons and excuses, Why they should surcease from meeting with the Turks: & Emanguli as yet vtterly ignorant of the wicked purposes and mischieuous trecherie of Alicu-li, suffered himself to be misse-led by him also. By the delaies and negligence of these two Persian captains, the Turkish General tooke leisure without any losse or hinderance at all, to arriue D at Tauris, and to put the desired succors into the fort: at what time the Persian prince by good hap had got knowledge of the trecherie of Aliculi, and of the designements which many of the Sultans had lately contriued, for the betraying of him aliue into the hands of the Turkish General. Of which suspition he being greatly afraid, durst not only not trust himself e to perform those battels that he had before determined to haue performed; but quite abandoning this noble and honorable enterprise, wholly employed all his care and study for the safety of his own person, and so left the triumph of the matter in the power of the Turks. And thus those great hopes and expectations which the Persians had conceiued of great exploits to haue bin done against the enemie, did not onely proue vaine and come to no good issue, but contrariwise by this discouerie were conuerted into most strange disturbances, and all Persia thereby endured E sundrie alterations and reuolutions of most important consequencies. For both Aliculi Chan and his complices were pursued by the prince, as rebels and traitors: and also Abas Mirize of Heri was manifestly discouered for a wicked and trecherous contriuer of his brothers death; whereby the common mischiefes were encreased more than euer they were before, and the publike calamities yeelded greater hopes vnto the Turks than they had euer before conceiued in all the course of these warres.

Aliculi and Emanguli Chan performe nothing against the Turks, as was by the prince expected.

Ferat putteth succours into the fort at Tauris.

When Ferat had thus relieued them in the castle of Tauris, leauing for the custodie thereof Giaffer the Bassa with his former companies, hee returned towards Erzirum: hauing first caused a fort to be erected at Curchiue Tauris, a place neere vnto Tauris; another at Coy; and the third at Cum: in euery one of which forts hee left a conuenient number of souldiers, F with all things necessarie and sufficient for their maintenance, and defence of the places they were to keep. He sent also succors to the fort at Teflis in Georgia, which they had long expected, and now most ioyfully receiued. But the Persian Prince hauing hunted Aliculi Chan out of the quarters of Tauris, thought himself now wholly deliuered from the great feare of treason and rebellion, wherein he of late liued: and therefore in as great hast as he could, put himselfe

...e on his iourney towards Genge: in which place hauing gathered together a good number of ſouldiers, he determined to remoue thence, to intercept the ſuccors that were by the Turks to be brought to Teflis. Now hee had alwaies found Emanguli Chan to be both faithfull and wiſe, and in him he repoſed an aſſured confidence for performing any enterpriſe that he had in hand, and c... mnicated with him euery deuice that he had conceiued in theſe wars. And therefore he made head and ioined with him, and lodging moſt familiarly in his city, he ſtaid there for the ſetting in order and diſpoſing of his aforeſaid deſignement, beeing very deſirous not to let ſuch an opportunitie to ouerſlip, without ſignification vnto the world of ſome notable noueltie, which might be correſpondent to the fame that of matters paſſed and performed the yere before, was now ſpred & publiſhed abroad ouer all the world. But when he was euen at the very faireſt to haue put this his deſire in execution, and leaſt of all feared any treacherie or treaſon, vpon a ſudden in the night time as he ſlept vpon a pallet he was miſerably ſtucken through the body, by an Eunuch of his that attended vpon him: and ſo the moſt reſplendent and bright luſtre that euer ſhined in Perſia, was vtterly extinguiſhed. What was the occaſion therof, and who procured his death, diuers and ſundry are the opinions of men. Some thinke, that his brother Abas Mirize of Heri, who had before conſpired to haue had him betraied into the hands of the Turkiſh Generall, had now by force of mony and gifts enduced the wicked Eunuch thereunto. Others deemed it not to haue bin done without the priuitie of his father, as more deſirous to prefet Abas Mirize his other ſonne vnto the kingdome. Diuers others do diuerſly reaſon of the matter: ſo that to affirme of a certaintie, that thus or thus the death of ſo worthie a Prince was procured, were great raſhneſſe: and therefore we leaue it, with the further proceſſe of the Perſian State, vnto the further diſcouerie of Time, the antient mother of Truth.

The Perſian prince ſlain by one of his Eunuchs.

Notwithſtanding the league betwixt the Chriſtian Emperour Rodolph the ſecond and Amurath the great Turke, many ſharp skirmiſhes oftentim... fell out betwixt the Chriſtians and the Turks vpon the frontiers of their territories and dominions, eſpecially in Hungarie, Croatia, and Stiria: as now in the latter end of this yere 1586 in the moneth of December, the Turks, after their inſolent manner making an inrode into the borders of Croatia, receiued a notable ouerthrow by the Chriſtians, being in number much fewer: where amongſt others, the Baſſa of Boſna with his brother was ſlaine; whoſe head with certaine priſoners was ſent to Vienna to Erneſtus Archduke of Auſtria, the Emperors brother. This Baſſa of Boſna and his brother, ſlaine in this conflict (as we haue ſaid) are reported to haue been the ſonnes of Mahumet the late great Viſier, by one of the daughters of Selymus the ſecond, Amurath his ſiſter. For diuers yeres following, Amurath did no great matter worth the remembrance, contenting himſelfe (as it ſhould ſeeme) with that he had already got from the Perſians: and holding his league in ſome reaſonable ſort with the Chriſtians: yet not ſo, but that many a bloudie broile, tending at laſt euen to the breach of the league, paſſed betwixt the Turkes and the Chriſtians; which for the continuation of the Hiſtorie we will briefely ſet downe, as they are vnto vs by the Writers of our time reported.

1587 In Februarie the yere following, which was the yere 1587, the Chriſtians prouoked by the often outrages of the Turks, ſetting vpon the caſtle of Koppan, not far from the lake of Balaton, being then frozen, by good fortune ſurpriſed it. There was at that time in the caſtle 3 of the Turks Sanzacks, and about a thouſand Turks, of whom an hundred and ninetie of the better ſort, with ſeuenty women, beſides diuers of the meaner ſort, fell into the hands of the Chriſtians; the reſt ſauing themſelues by flight, or by creeping into ſecret corners: an hundred horſes for ſeruice were there taken alſo, and ſo much bootie as was eſteemed to be worth fortie thouſand duckats. Of the three Sanzacks that were there preſent, Alis Sanzacke of Koppan was taken, and brought firſt to Vienna, and afterward preſented to the Emperor: Another of them ſtanding vpon his defence in a vault vnder ground, was there ſmothered: the third eſcaped by flight, but was afterwards the ſame yeare taken with diuers others, as ſhall be forthwith declared.

The caſtle of Koppan in Hungarie ſurpriſed by the Chriſtians.

The eight of Auguſt following, foure of the Turks great Commanders in Hungarie, viz. the Baſſa of Ziget, the Sanzackes of Mohas, of Quinque Eccleſiæ, and the new Sanzacke of Koppan, with fiue thouſand ſouldiers brake into the borders of the Chriſtians, and in moſt cruell manner deſtroyed ſeuenteene countrey villages about Limbach: carrying away with them them all the miſerable countrey people, with the ſpoile of the countrey. Whereof George Countie Serinus (ſonne to that moſt valiant Countie Nicholas Serinus ſlaine at Ziget) commander of the garriſon of Caniſia, vnderſtanding, with as much ſpeed as was poſſible raiſed ſuch forces as he was able out of his territorie betwixt the riuers of Drauus and Mura, and calling vnto his aid the Countie Nadaſti, the Lord Bathianius, and ſome other valiant Captaines that had the charge of thoſe frontiers; with ſuch diligence tooke the ſtraits and paſſages whereby the Turks muſt needs returne among the mariſhes, that the Turks comming backe againe that way with a very rich prey and many priſoners, being in the breake of the day hardly charged by thoſe moſt expert and reſolute ſouldiers, in thoſe ſtrait and troubleſome paſſages about a mile from Caniſia, were at length diſcomfited and put to flight with ſuch a miſerable ſlaughter, that many of them yeelded vp their ſcimiters, pittifully crying for mercie; other ſome fled backe into the woods and forreſts; and many running headlong into the mariſhes, there periſhed, or ſticking faſt in the deepe mud, cried together for mercie and helpe of their enemies. In this conflict Muhamet the Sanzacke of Quinque Eccleſiæ (ſonne to Haly Baſſa ſlaine in the battell of Lepanto) was taken priſoner. Sinan Beg Sanzacke of Mohaz, thinking to eſcape through the mariſh, ſtucke faſt with his horſe, and was ſhot through the head with a ſmall ſhot, and there died. The Baſſa of Ziget, with Chaſan the new Sanzacke of Koppan, ſeeing all deſperate and loſt, fled betimes out of the battell: but he of Koppan wandering vp and downe in the woods, was the next night after the battell with others taken: the Baſſa of Ziget almoſt ſpent with hunger and griefe of minde, eſcaped on foot ſeuen dayes after to Breſenza. There were taken of the Turks a thouſand three hundred, of whom many died afterwards of their wounds. In this battell there was ſlaine of the Turks, with them that periſhed in the mariſhes and woods, about 2000, and of the Turks horſes were taken aboue 1500. All the prey before taken by the Turks, with the miſerable captiues, was againe recouered. The number of them that performed this notable ſeruice, was in all but fifteen hundred foot and fiue hundred horſe; of whom there was but eleuen ſlaine, but moſt of the reſt wounded. Foure hundred heads of the ſlaine Turks were (after the manner of thoſe bordering ſouldiers) carried for ſhew to Caniſia, with fiue hundred priſoners. The Chriſtian ſouldiers with the helpe of the countrey people, ceaſed not for certaine dayes to hunt after the Turks that were fled into the woods, as after wilde beaſts, of whom they found a great number: diuers others alſo ſeeing no meanes to eſcape, came forth of their lurking places and yeelded themſelues.

Amurath vnderſtanding of all theſe troubles that had ſo happened, commanded Aly the Baſſa of Buda to be ſtrangled, for that he had broken the league, and not reſtrained the inſolencie of his Sanzackes, whom he might haue commanded: and in his ſtead placed Sinan Baſſa, whome before in diſgrace, hee had now at the requeſt of his wife againe receiued into fauour, and reſtored to his former dignitie. About this time alſo Sigiſmund (the King of Swenden his ſonne) now after the death of King Stephen choſen King of Polonia, and Maximilian the Emperours brother rejected; euen in the beginning of his raigne ſought to renew the league which Stephen his predeceſſor and other the Polonian Kings had before made with Amurath and his predeceſſors the Turkiſh Sultans. And to that purpoſe writ vnto him as followeth:

Aly Baſſa of Buda ſtrangled by the commandement of Amurath.

Sinan Baſſa againe receiued into fauour.

Sigiſmund the third, King of Polonia, vnto Amurath the third, Emperor of the Turkes, ſendeth greeting.

The Almightie long keepe and preſerue your Maieſtie in health and honour. Moſt Mightie Prince, our beſt beloued friend and neighbour, after that we by the grace and goodneſſe of God were choſen to gouerne the kingdome of Polonia, and the Embaſſadors of that kingdome had ſignified ſo much vnto vs; we prouiding vs of neceſſaries, came to Danske the eighteenth of October, from whence we ſend to you our Secretarie, Iohn Zamogil, to giue your Maieſtie to vnderſtand of this our comming. For beeing told by the Polonian Embaſſadors, That wee were choſen vnto the gouernment of that Kingdome, vpon condition, That according vnto the cuſtome of our predeceſſors the Polonian Kings, we ſhould keepe loue and friendſhip with the moſt Excellent Muſſulman Emperours; wee promiſe vnto your Soueraigne Maieſtie, that we are willing with the like or greater zeale and deuotion, to continue that amitie and friendſhip with your moſt excellent Maieſtie and the Othoman Emperors your Succeſſors. For confirmation Sigiſmund the Polonian King his letter vnto Amurath.

The Turks deſire to be called Muſſulman, which in their language ſignifieth a true beleeuer.*

...tion whereof so soone as we shall come vnto Cracouia the regal citie of Polonia, and there be crowned, we will forthwith send our great Embassador vnto your Maiestie. In the meane time we most earnestly request your Maiestie, that our kingdome may on your Maiesties behalfe rest in safetie and peace: which we perswade our selues you will easily grant. So wishing vnto you all health and happinesse, we bid you farewell. From Danske the 18 of October, in the yeare 1587, and of our raigne the first.

Vnto which the Kings request and letters, Amurath not long after returned this answer in writing:

Amurath the third, Emperour of the Turks, vnto Sigismund King of Polonia, greeting.

Amurath his answer vnto the letters of Sigismund.

I take it well, and as a token of your loue, that your Embassador Iohn Zamogil came with your letters vnto our most high and glorious Court, the refuge of distressed Princes: wherein you haue giuen vs to vnderstand, how that in stead of the most excellent and famous King Stepen, of worthie memory late King of Polonia; you, discended of the same noble stocke and race of the Polonian Kings, are by the free election of the whole State of the famous Kingdome of Polonia and the great Kingdome of Lithuania, chosen King of Polonia: and being sent for by lawfull Embassadors, by the fauour and goodnesse of God, to be come vnto the citie of Danske, and from thence to be about to go vnto Cracouia, the chiefe citie of the kingdome of Polonia. And when you are there arriued, to send your Embassadour vnto our most high and glorious Court, to confirme, preserue, and establish the league and amitie commodious and necessarie for both our Kingdomes, honored and kept by your antient predecessours, with our grandfathers and great grandfathers; yea and that with greater zeale and deuotion than any your noble Auncestors. And therefore your Embassador in your name requesteth, That no inuasion on our behalfe be made into the borders of the kingdome of Polonia, or any harme there done: and that the most noble Tartar Prince Isbam Gerai (whome God blesse) should be warned, that he neither make nor suffer any incursion to be made into the confines of the Kingdome of Polonia. All such things in your letters contained, with the rest which your Embassadour hath by word of mouth deliuered, are with speed orderly by vs conceiued. Know you therefore our most stately and magnificent Court to be alwaies open vnto such as resort thereunto, and that from thence neuer man had repulse, neither shall hereafter haue: wherefore it beseemeth you, as soone as these our letters shall be brought vnto you, to open your eyes, and to beware that nothing be on your part done against the Maiestie of our Court, and the league; and that our peace and amitie be neither in much or little disturbed, but as best beseemeth, well and sincerely kept: and so perswade your selfe it shall on our part also be most inuiolately obserued. Our letters are also directed vnto the most excellent Tartar Prince Isbam Gerai (whom God blesse) straitly charging and commanding him, not to make or suffer any incursion to be made into the borders of Polonia. In briefe, the league and amity shall on our part be religiously kept: and whosoeuer shall presume to do any harme vnto the kingdome or confines of Polonia, shall therefore without faile receiue from vs due punishment. So on your part also it is requisite that the same be done, and that in declaration of your loue, you forget not oftentimes to intimate vnto our most high and glorious Court, such certaine occurrents and newes as shal happen in those parts, which shall be vnto vs a signe of your sincere loue and friendship. So know you and giue credit vnto this our seale from Constantinople.

Neither was King Sigismund vnmindefull of this his promise before made for the sending of his Embassador; but being possessed of the Polonian kingdome, sent Christopher Dziercins (his Secretarie) Embassador vnto Amurath for the confirming of the league: which hee hath euer since so firmely kept with the Turke, that he could neuer by any entreatie of the Emperor, or of the Princes Electors, or others, or in respect of the common danger, be drawne into the fellowship of this long and religious war, so hardly maintained by the Emperor and some few other Christian Princes his confederats; first against Amurath whilest he liued, and euer since against Mahomet his sonne, which now raigneth; the issue whereof, God grant it proue not as well vnto the Polonians as others farther off, in fine lamentable.

The yeare following, Ferat (yet the Turks General in Persia) tooke the citie of Genge, being before for feare of the Turks quite abandoned & forsaken by the Inhabitants, who yet vpon his faith giuen for their safetie, returned again, yeelding to pay vnto the Turke a yerely tribute

A but of fiue thousand duckets. But when he would haue gon farther into the enemies country, hauing part of his armie cut off by the way, he was by his mutinous souldiers foulely entreated, wounded, and enforced to retire. Cicala Bassa also passing ouer the riuer Euphrates, had in those quarters diuers bloudie skirmishes with the Persians, sometime carrying away the better, and sometime the worse, as the fortune of the field serued. Vntill at length, Amurath himselfe no lesse wearie than his people of that long and chargeable war, and the Persian king also inclining to peace; he by the perswasion of Sinan Bassa (but lately before receiued into fauour) was now contented to be entreated to hearken vnto the same: mooued thereunto as well by reason of new troubles then in other places arising, as for the great famine and plague then raging in Constantinople. And considering withall what a great Territorie he had woon
B from the Persians, and how necessarie it was for him by peace to confirme himselfe in those his new conquests, and by the building of certaine strong forts for the succour of one another, and by the placing of his Timariots therein, to assure the same vnto him: all which without peace he could not possibly do, as the old Bassa right wisely told him. For which reasons he yeelded to peace; and so Embassadors passing to and fro, a peace was at length agreed vpon betwixt these two great Mahometan Princes: the Turke couenanting to keepe vnto himselfe the places he had alreadie gained; namely Tauris, Genge, Siruan, and Chirs, with all the profits thereof arising, for the maintenance of his garrisons and Timariots there. Whereof it was thought new stirres would eftsoones arise; the Turks growne insolent of their late victories, being not able to content themselues with the conditions of the league; and the Per-
C sians not willing to liue in continual feare of the Turkes, especially seeing themselues to be daily by them more and more oppressed; and withall doubting left the Turkes after they had taken fast footing in those new conquered Countries, and so growne strong, and gotten better knowledge of the passages, should (after their ambitious manner) seeke to possesse themselues of the rest; not keeping the couenants agreed vpon betwixt them, nor at all regarding the capitulations of the league. Which was neuertheless (as we said) on both sides for the space of ten yeares orderly confirmed with all due circumstances and ceremonis, in like occurrents by the great Potentats of the world vsed: and for the more assurance thereof, one of the Persian Kings sonnes, or as some others say, one of his nephews, giuen vnto the Turks in hostage, as Amurath required.

The Ianizaries in a tumult at Constantinople.

D These long wars thus ended, shortly after a great sedition was raised at Constantinople by the souldiers of the court, which returning out of Persia, with great insolencie demanded their pay. For the satisfying of whom, by the consent of the great Sultan himselfe, the value of the coine was inhaunsed, and a new kind of subsidie for leuying of money imposed vpon the subiects in general, none excepted; who standing vpon their antient liberties and priuiledges, refused to pay it, especially the Ianizaries and other souldiers of the court. Wherefore their Aga or captaine was commanded to appease them, and to perswade them to pay the demanded tribute: in attempting whereof he was in danger to haue been slaine by the insolent Ianizaries; and yet neuertheless for preuailing no more with them, was in displeasure thrust out of his of-
E fice, and another placed in his roome that should haue married Amuraths daughter; of whom for all that, the Ianizaries would not accept in any case, but threw stones at him, and threatned to kill him. The next night a great fire arose in the citie; for the quenching whereof, the Ianizaries were commanded (as their dutie was) to put to their helping hands: which they not only most obstinatly refused to do, but also kept backe others that brought water for the quenching thereof, and together with the other souldiers of the court, did what they might to make it burne the faster. With the rage of this fire were consumed seuen of their Temples, 25 great Innes, fifteene thousand houses, with many warehouses and shops. To appease this dange-F rous stirre, and to preuent further mischiefe, commandement was giuen to the Beglerbeg of Grecia and Dauid Passy a Iew (the first authors of this new imposition) that they should either gather the aforesaid tribute by them deuised, and pay the souldiers, or by some other meanes to giue them contentment. But here began the Priests publiquely to perswade the people from paiment of this new tribute, or any other such like; perswading them in any case to defend their antient liberties and customes: whereupon the churches were by the Priests shut vp, publique prayers for the health of the Sultan intermitted, the Bassa's houses assaulted, and all the citie on a new hurley burley. For the appeasing whereof Amurath was glad to yeeld vnto the Great harme done by fire in Constantinople.

Iani-

Ianizaries, to pay the ſouldiers out of his owne treaſurie, to reuoke his mandates giuen out for the exaction of the new tribute, and to deliuer the two perſuaders thereof to the pleaſure of the Ianizaries; who drew them vp and downe the ſtreets at horſes tailes, and afterwards cutting off their heads, in ſcorne toſſed them from hand to hand one to another, as if they had bin tenniſe balles.

Sinan Baſſa of Buda inuadeth the vpper part of Hungarie.

About the latter end of September, Sinan Baſſa of Buda, hauing with the aſſiſtance of the Sanzackes about Fille, raiſed an armie of eleuen thouſand ſoldiers, with purpoſe to haue ſpoiled all the vpper part of Hungarie, came the ſixt of October before the caſtle of Putnoc, and gaue thereunto ſummons: but finding them in the Caſtle better prouided and more reſolute than he had before ſuppoſed, he departed thence, and paſſing the riuer Schayo, came to Sixo, a towne of about fiue hundred houſes, which after a ſore batterie he tooke, and burnt it down to the ground. In the meane while Claudius Ruſſel General for the wars in that part of Hungarie, hauing aſſembled his forces, came vpon him, and after a hard fight put him to the worſe, when he had ſlaine of his Turks about two thouſand fiue hundred, beſides three hundred other drowned in the riuer Schayo. Shortly after, the Chriſtians in like manner breaking into the frontiers of the Turks, tooke from them the caſtles of Blauenſtein, Geſtes, with ſome other ſmall forts thereabouts in the vpper part of Hungarie.

Sinan ouerthrowne.

1589 Sinan for that he had contrarie to the league, and without the commandement of Amurath, ſo vnfortunatly attempted war in Hungarie, was the next yeare in great diſpleaſure ſent for to Conſtantinople, and Ferat Baſſa of Boſna (late General of the Turks army againſt the Perſians, and now but newly come home) placed in his roome at Buda.

Amurath before not ignorant of the great preparation that Philip the King of Spaine had made, and of the inuincible Armado (as it was termed) by him ſet forth for the inuaſion of England (the fame whereof had long before filled a great part of the world) as alſo of the euil ſucceſſe thereof the laſt yeare, viz. 1588; and of the purpoſe her Majeſtie of England had for the troubling of his rich trade, eſpecially into the Weſt Indies, and for the relieuing of Don Anthonio, by him driuen out of Portugal: wrot vnto her about this time concerning thoſe and ſuch like matters as had been moued by her Agent, as followeth:

Nicholaus Reuſnerius Epiſt. Turcic. lib. 12. pag. 42.

Amurath the third, Emperor of the Turks, vnto Elizabeth Queene of England, France, and Ireland, greeting Amurathi Letters vnto the Queen of England.

Moſt honorable Matrone of the Chriſtian Religion, Mirror of chaſtitie, adorned with the brightneſſe of ſouereignitie and power amongſt the moſt chaſte women of the people which ſerue Ieſu, Miſtris of great kingdomes, reputed of greateſt majeſtie and praiſe among the Nazarites, Elizabeth Queene of England, to whom we wiſh a moſt happie and proſperous raigne. You ſhall vnderſtand by our high and Imperiall letters directed vnto you, how that your Orator reſiant in our ſtately and magnificent Court, hath preſented vnto the throne of our Maieſtie a certaine writing, wherein he hath certified vs, how that about foure yeares ago you haue made war vpon the King of Spaine, for the abating and breaking of his forces, wherewith he threatneth all other Chriſtian Princes, and purpoſeth to make himſelfe the ſole Monarch both of them and all the world beſide. As alſo how that the ſame King of Spaine hath by force taken from Don Anthonio (lawfully created King of Portugal) his kingdome: and that your intention is, that his ſhips which go and come into the Indies, may from henceforth be embarred and ſtayed from that nauigation: wherein are yerely brought into Spaine, precious ſtones, ſpices, gold, and ſiluer, eſteemed worth manie millions, wherewith the aforeſaid King as with a great treaſure enriched, hath meanes to moleſt and trouble all other Chriſtian Princes: which if he ſhall ſtill proceed to do, he will make himſelfe daily ſtronger and ſtronger, and ſuch an one as may not eaſily be weakened. After that, your aforeſaid Orator requeſted our Highneſſe, in the beginning of the next Spring to ſend out our Imperial fleet againſt him, being aſſured that the King of Spaine could not be able eaſily to withſtand it, for that he had now already receiued a great ouerthrow by your fleet: and being ſcarce able to withſtand you alone, if he ſhould be on diuers parts inuaded, muſt needs be ouercome, to the great benefit of all the Chriſtian Princes, as alſo of our Imperial ſtate. Beſides this, that whereas the aforeſaid Don Anthonio is by force driuen out and depriued of his kingdome, that we (to the imitation of our noble anceſtours of happy memory, whoſe graces the Almighty lighten) ſhould alſo giue the aid and ſuccor of our magnificent ſtate, as did they vnto ſuch as had recourſe vnto their high Courts and palaces for reliefe. In briefe, all theſe things, with many other others which your aforeſaid Orator hath at large declared vnto our Imperial throne, we haue well vnderſtood, and laid them vp in our deepe remembrance. But foraſmuch as we for many yeares paſt haue made wars in Perſia, with a full reſolution and intent vtterly to conquer and ſubdue the kingdome of that accurſed Perſian heretike, and to ioine the ſame vnto our antient dominions; and now by the grace of God, and helpe of our great Prophet, are now vpon the point for the ſatiſfying of our deſire: that once done, due proniſion ſhall be aſſigned vnto all ſuch things as you haue of vs requeſted or deſired. Wherefore if you ſhall ſincerely and purely continue the bond of amitie and friendſhip with our high Court, you ſhall finde no more ſecure refuge or ſafer harbor of good wil or loue. So at length all things ſhall go wel and according to your hearts deſire in your wars with Spaine, vnder the ſhadow of our happy throne. And for as much as the King of Spaine hath by fraud and deceit got whatſoeuer he holdeth, without doubt theſe deceitfull deceiuers ſhall by the power of God in ſhort time be diſpatched and taken out of the way. In the meane time we exhort you not to loſe any opportunitie or time, but to be alwaies vigilant, and according to the conuentions betwixt vs, fauourable vnto our friends, and vnto our enemies a foe. And giue notice here to our high Court, of all the new wars which you ſhall vnderſtand of concerning the ſaid King of Spaine, for the behoofe both of your ſelfe and vs. To be briefe, your embaſſador after he had with all care and diligence diſpatched his embaſſage, and here left in his place one Edward Bardon his Deputie and Agent, now by our leaue maketh his returne towards your kingdome, being for the good and faithfull ſeruice he here did, worthy to be of you eſteemed, honored, and before others promoted: who when he hath obtained of you all thoſe his deſerued honours and preferments, let him or ſome other principal Embaſſador without delay be appointed to our Imperial Court, to continue this office of legation. This we thought good to haue you certified of vnder our moſt honorable Seale, whereunto you may giue vndoubted credence. From our Imperial palace at Conſtantinople, the 15 of this bleſſed moneth Ramazan* 1589. *September.

Yet for all theſe faire ſhewes, it may ſeeme vnto him that looketh more neere into the ſtate of the Turkiſh affaires at thoſe times, and that which hath enſued ſince, that Amurath glad of the diſcord of theſe two ſo great Chriſtian Princes, and not well aſſured of his new conqueſts in Perſia, had no great minde to the inuaſion of Spaine, as too far from the ſtrength of his Empire, an enterpriſe not to be ſo eaſily managed by ſea, as were the wars he ſhortly after vndertooke againſt the Chriſtian Emperor Rodolph by land: wherewith for all that (God be thanked) he found his hands full all the remainder of his life, as hath his ſonne Mahomet that now raigneth after him, euen vnto this day.

The Polonian Coſſacke inuade the Tartarians and Turks.

About this time alſo the Polonian borderers (whom they call Coſſackes) a rough and warlike kinde of people, after their wonted manner making an inrode vpon the Turks and Tartarians, vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed Koſlaw a port towne within a dayes journey of Caffa, where they had the ſpoile of many rich warehouſes of the Turks merchants, and the rifling of certain ſhips lying there in harbor; and hauing taken their pleaſure, burnt the reſt, and ſo with a great bootie returned to their lurking places. With which iniurie the Tartars prouoked, and ſet on by the Turks, to the number of fortie thouſand brake into Podolia and the prouinces neere vnto Polonia, and reſting in no place, but burning the countrey before them, ſlew the poore countrey people without mercie, and making hauocke of all that they light vpon, beſides the ſpoile, carried away with them many thouſands of moſt miſerable captiues: the greateſt part whereof for all that, the Polonians reſcued, with the notable ſlaughter of the enemie, ſurpriſed in their returne. Whereupon ſuch vnkindneſſe riſe betweene the Turkiſh Emperor and Sigiſmund the Polonian King, that it was thought it would haue broken out into open warres, had not the Polonian by his Embaſſadors and the mediation of the Queene of England, wiſely appeaſed the angrie Turke, and ſo againe renewed his league.

1590 The reaſons wherewith the Viſier Baſſa's perſuade Amurath to make war.

Amurath now at peace with the world, from which he by nature abhorred not, and ſitting idle and melancholy at home, was perſuaded by the Baſſa's his Counſellors, to take ſome new war in hand: for that great empires (as they ſaid) could not without the continual vſe of armes long ſtand or continue: as appeared by the Roman ſtate, which ſo long as it was at wars with Carthage, or their great Captaines and Commanders occupied in armes againſt their neighbour Princes, ſtill remained triumphant, and commanded ouer a great part of the world; but giuing it ſelfe to eaſe and pleaſure, and the martial men not after their wonted manner imployed, it in ſhort time by ciuile diſcord fell, and of the miſtreſſe of the world, became it ſelfe a prey euen vnto the baſeſt nations. Which old Cato in his great wiſdom foreſeeing, cried out in the ne Senat, That the ſouldiers and men of warre were to be kept ſtill buſied in armes far from home, for that in ſo doing, all ſhould go well with the State, and the glorie thereof increaſe. Whereunto the Othoman Emperours, his noble progenitors, hauing reſpect, propounded not peace as the end of their wars (as do other weake Princes hauing their owne forces in diſtruſt) but as inuincible conquerors, ſtill ſowed wars vpon wars, making one victorie the beginning of another: whereby they not only brought that their Empire vnto that greateſſe it was now of, but by ſuch continual imployment made their ſouldiers more couragious and readie, and alſo kept them from rebellions and tumults; whereunto in time of peace, and liuing at eaſe, theſe martial men are moſt commonly inclined, learning (as all others do) by doing nothing, to do that is euill and naught. Euery thing (as they ſaid) was by the ſame meanes to be maintained, whereby it was at the firſt increaſed; and that therefore great Empires, as they were by wars begun and augmented, ſo were they by continual wars alſo to be from time to time eſtabliſhed; whereas otherwiſe the ſouldiers liuing in peace, and forgetting their martial prowèſſe, would for moſt part grow cowardly, as giuing themſelues ouer to the loue of their owne dwellings, of their wiues, and of their children, and other pleaſures; or els conuerting their ſtudies to merchandiſe, or other profitable trades, would in time forget the vſe of armes, and be thereunto againe hardly drawne: vnto the great weakening of his ſtrength both by ſea and land, and the diminiſhing of the number of his great commanders and expert captaines, not to be had without the continuall vſe of war. With theſe and ſuch like reaſons, the great Baſſa's of the Court perſuaded Amurath, That he muſt of neceſſitie take ſome new expedition in hand, and not to ſuffer his valiant ſouldiers, but now lately returned out of Perſia, to grow lazie or inſolent for lacke of imployment. Which they did not ſo much for the loue of their Prince, or zeale vnto the State, as for their owne particular profit; eſpecially the two old Baſſa's Sinan and Ferat, the enuious competitors the one of the others honour: who although they both, much and almoſt all commanded both in peace and war, yet was their honours greater, and their profit far more, in commanding of the Turkiſh great armies abroad, than in ſitting in the Diuano at home: vnto which no leſſe honourable than profitable preferment they both with like ambition aſpired, accompanied with the hot factions of their great and many fauorits both at home and elſewhere. Theſe perſuaſions well pleaſed Amurath; who although he were himſelfe no ſouldier, yet was he deſirous of new conqueſts, and to increaſe his name: accounting it no leſſe honour vnto himſelfe, by his ſeruants at his appointment to performe great things, than it was vnto his Anceſtors to do that they did themſelues in perſon. But in this ſo ſerious a matter, and of ſo great conſequence, Amurath at the firſt could not tell what beſt to reſolue vpon; not for that he was not deſirous of wars, but becauſe as yet he certainely knew not againſt whom he might with greateſt profit and leaſt difficultie and danger conuert his forces: vpon which point his Counſellors agreed not, but for diuers reaſons were of diuers opinions. Which foraſmuch as they containe matters of greateſt importance of all things then in the world done, but eſpecially concerning the profit of the Chriſtian commonweale, I ſhall not thinke it vnworth my labour, to ſet them downe in ſuch order as I finde them credibly reported; hauing moreouer in them many letters and moſt weightie matters not yet come to all mens knowledge: as alſo opening the deuices of the Turkiſh Tyrant againſt the Chriſtian Princes; a motiue not onely for them to joyne in counſell together how to withſtand him, but for the common Chriſtian Commonweales ſake to forget and forgiue all their priuat diſpleaſures, and with their vnited forces and power honorably and courageouſly to make war vpon him, and ſo at length by the mercie of God to ouerthrow him, together with his tyrannicall Empire, the greateſt terror of our time.

The cauſes why Amurath would not ſuddenly reſolue vpon war.

Eight ſundrie opinions of the Viſier Baſſa's, concerning the war to be taken in hand.

The great Baſſa's concerning the intended war were of eight ſundry opinions: whereof the firſt was, That the wars againſt the Perſian ſhould be renewed: the ſecond, for the inuaſion of the King of Morocco and Fes: the third, for war to be taken in hand againſt the king of Spain: the fourth, for the beſieging againe of Malta: the fift was, to ſet vpon the Venetians: the ſixt, for the inuading of ſome part of Italie: the ſeuenth, for the King of Polonia: the eighth and laſt was, for war to be made vpon the Emperour and the Kingdome of Hungary. With all the which aforeſaid princes, except the Spaniard, though the Turke were then in league and could not with all any of them make warre, without the notable breach of his faith and honour: yet was that neuer made queſtion or ſcruple of, but onely, Which might beſt ſtand

A ſtand with the profit of his State for him to ſet vpon: his barbarous law allowing him that libertie, for the more aſſuring of his State, or inlarging of his empire, to breake all faith and promiſe eſpecially with the Chriſtians, not more in any thing to be pitied, than in repoſing any credit or confidence in the faith of ſuch a miſcreant.

The firſt opinion and reaſons of them that would haue the wars renewed in Perſia.

The reaſons the great Baſſaes alleadged for the renuing of the Perſian war, were, For that the Perſian King was of himſelfe like to breake the league ſo lately with him concluded, ſo ſoone as hee ſhould know the Turks entangled in any other war; moued thereunto, as well for the recouerie of his countrey, to his great diſhonour loſt, as alſo in reuenge of ſo many and ſo great iniuries to him of late done by the Turkiſh Emperours. Beſide that, the Chriſtian Princes would perſuade him and pricke him forward thereunto: eſpecially the Spaniard, who for B the neereneſſe of India might without his great charge procure him ſo to do, & alſo conueniently furniſh him with great ordnance and canoniers, which it was wel knowne he of late did. The countries alſo but lately conquered, were not yet (as they ſaid) in quietneſſe or ſafety, and the fortreſſes therein but of late built, together with the garriſons therein, to be in great danger, being for the length of the way, and difficultie of the paſſage, not to be ſtill ſpeedily relieued: inſomuch, that if the Perſians did them no other harme, but onely to forrage and waſt the countrey about them, they ſhould bring the inhabitants into ſuch diſtreſſe, as that thoſe new conquered countries were again by the defendants to be forſaken, or els they muſt themſelues with hunger periſh. True glory (they ſaid) conſiſted not ſo much in conquering, as in the vſe of C the conqueſt, and the proſecution of the happie victorie: and that therefore Amurath ſhould take heed, that hee prouoked not the wrath and indignation of the great Prophet Mahomet againſt him; who hauing by his good fauor and guide obtained mo victories than any of his predeceſſors againſt the enemies of his religion, ought as a religious & deuout prince ſeuerely to reuenge the wrong by them done both to God and man. Vnto which religious war Vsbeg Han the Tartar king, as alſo the prince of Geilan offred their ready helpe: as for the euent of the victorie, now as good as in his hand, he was to iudge by the ſucceſſe of his former wars. Neither that he need to feare the Perſian horſemen, although they vſed Arabian horſes, being by his men many times ſhamefully put to flight: or yet to doubt leſt the Georgians in fauour of the Perſians ſhould take vp armes, for that many of them were already vnder his obeiſance, and ſubiect vnto the Baſſa of Teflis and other his commanders; the reſt were his vaſſals, or els ſuch D following the fortune of their princes Simon and Alexander, ſought after no greater matter, but contenting themſelues with their owne countrey, although but ſmall, thought themſelues well if they might keepe and defend the ſame; by nature aud ſcituation ſo ſtrong, as that there is ſcarce any way vnto it, by reaſon of the high and broken mountaines, the thicke woods, and ſtrait paſſages.

The ſecond opinion, for making of war vpon the king of Fez and Morocco, & the reaſon thereof.

The ſecond opinion which was deliuered, was for the tranſportation of his wars into Affricke againſt the king of Morocco, commonly called the Seriphe: and that for theſe cauſes moſt, It would be a great ſhame and reproch (as they ſaid) vnto the Othoman empire, that it was not yet able to ſubdue theſe Moores and people of Affricke, in number but few: neither was E it leſſe ſhame or diſhonor vnto the Othoman Emperors, to haue ſo ſmall a territorie in Affrica, being the third part of the world, which by reaſon of the neereneſſe vnto Italie, had long time held wars with the Romans. Beſide that, Algiers and Tunes could neuer be ſafely kept by the Turks; neither that the ſubiects and pirats which inhabited thoſe cities would euer be content or at quiet, vntill they had againe got that kingdome into their hands. The promontorie of Aguero, and port of Larace (two ports without the ſtraits) were (as they ſaid) to be taken, as places very commodious for the Turkes friends, ſeeking in thoſe ſeas after bootie; and for the ſecuring of their trade. And although the Seriphe were himſelfe a Mahometan, and held his kingdom as a tributarie vnto the Othoman Empire; yet had he ſecret intelligence with the Spa-F niard and the Knights of Malta, whereby they not long ſince had vpon the ſudden almoſt ſurpriſed Tripolis, he in the meane time as it were winking thereat. And that although the Spaniard poſſeſſed in Affricke, Maraſchebir, Oran, Pegnon, Tanger, Arzilia, Mazaga, Ceute or Septa, places whereby he might helpe and aſſiſt the Moores; yet might his force and attempts by a ſtrong fleete bee eaſily hindered, and Spaine it ſelfe infeſted. Beſide that, the Spaiards had yet in ſuch freſh remembrance the loſſe of Tunes and Guletta (places by them thought inexpugnable, and yet by Sinan Baſſa to his immortall praiſe taken) as that they would not for the Moores sake easily seeme to attempt any great thing against the victorious Turks.

The third opinion, concerning the conquest of Malta.

The third opinion was concerning the war to be made against them of Malta, which was by a strong fleet to be performed: for that the gallies of Malta did daily great hurt, as well vnto the Turks merchants, as vnto such as for deuotion sake trauelled by sea vnto Mecha. And that therefore [illegible] was thither to be transferred, not only for religions sake and to assecure the passage thither from the incursions of the Malteses, but in reuenge of the old and late iniuries by them done; and especially to blot out the infamie and disgrace which the great Sultan Solyman had incurred, at such time as he had in vaine besieged that Island; & to requite the losse by him there sustained. Beside that, they also alleadged the common complaints of the subiects: for that there were many which pitiously lamented the misery & calamity, some of their friends, some their kinsfolke, whome they knew to liue in most wofull seruitude with those knights, and whom they most earnestly desired to haue now set at libertie: complaining his subiects to haue bin so far from suffering of any such things from those knights in the time of his ancestors, as that contrariwise they themselues were by them driuen out of the Island of the Rhodes, the strongest bulwarke of the Christian common-weale toward the East. Being moreouer worthy also to be chastised, for that they had holpen the rebellious Moores with all kind of munition, and had themselues attempted to haue surprised Modon.

The fourth opinion, for war to be made against the K. of Spain, & the reasons thereof.

In the fourth place were they which were of opinion, that it were best for him to make war vpon the king of Spaine. These men alledged it to be impossible for the Turkish empire to aspire vnto the Monarchie of the whole world (whereunto al the Turks actions & deuises were alwaies as at a certain marke directed) except the Spaniard his great strength and power were first weakened, wherein he seemed to surpasse all other the Christians kings and princes: and that there was no feare lest he should besiege Algiers, which he knew to be now much better fortified than it was in the time of the Emperor Charles the fifth. And that although the Spaniards without ceasing besought their king for the vndertaking of that expedition, by reason of the new losses & harms which they daily rece[illegible]om the pyrats of Africa; yet would he not hearken vnto their request, for feare of the dan[illegible]mminent both to himselfe & his subiects from the enemies fleet, which he should in so [illegible]ng draw into the Spanish seas: neither would the Spanish gallies easily come into the Tur[illegible]untries in the East, for being too farre from their own country, which for the most part stoo[illegible] in need of their help. And that the king of Spain was with the multitude of his businesse, or o[illegible]ner his vrgent affaires stil so hindred, as that he could not suddenly put in execution what his counsell for the wars should decree. As also how much it was to be gathered by that which hapned not long since at Preueza and Nauarinum, That the Spaniards shunned the Othoman forces: as also how warily the king delt in al his affaires, lest at length against his will hee should be enforced to enter into wars with the Turke, was most manifest; as was to be seene when as of late about the end of the Persian war, he refused to giue aid vnto the Persian king whome he might haue holpen, and was so before wont to do. And in case that he would stand vpon his guard, and by force seek to repell force; yet should he scarce haue so much strength as (beside those wars which he now maketh in diuers places) to be able to vndertake also a new war, and to find so many soldiers, with so much coine and other things necessarie for so great a war. It stood him in hand (as they said) to defend the Low-countries, and to recouer againe the Prouinces there lost, which of themselues wonderful strong, both by reason of the sea & the multitude of the riuers, were also with wonderful courage and pertinacy defended by the inhabitants, for their liberty and religions sake. Whereunto the English (at deadly hatred with the Spaniard) might many waies giue great help, if they should inuade Portingall, or with their ships lie in wait for his Indian fleet, or make incursions into other his kingdomes, as they did not long since at the Groine and Cadez; places most fit to trouble Spaine, and to hinder his traffique into the Indies or other places. Beside that, hee was at that time so intangled with his warres in France, as that he could scarce finde how to dispatch himselfe therof, without the losse of his honor & credit. And admit he should make peace with the aforesaid Princes, in such sort as that he should not from thenceforth from them receiue any harme; yet were other meanes to be sought & taken in hand for his further disturbance, as by troubling his rich trade for spices & other merchandise, wherof he [illegible]peth great profit; as also if need were, by driuing his ships out of the Persian gulfe, by the [illegible] of those gallies which still lie at rode at Possidium, which we now call Suez. And that the fortresses and strong holds he there possesseth, were to be set vpon, & if it might be, taken from him; as was once attempted against the Portingals at Diu and Ormuz: the like whereof Alphonsus Albuquercius (the king of Portingall his Viceroy in Iudia) attempted, when as with his light horsemen running through that countrie, he thought vpon a sudden to haue spoiled Mecha, and to haue robbed the Sepulchre of Mahomet (as had hapned vnder the Empire of the Sultans) and as Traian the Emperor had long since in like maner attempted to rage and spoyle. Those places which he possessed in Affricke were (as they said) to be set vpon, and the coast of Spaine towards the Mediterranean to be infested: so at length to gratifie the Moores his subiects, who still instantly requested the same, that so they might more safely traffique and trauel, and that so the Moores might at length be deliuered from the imperious command of the Spaniards: of which exploit Sultan Selymus lately before dead, was in his life time well perswaded; but might now at this time be much more commodiously done, for that the Mooriſh nation was now greatly increased, and much oppressed by the Spaniards; and hauing got great wealth by the trade of Merchandise, euen by nature or religion had conceiued a mortall hatred against the Spaniards: whereunto might not a little auaile the ports in Affricke, whorinto the Turks fleet might at all times in safety retire. And in briefe, that which was of greatest importance to the better successe of this war, the French King and the Queene of England, had of their own accord promised the continuation of their wars, and that the French king should inuade Nauarre, and by force of armes recouer the right he pretended vnto that kingdome; whilest in the meane time the Queene of England should not onely trouble him in the West Indies, and other places of the Ocean toward the North and West, but might also stir vp new broiles in the kingdome of Portingall, where most part of the people with great impatiencie beare the proud command of the Spaniard: as perswaded (and that truly) all their prosperitie and quietnesse to haue bin lost, together with their last king their true and lawfull soueraigne. For he at peace with the kings of France and England, exceedingly therby enriched his subiects by traffique: whereas since they fell into the hands of the Spaniard, they dayly complaine of their new losses and dangers by reason of his perpetual warres. Moreouer, that there was to be found great store of exiled Spaniards dispersed here and there, which being malecontent and wearie of the Spanish gouernment, were fled not only out of Portingall, but euen out of Aragon and other parts of his kingdome: which now liuing in France, England, and Constantinople, both secretly and openly liberally offered great helps: the like whereof many of the Moores also promised. All which together seemed to promise a most easie expedition and certaine victorie, if any should vpon the sudden inuade Spaine; for that there was almost no vse of armes, the inhabitants at home seldome times exercising themselues therein: neither in places needful hauing any ordinarie garrisons, and but few horses fit for seruice. And that in fine it was to be considered, Spaine to be greatly bared of men which knew how valiantly and couragiously to mannage armes, for the often choice they make of them, which almost most daily transported into the Indies, Italy, and the Low-countries, wherby the strength of his countrie must needs be exceedingly empaired: so that if they should be inuaded with any strong and mighty army, they might seeme hardly able to be holpen or defended by their own people, but should need of the aid and help of the other neere prouinces subiect vnto this kingdome: which if they should be either letted, or stay to come in good time, they should leaue so much the more easie victorie vnto their enemies.

The fift opinion for the inuasion of the Venetians, and the reasons why.

In the fift place were they which went about to persuade Amurath to breake his league with the Venetians; vsing reasons rather probable than true, although they might seeme vnto the Turks lesse doubtful, for that men easily and willingly beleeue such things as they themselues desire. These men went about to proue no expedition to be lesse difficult than this, as iudging of things present, by the euent of former wars passed; wherein the Turks had alwaies taken something from the Venetians: who to redeeme their peace, were diuers waies enforced to satisfie the Turks. That the Venetian common-weale was afraid of the Turks, and abhorred war, was manifest (they said) in that, that in all actions it had propounded vnto it selfe peace, as the end thereof, and after the manner of their ancestors, neuer entered into wars, but enforced thereunto: and would happily vpon the first denouncing of warres, willingly depart with certain places, for feare of greater harme, or to be vtterly ouercome, as it appeared they did in the yeelding eelding vp of Cyprus. The power and force whereof was not so great, as that it could alone G stand against the great Sultan: and to confederate it selfe with others, would require no small delay, for the great and many difficulties which commonly vsed to arise in making of leagues;

not being now so conioyned with the Spaniard as in times past, of whose aid in being of late destitute, v[illegible]ttrained to make an hard peace with Selymus. And if so be the Spaniard would nee[illegible]oyne himselfe vnto the Venetians against the Turkes, yet that he could by no means affoord vnto them such aid & supplies as were of necessity to be required vnto so great a war, he himselfe being in his wars otherwise so intangled: as for al other confederation they could make without him, to be but weake and to no purpose. That which the Pope could do herein, to be but little: for albeit he should according to his duty exhort other Christian Princes to giue aid, & to stir them vp vnto this war, yet that beside some little supply of mony hard H ly drawne out of his own coffers and the Ecclesiasticall reuenues; he could scarcely performe any thing more; or when he had done his vttermost deuoire, could but ioyn fiue gallies of his owne vnto the Venetian fleet: which with the gallies of the Duke of Sauoy, of the knights of Malta, and of the Florentines, could but make a fleet of some twentie gallies, which was but a small matter. Besides that, the Turks were persuaded, that betwixt the Venetian State and the other Christian Princes was no such friendship and good agreement, as the greatnesse of the imminent danger of that war, and as the necessitie of the cause would require: and that hitherto their treasures had bin so exhausted in paying the debt they were run into in the last war, and in building of fortresses, that happily they were not now so furnished with coine, as was re-

The sixt opinion, for the attempting of Italie, and the reasons thereof.

Othersome of the Bassaes in the sixth place, reiecting all the former opinions concerning the war to be taken in hand, would haue had all th[illegible]ces of the Othoman empire, as well by land as sea, to haue beene conuerted against Italie: f[illegible]hat otherwise the Turkes should neuer come vnto the Monarchie of the whole world (whe[illegible]nto as at a marke they had directed all their actions) except they did first subdue Italie. F[illegible]hat this Countrie, as the centre of the whole world, was wont to giue both counsell and a[illegible]nto the rest of the limbes, whereby the deuices of others were crossed: and that the Romar[illegible]ad at length commanded ouer all the K world, especially for that they held in possession this country. Hereat did the Hunnes, the Alani and Gothes, the Vandales, the Frenchmen, Spaniards, and Sarasins, direct all their thoughts and cogitations. In fine they concluded, That no expedition could be taken in hand more honourable or profitable than this: for that Italie was a Queene amongst other Prouinces, for commodious scituation, the wholesomnesse of the aire, the plentie of all things necessarie for mans life, for great, faire, and most rich cities, for the antient glory and maiestie of the Romane Empire, and many other causes also. Neither that this expedition was to be deemed of much difficultie, for that Italie was vnder the rule of diuers Princes, vnto whose command most of their subiects vnwillingly obeyed: as also for that the inhabitants of that countrie had now for many yeares liued in continuall peace, and were therfore the more effeminat and fearefull, L and so vnfit for the wars: and that if that expedition were in one or diuers places taken in hand before the corne were full ripe, the Turks in that so fruitfull a countrie could neuer want necessaries for them to liue vpon; wheras the inhabitants in great number wanting the same, and shut vp within the wals and fortifications of their cities and strong towns, should be brought into extreame wants: which was the more euidently to be seene, for that at this time wherein they were at peace, they had not corne sufficient in the countrie for such a multitude of people to liue vpon, but were glad to haue it brought vnto them from other places, especially from Peloponesus, Constantinople, and the cities vpon the coast of the great Ocean. Furthermore, that it was to be considered, that most part of the Italians liued by no other meanes than by their handie labour, or the trade of merchandise; of which meanes if they were depriued, M they should in short time[illegible]brought to that point, as[illegible]glad to accept of such conditions the victor should propo[illegible]vnto them, or as tributari[illegible]o submit themselues vnto the Otho- man gouernment. Nei[illegible]r that the souldiers would vnwillingly be drawne vnto that war; for that they were not to [illegible]e through barren regions of the enemie, frozen with yce, or desolat,

A either by rough woods or inaccessible mountaines; but were all the way thither to trauell through their owne countrie, and as it were in the sight of their owne houses: and if the Turks could oftentimes enter so far, when as they had their confines more remote, and their passages more difficult, that the same might now much more easily be effected, when as they had a farre greater opportunitie, and their enemies so neere at hand.

The seuenth opinion for war to be made against the Polonian, and the reasons thereof.

The seuenth opinion was theirs, which thought it best to haue the war transferred into Po-lonia, and from thence into Hungarie and Germanie: for which they alleadged these reasons: First, for that they thought it a disgrace vnto the maiestie and reputation of the Othoman Empire, That the king of Polonia had sometime refused to pay his tribute due (for so the Turkes account of al such Presents as are vnto their Sultan vsually sent by their neighbor princes; of B courtesie) & that therefore he was by force of armes to be compelled thereunto. Which they thought would the more easily be obtained, for that there was much secret hatred and heart-burning amongst the Polonian nobilitie. Neither that it would be any difficult or dangerous war to be taken in hand: forasmuch as Polonia was confined with Moldauia, the Tartars, and the Sanzacks of Acherman, Bendera, and Vosia: and moreouer, for that the Turks could neuer haue any assured or full possession of Moldauia or Valachia, except the insolencie of the Polonians were represt; the Vayuods of which countries, when they had enriched themselues with much wealth, vsed still to flie into the kingdome of Polonia. Besides that, they should thereby reuenge themselues for the iniuries done them by the Cossackes, and haue more free and safe trafficke into Muscouie, and bring a terrour vpon the Duke of Muscouie, by reason C of the nighnesse of the country: which great Duke was an impediment vnto the Othoman Em-perour, that he conquered not the whole kingdome of Persia. And when they had by this means by little and little drawne vnto Germany, happily it might so come to passe, as that the Christian Emperor should thereby receiue some notable losse, his empire being stil more and more exposed and enuironed with the Turks forces and garrisons. Polonia they said to be a plaine and open country, neither to haue any strong places for to withstand them, and the inhabitants to haue small skil in martiall affaires, for that they had now long liued in peace. For as for the war that they had with Maximilian the Archduke of Austria, it continued not long: and king Stephen in the late wars he had with the Muscouite, vsed for most part the Hungarian souldiers, and ended those wars rather by besieging than fighting.

The eighth opinion for war to be made against the Emperour, and the reasons thereof.

D They which in the eight & last place deliuered their opinions concerning the intented war, perswaded to haue it conuerted vpon the Christian Emperor; whom the Turks call the king of Vienna. The causes they alleadged for the beginning of this war was, For that the Vscocchi were grown so insolent as to make good prise of the Turks both by sea and land; in such sort, as that not onely for the harmes which they did, but euen for the maiestie and honour of the Othoman empire, their insolencie was not longer to be suffered. By whose iniuries it was especially brought to passe, that the merchants to their great hinderance in priuat, & the Sultans great losse in common, hauing left the towne of Narenta or Narona in the Turks dominion, had remoued their mart to Salona (now called Spalato) a town of the Venetians: & that yet for all that was not so sufficiently prouided for the security of the said merchants, although there E were peace betwixt the Emperour and the Venetians: for that these vnruly men for most part liuing vpon the spoile, troubled all both by sea and land with their robberies, driuing away mens cattell, burning the villages, and taking away the young babes out of the mothers armes and laps. Whereby it was easily to be seene, what mind they were of: and that it was not to be doubted, but that if occasion should serue for them to surprise any of the Turks strong holds vpon the frontiers, they would with all their power attempt the same: which what a dishonor and infamie (not to speake of the losse) it would be vnto the whole Othoman empire, euery man might easily ghesse. Neither that it was vnknown, how little the Christian Emperor had esteemed of the Turke, at such time as he was in warre with the Persian, paying his tribute too late at his pleasure; an euident signe rather of violating than of establishing the league. And that F the good successe of this warre was not to be deemed either difficult or doubtfull: for that the attempt might be giuen both by Croatia, Hungarie, & Austria, countries abounding with all things necessarie for the maintenance of a great armie; as also for that they were almost to trauell all the way in the Turks owne territorie. Beside that, the chiefe fortresses of Hungarie, namely Belgrade, Buda, and Alba Regalis, with many other strong places, were already holden

eelding vp of Cyprus. The power and force whereof was not so great, as that it could alone G
.tand against the great Sultan: and to confederate it selfe with others, would require no small delay, for the great and many difficulties which commonly vsed to arise in making of leagues;
not being now so conioyned with the Spaniard as in times past, of whose aid in being of late destitute, [illegible] trained to make an hard peace with Selymus. And if to be the Spaniard would nee[illegible]yne himselfe vnto the Venetians against the Turkes, yet that he could by no means affoord vnto them such aid & supplies as were of necessity to be required vnto so great a war, he himselfe being in his wars otherwise so intangled: as for al other confederation they could make without him, to be but weake and to no purpose. That which the Pope could do herein: to be but little: for albeit he should according to his duty exhort other Christian Princes to giue aid, & to stir them vp vnto this war, yet that beside some little supply of mony hard H ly drawne out of his own coffers and the Ecclesiasticall reuenues; he could scarcely performe
any thing more; or when he had done his vttermost deuoire; could but ioyn fiue gallies of his owne vnto the Venetian fleet: which with the gallies of the Duke of Sauoy, of the knights of Malta, and of the Florentines, could but make a fleet of some twentie gallies, which was but a small matter. Besides that, the Turks were perswaded, that betwixt the Venetian State and the other Christian Princes was no such friendship and good agreement, as the greatnesse of the imminent danger of that war, and as the necessitie or the cause would require: and that hitherto their treasures had bin so exhausted in paying the debt they were run into in the last war, and

F the good successe of this warre was not to be deemed either difficult or doubtfull: for that
the attempt might be giuen both by Croatia, Hungarie, & Austria, countries abounding with all things necessarie for the maintenance of a great armie; as also for that they were almost to trauell all the way in the Turks owne territorie. Beside that, the chiefe fortresses of Hungarie, namely Belgrade, Buda, and Alba Regalis, with many other strong places, were alreadie hol-

den by the Turks garrisons, whither their armies might in all cases of extremitie in safetie re- G tire: or out of the same garrisons repaire their losses, if any should be. The Roman Empire (as the same) was more dishonors of peace than warre; and the princes, of nothing more carefull, than how to heape vp and preserue their treasures: and the people of Germanie for that of long they had had no warres, to be lesse fit now to beare armes, and worse to be commanded by their captaines, alwaies hauing in distrust the Hungarians, the Italians, and Spaniards, for that those nations are not reioyced, but rather hated of the Germans, being not at vnity among themselues, but diuided, especially about matters of religion. Neither that it was to be feared, lest forraine Princes should giue aid vnto the Emperour in this warre: The Polonian and Transyluanian to liue now in peace with the Turke, and therefore would by no meanes turne the heat of this warre into their owne bosomes: as also for that the Polonians were afraid, lest in so doing, they H should be driuen out of their countrie, and enforced to remoue themselues toward the frozen sea: and the Transyluanian hauing receiued his soueraignetie from the Turke, no lesse in feare of the same, if he should so do, to be of him again stript and spoiled of the same: as for the king of Spaine, although he were of such power, as might afford vnto the house of Austria great aid, yet that he was in other places now too much buried: and that the Bishop of Rome could not in all places be readie to serue his turne: the Princes of Italie would not spend their subiects and treasures to pleasure another man: and that the Venetian State would not rashly stir vp the Turks armes against themselues, but rather at ease expect the euent of the warre, than to entangle themselues with other mens dangers. These were the chiefe opinions of the great Bassaes concerning the warre to be taken in hand, not so much proceeding from any ripe or sound aduice (as I commonly they do) but rather from a certaine barbarous insolencie and contempt of others, wherewith they moued, doe oftentimes vainly perswade them of the easie performance of diuers expeditions: which in proofe they finde to be not onely most difficult, but vnto themselues also most pernicious.

In this so great diuersitie of opinions stood Amurath, of long in doubt what to resolue vpon: desirous he was all places to shew his power, and (if it were possible) to exceed the glorie of his predecessors, as he thought himselfe to haue already done in Persia; hauing as he boasted, by his seruants there performed more than they would themselues in person with their mightie armies. Wherfore contenting himselfe with that he had already done in the East, he resolued now to turne his forces against the Christian Emperor towards the West, & that for K diuers respects. First, it grieued him to see the honour of the house of Austria, and that it durst so make head against him: besides that, to make war vpon a country confining vpon his owne, would be a thing of far lesse difficultie than was the Persian warre, where his armies were now still to be led through his owne peaceable countries, from whence they were to be at all times plentifully relieued with victuals and whatsoeuer else they needed. In which opinion he was also confirmed by Sinan Bassa, who hauing in vaine perswaded him to haue made warre against the Venetians, furthered now this warre; in hope thereby to recouer his credit and reputation before greatly impaired abroad by the little he did in Persia; as also at Constantinople by the discord betwixt him and Ferat Bassa, commonly called the Black Serpent: as also to encrease his wealth and riches: which shortly after sorted to his desire, being by the great Sultan L Amurath appointed Generall for those wars. But aboue all others, Hassan Bassa of Bosna furthered this matter, in hope thereby to haue gained great riches (as the Turkes manner is) together with the greatest honours of the field, as he was most vainly perswaded by his cold Propheets, to whom he gaue no small credit. He therefore daily certified Amurath of the harmes which the Vscoechi and other the Archduke his seruants & subiects did vpon the frontiers of his territories: telling him of their burnings, spoilings, and robbings, inciting him to begin his warre in Croatia, and so to continue the same either against the Emperour, or the Venetians, or els vpon the sudden that way to breake into Italie, as had sometime the like beene done in the time of Mahomet, Baiazet, and Solyman his noble progenitors: whereby to bring a great terror vpon all the Princes of Italie, and to enrich his souldiers with rich spoiles. By which his im- M portunitie he (as a most mortall enemy not onely vnto the house of Austria, but vnto all Christendome) got leaue to begin those stirs in the frontiers of the Empire, which were first fatal vnto himselfe, and haue euer since euen vntill this day notably exercised the armes of these two last Othoman Emperours Amurath and Mahomet; as also the Christian Emperour, with others

Amurath resolueth to make warre vpon the Emperour, with the reasons mouing him thereunto.

A others his friends and confederates. Yet vnto this leaue granted vnto the Bassa, was this condition at the first annexed, That he should not seeme to do it by the commandement of Amurath, but of himselfe, vnder colour to restraine the Vscochi; who as well by land as by sea (as he pretended) spoiled both the Christians and Turks, by the great libertie of the Princes of Austria, hauing small care to chasten them.

Now was it no great matter for Hassan Bassa to do what Amurath his great Lord and master had commanded, for the disturbing of the peace betwixt him and the Christian Emperor: the Turks leagues with their neighbour Princes being seldome so religiously kept, but that as wel their souldiers in garrison vpon their frontiers by land, as their aduenturers by sea, might to keepe themselues doing, vpon a militarie insolencie (as the Turks terme it) now and then at
B their pleasures make incursions for bootie both by sea and land: which answered with the like from their neighbors so molested, there neuer wanted new grieuances and iust causes of complaint, to the stirring vp of greater troubles euen amongst the greatest Princes. The Venetians thus wronged at sea, and their merchants robbed; by their Embassadors complained at Constantinople, of the iniuries done them by the Turkes pyrats, requiring to haue them called home and iustice done vpon them. In like manner the Emperor also, seeing many things both this yeare and the next attempted by Hassan Bassa in Croatia, and the other Turks in Hungarie, contrarie to the league, to the great disturbance of his subiects in both those countries, by his Embassador then lying at Constantinople complained of these outrages, desiring to know whether they were done by the consent and knowledge of Amurath or not; and if not, then to
C require that order might be taken for the restraining thereof: which was accordingly done, and those incursions for a while stayed, and the former peace continued. Amurath still making shew as if he were willing that the league agreed vpon for eight yeares, should not be in any wise on his part infringed. At which time the Persian Kings sonne (the league not long before concluded) died in the Turks Court, where he lay in hostage: whose dead bodie Amurath caused to be honourably sent home to his father into Persia, with an apologie in defence of himselfe, against the suspicion conceiued by some, That he should haue been the cause of the vntimely death of that young Prince; still vrging withall the confirmation of the league, which by the death of the Prince was like enough to haue beene broken. According to these designements, the Bassa of Bosna by the commandment of Amurath, with an armie of fiftie thousand entred into Croatia, and without resistance burnt and destroyed the country before him, sparing nothing that came in his way. And not so contented, laid E siege to the citie of Wihitz, being the metropolitical citie of that countrey, strongly situate as it were in an Iland, compassed about with the riuer Vna. Which citie, after he had sore battered and twice assaulted, was by the distressed defendants (now despairing of reliefe, and vnable longer to hold it out) yeelded vnto the Bassa, vpon composition, That the German souldiers there in garrison, might in safetie with bag and baggage depart; and that such of the Christian citizens as would, might there still remaine without hurt from the Turks, either in bodie or goods. Which conditions the Bassa faithfully performed to the garrison souldiers, whom in number but foure hundred, he sent with safe conuoy into their owne territorie: but afterwards contrarie to his faith and promise, exercised all manner of Turkish tyrannie vpon the poore citizens. The Emperour troubled with this vnexpected inuasion of the Turks, sent the Lord Petzen (whom he had many times employed in embassages to the Turke) to pray aid F of the German Princes against the common Enemie. Who according to the greatnesse of the danger, in large termes promised their helpe. The first that made head was Ernestus Archduke of Austria the Emperours brother, who with fiue thousand souldiers came from Vienna to Stiria, commonly called Greis, the Metropolis of Stiria: to whom repaired daily more strength out of Carinthia.

or out of the same garrisons repaire their losses, if any should be. The Roman Empire (as they said) was more desirous of peace than war; and the princes, of nothing more carefull, than how to heape vp and preserue their treasures: and the people of Germanie for that of long they had had wars, to be lesse fit now to beare armes, and worse to be commanded by their captaines; alwaies hauing in distrust the Hungarians, the Italians, and Spaniards, for that those nations are not beloued, but rather hated of the Germans, being not at vnity among themselues, but diuided, especially about matters of religion. Neither that it was to be feared, lest forraine Princes should giue aid vnto the Emperour in this warre: The Polonian and Transyluanian to liue now in peace with the Turke, and therefore would by no meanes turne the heat of this war into their owne bosomes: as also for that the Polonians were afraid, lest in so doing, they H should be driuen out of their countrie, and enforced to remoue themselues toward the frozen sea: and the Transyluanian hauing receiued his soueraigntie from the Turke, no lesse in feare (if he should so do) to be of him again stript and spoiled of the same: as for the king of Spaine, although he were of such power, as might afford vnto the house of Austria great aid, yet that he was in other places now too much busied: and that the Bishop of Rome could not in all places be readie to serue his turne: the Princes of Italie would not spend their subiects and treasures to pleasure another man: and that the Venetian State would not rashly stir vp the Turks armes against themselues, but rather at ease expect the euent of the war, than to entangle themselues with other mens dangers. These were the chiefe opinions of the great Bassaes concerning the war to be taken in hand, not so much proceeding from any ripe or sound aduice (as I commonly they do) but rather from a certaine barbarous insolencie and contempt of others; wherewith they moued, doe oftentimes vainly perswade them of the easie performance of diuers expeditions: which in proofe they finde to be not onely most difficult, but vnto themselues also most pernicious.

Amurath resolueth to make war vpon the Emperor, with the reasons moouing him thereunto.

In this so great diuersitie of opinions stood Amurath, of long in doubt what to resolue vpon: desirous he was in all places to shew his power, and (if it were possible) to exceed the glorie of his predecessors, as he thought himselfe to haue already done in Persia; hauing as he boasted, by his seruants there performed more than the[y] would themselues in person with their mightie armies. Wherfore contenting himselfe with [what] he had already done in the East, he resolued now to turne his forces against the Christian Emperor towards the West, & that for K diuers respects. First, it grieued him to see the hon[our] of the house of Austria, and that it durst to make head against him: besides that, to make war vpon a country confining vpon his owne, would be a thing of far lesse difficultie than was the Persian war, where his armies were now still to be led through his owne peaceable countries, from whence they were to be at all times plentifully relieued with victuals and whatsoeuer else they needed. In which opinion he was also confirmed by Sinan Bassa, who hauing in vaine perswaded him to haue made warre against the Venetians, furthered now this war; in hope thereby to recouer his credit and reputation (before greatly impaired abroad by the little he did in Persia; as also at Constantinople by the discord betwixt him and Ferat Bassa, commonly called the Black Serpent) as also to encrease his wealth and riches: which shortly after sorted to his desire, being by the great Sultan L Amurath appointed Generall for those wars. But aboue all others, Hassan Bassa of Bosna furthered this matter, in hope thereby to haue gained great riches (as the Turkes manner is) together with the greatest honours of the field, as he was most vainly perswaded by his cold Prophers, to whom he gaue no small credit. He therefore daily certified Amurath of the harmes which the Vscocchi and other the Archduke his seruants & subiects did vpon the frontiers of his territories: telling him of their burnings, spoilings, and robbings, inciting him to begin his war in Croatia, and so to continue the same either against the Emperour, or the Venetians, or els vpon the sudden that way to breake into Italie, as had sometime the like beene done in the time of Mahomet, Baiazet, and Solyman his noble progenitors: whereby to bring a great terror vpon all the Princes of Italie, and to enrich his souldiers with rich spoiles. By which his im- M portunitie he (as a most m[ortall] enemy not onely vnto the house of Austria, but vnto all Christendome) got leaue to b[egin] those stirs in the frontiers of the Empire, which were first fatal vnto himselfe, and haue euer [since] euen vntill this day notably exercised the armes of their two last Othoman Emperours Amurath and Mahomet; as also the Christian Emperour, with others

A others his friends and confederates. Yet vnto this leaue granted vnto the Bassa, was this condition at the first annexed, That he should not seeme to do it by the commandement of Amurath, but of himselfe, vnder colour to restraine the Vscocchi; who as well by land as by sea (as he pretended) spoiled both the Christians and Turks, by the great libertie of the Princes of Austria, hauing small care to chasten them.

Now was it no great matter for Hassan Bassa to do what Amurath his great Lord and master had commanded, for the disturbing of the peace betwixt him and the Christian Emperor: the Turks leagues with their neighbour Princes being seldome so religiously kept, but that as wel their souldiers in garrison vpon their frontiers by land, as their aduenturers by sea, might to keepe themselues doing, vpon a militarie insolencie (as the Turks terme it) now and then at
thus wronged at sea, and their merchants robbed; by their Embassadors complained at Constantinople, of the iniuries done them by the Turkes pyrats, requiring to haue them called home and iustice done vpon them. In like manner the Emperor also, seeing many things both this yeare and the next attempted by Hassan Bassa in Croatia, and the other Turks in Hungarie, contrarie to the league, to the great disturbance of his subiects in both those countries, by his Embassador then lying at Constantinople complained of these outrages, desiring to know whether they were done by the consent and knowledge of Amurath or not; and if not, then to
C require that order might be taken for the restraining thereof: which was accordingly done, and those incursions for a while stayed, and the former peace continued. Amurath still making shew as if he were willing that the league agreed vpon for eight yeares, should not be in any wise on his part infringed. At which time the Persian Kings sonne (the league not long before concluded) died in the Turks Court, where he lay in hostage: whose dead bodie Amurath caused to be honourably sent home to his father into Persia, with an apologie in defence of himselfe, against the suspicion conceiued by some, That he should haue been the cause of the vntimely death of that young Prince; still vrging withall the confirmation of the league, which by the death of the Prince was like enough to haue beene broken. The Christians ouerthrowne.

In the meane time the Turks armie daily increasing in Croatia, inclosed six thousand foot- G men and fiue hundred horsemen of the Christians; who had taken the mountaines, woods, and streict passages, and so hardly beset them, that of all that number few escaped with life: among whom many valiant souldiers and expert captaines were slaine; namely Iames Prantz, George Plesh and Iohn Welnerdurff. The Bassa after the barbarous manner of the Turks, to make his victorie seeme more famous, laded six waggons with the heads of the slaine Christians. The Turks thus raging in Croatia, brought a general feare vpon all Hungarie, Bauaria, Bohemia, Stiria, Carinthia, Silesia, and the rest of the Prouinces thereabouts. Whereupon the Emperor calling together the States of Silesia and Moldauia, declared vnto them the imminent danger; persuading them to ioine their forces with the rest, for the repulsing of so dangerous an enemie, and so imminent a danger.

After long delay, Ernestus the Archduke the tenth of August came to the Emperor his bro- H ther, with the Embassadors of Hungarie; and the seuenth day after were called together the Embassadors of the kingdomes and prouinces of the Empire: where it was throughly debated, how the Turks were to be resisted, and their attempts infringed; as also from whence forces, money, and other warrelike prouision was to be raised. For now it was manifestly seene, that longer to delay the matter was dangerous: and the rather, for that the Beglerbeg or great Commander of Grecia, with threescore thousand select souldiers both horse and foot, of long time exercised in the Persian war, was ere long expected; who joyning with the rest of the Turks armie, might do great matters both in Hungary and the places adjoyning. For preuen- I ting of which so great and manifest dangers, they sate dayly in counsell in Prague, yea oftentimes euen from morning vntill night: for the Hungarians, and especially the Lord Nadasti a most noble and valiant gentleman amongst them, instantly vrged to haue succours sent into Hungarie; forasmuch as the Turkish Emperour, if he should get into his hands the rest of the townes and castles yet holden by the Christians in Hungarie, it was to be feared lest he should in short time after endanger the whole state of Germanie: the strength whereof the Turke feared not so much, as he did those poore reliques of Hungarie. Others were no lesse careful of the dangers of Croatia and Stiria, as more proper to themselues, the enemy now there raging.
In these so great dangers, the Hungarians with the rest of the distressed, cried vpon the Emperour for helpe; and he likewise called vpon the Princes of the Empire. Diuers assemblies were made in Bohemia, Hungarie, Morauia Silesia, and the other prouinces of the Empe- K rors, and Embassadors sent from almost all the German Princes to the Emperour: all was full of consultation, but as for helpe that came in very slowly; yet such as was to be had, was forthwith sent into Croatia, to defend the fortresses there against the further attempts & proceedings of the furious enemie.

Certaine vaine attempts of the Turks.

The eighteenth of September, the Turkes with all warlike prouision vpon the sudden by night assaulted the strong castle of Tocxay in the vpper Hungarie, in hope to haue surprised it: but finding it a matter of more difficultie than they had before imagined, they departed thence, and attempted the lesser Comara, which standing in a marish ground, was also easily defended. At which time also the Bassa of Buda with his power entred into the frontiers of the Christians, but hauing well viewed the cities, townes, castles, and forts vpon those borders, L and finding nothing for his purpose, he without any thing doing returned againe to Buda.

The six and twentieth day of September, Hassan the Bassa of Bosna incamped with his Armie betwixt the riuers of Kulp and Sauus, and in the darkenesse of the night passing ouer part of his armie into Turopolis, with fire and sword most miserably spoiled all that pleasant and fertile Island; the lord of Bonny, to whom the keeping thereof was committed, labouring in vaine to defend the same.

Turopolis spoyled by the Turks.

About the end of this moneth, the Bassa of Ziget, with the Sanzackes of Mohas, Koppan, and Quinque Ecclesiæ, and other Turkes of great name, came with a strong Armie, and encamped betweene Ziget and Rodesto. And shortly after newes was brought to the Emperours Court, that Kanysia a Citie of Stiria (not farre from the riuer Zala) was hardly besie- M ged by the enemie, and that the Turks in comming thither had taken many Christians Cap-tiues, whom they had sent to be sould at Constantinople: and that there was in the Turkes armie about an hundred and sixtie thousand men. But forasmuch as the Christian army daily increased also, and was now growne to the number of threescore thousand, men began to hope well,

A well, that the enemies rage would be stayed from any further proceeding. About the same time, Ernestus the Archduke appointed General of the armie, with the Marquis (son to Ferdinand the Archduke) his lieutenant, came both vnto the armie.

In these preparations, about the beginning of October heauie newes was brought vnto the Emperors court, how that 7000 men, whom he but a little before had sent into Croatia vnder the conduct of Thomas Artelius Beane, George Gleichspacher, and Dionysius Denke, to hinder the course of the Turks proceedings, being incamped betwixt Wihitz and Carolstat; and hauing the twelfth of September discouered from an high hill certaine companies of the Turkes (which were indeed of purpose come thither to view the armie of the Christians) sent out fiftie horsemen to discouer the Turks armie where it lay, and what it attempted. Who finding no B moe of the Turks than those whome they had before seene from the mountaine; returned againe vnto the armie with such simple intelligence: whereunto the Christians giuing credit, became secure in their tents, as men out of feare of the enemie, and so kept but negligent watch. But in this so great securitie, the enemie on a sudden came vpon them, and with an hundred thousand men brake into their trenches: where the Christian footmen for all that, for the space of foure houres maintained a notable fight, wherein many were on both sides slaine.
But the poore Christians being beset round, and oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, were slaine almost all: yet the Captaines seeing the danger, by speedie flight saued their liues: for which their cowardise and careless negligence, they were afterwards apprehended and beheaded. Almost all the common souldiers were there slaine: yea such as fell aliue into C the hand of the enemie, were most cruelly cut in pieces. The spoile also of the tents of the Christians fell vnto the enemie; wherein beside the aboundance of other things, they found sixtie thousand dollars, brought but two dayes before from Lintz for the souldiers pay. The Turks after their barbarous manner, in ostentation of their victorie, laded fourteene waggons with the heads of the slain Christians, which they sent vnto diuers of their places thereabours.
This was indeed a great victorie, but gained by the Turks with much bloud: for the Christians fighting as men desperate, slew of their enemies aboue twelue thousand, and died themselues as men rather with number oppressed, than with true valour vanquished.

The castle of S. George surprised by the Turks.

The night following, the Turks vpon the sudden in the dead time of the night surprised the castle of S. George, and without respect of age or sex, cruelly put to the sword all them that D were therein, except an hundred and fortie persons, whom they carried away captiues; and so setting the castle on fire, departed. At the same time diuers companies of the Turkes were seene about Siseg, who led away with them about six hundred Christians into most miserable captiuitie. And that nothing might be wanting vnto the calamities of this so miserable a wasted countrey, three hundred waggons charged with all manner of prouision sent out of the prouinces there by for the relefe of the garrison soldiers in Croatia, were all intercepted by the Turks, and so carried away.

The Emperour prayeth aid against the German Princes.

The Emperor considering these proceedings of the Turks, and that their strength daily increased, gaue notice by writing, to all the Princes and States of the Empire, what incursions E the Turks had of late made into Croatia and the frontiers of Hungary, with other places neere vnto them: and that the Beglerbeg of Grecia, with the Bassa's of Bosna, Buda, and Temesuar, without regard of the league yet in force, had taken diuers cities, townes, castles, and strong places, and so extended the bounds of their dominion aboue fortie German miles, hauing slain or carried away into captiuity the poore inhabitants of those countries; and now to be grown to that height of pride, that except their farther proceedings were with like forces repressed, they would in short time set foot into Germany it selfe, and possessing themselues of Stiria and Carinthia, would from thence daily more and more incroach vpon the Empire: which to hinder, was not in his power only, but required their helpe in general. Wherefore he requested them now at length, in so publique a danger to open their coffers, and to send out their Forces F so great a danger, moued not only the Princes and States of the Empire, but others also farther off, to yeeld liberal contribution vnto so necessarie and general a cause.

The Turks now hearing of the great preparation of the Christian Princes, beside the armie which was alreadie in the field, and that they had made a strong bridge ouer the riuer of Drauus, which they had also fortified; thereby in safetie at their pleasure to transport their army:

they would in short time set foot into Germany it selfe, and possessing themselues of Stiria and Carinthia, would from thence daily more and more incroach vpon the Empire: which to hinder, was not in his power only, but required their helpe in general. Wherefore he requested them now at length, in so publique a danger to open their coffers, and to send out their Forces against the common enemie. Which request of the Emperor, with the due consideration of F so great a danger, moued not only the Princes and States of the Empire, but others also farther off, to yeeld liberal contribution vnto so necessarie and general a cause.

The Turks now hearing of the great preparation of the Christian Princes, beside the armie
which was alreadie in the field, and that they had made a strong bridge ouer the riuer of Drauus, which they had also fortified; thereby in safetie at their pleasure to transport their army:

without

without further delay furnished such places as they had gotten, with strong garrisons, and so withdrew themselues into their owne territory: which they did the rather, for that the plague then raged sore in Constantinople, insomuch that there died a thousand a day. Which contagion had also taken hold of the Turkish armie; so that the Christians for feare of infection, forthwith set at liberty what Turke soeuer fell into their hands. And thus ended the troubles of this yeare, being as it were an introduction for greater to ensue the yeare following.

1593 Diuers incursions of the Turks into the frontiers of the Christians in Croatia and Hungarie.

The Turks together with the beginning of the new yeare began also their wonted incursions into the frontiers of the Christians. They of the garrison of Petrinia (a strong fort but lately and contrarie to the league built by the Turks vpon the Riuer of Colapis or Kulp, for the further inuasion of Croatia) made dayly incursions out of that new fort, and entring into the Iland Turopolis, spoiled and burnt the Towne and Castle of Beck-Vochobinam, and hauing made a great slaughter, carried away with them 400 prisoners. And in Hungarie the Turkish garrisons to supplie their wants made diuers inrodes vpon the Chistians, and did exceeding much harme: of which aduenturers six hundred in passing ouer the frozen lake, were all drowned in the middest thereof. In another place three thousand of them neere vnto Nuhuse diuided themselues into two companies, whereof the one shewed it selfe in the sight of the Townesmen, the other still lying close in ambush. They of the towne vpon the sight of these Turks, sallied out, and causing them to retire, followed them so farre, that they were past the place where the rest of the Turks lay: who presently starting vp, ran with all speed toward the towne, in hope to haue surprised it: and wanted not much of that they desired; for there was scarce an hundred of the Germans there in garrison left in the towne, who had scarce so much time as to draw vp the bridges: which done, they with the great ordnance from the wals enforced the Turks to retyre and forsake the towne. About the same time also the Turks in garrison at Petrinia sallying out vpon the sudden, tooke the towne of Martenize, which they spoiled; and hauing slaine and taken about seuen hundred persons, set fire on the towne, and so returned, hauing lost in this exploit not past an hundred and fiftie of their owne men. Not long after, the same garrison soldiers of Petrinia tooke another castle three miles distant from the riuer of Kulp, whereinto the Christians dwelling round about had for feare of the enemy conueyed all their wealth, with great store of victuals: all which the Turks tooke, and hauing slaine six hundred men in the castle, returned with an exceeding rich bootie to Petrinia: which they bought with the liues of fiue hundred of their fellowes, slaine in taking of the Castle. With like insolencie did also the other Garrisons of the Turkes rage in all the other parts of Hungarie. About Sassouia in the vpper Hungarie they carried away about three hundred Christian captiues. And in the nether part of Hungarie they tooke the strong castle of S. Hedwig vpon the lake of Balaton, which they spoiled and burnt: and so likewise the castle of Isna: but attempting the lesser Comara, they were by the garrison souldiers valiantly repulsed. They also fortified the castle of Stocke, which they had but a little before taken, that so it might serue for a safe refuge for their aduenturers. Which their manifold outrages, contrarie to the league, euidently declared the desire they had to begin that bloudie war which presently after ensued: and was indeed the more suspected, for that at the same time the Emperours Embassador Fredericke Corcowitts was by the commandement of Amurath shut vp close in his house at Constantinople, and not suffered to speake with any man, neither to write or to send any messenger to the Emperor: which caused him the more to suspect some great matter to be by the Turke intended, and therefore began to raise new forces. The Hungarians and Bohemians also seeing their Townes and Castles thus taken, their Prouinces spoiled, infinite number of people led away into captiuitie, and the enemie dayly encreasing in strength; at length agreed vpon their owne charges to maintaine a certaine number both of horse and foot for the repressing of these the Turkish incursions.

Now although the Emperor knew right well, all these outrages of the Turks, contrary vnto the league, could not be done without the knowledge and good liking also of Amurath (as before enformed thereof by his Embassador from Constantinople) yet to shew himselfe willing to haue the league on his behalfe kept, as also to make a further proofe of Amurath his resolution for peace or warre, he wrote vnto him as follow-

Rodolph

Rodolph the second, Emperour of the Romans, vnto Amurath the third, King of the Turkes.

Whereas nothing is hitherto on our behalfe omitted for the preseruation and continuance of the league and amitie betwixt your most excellent Maiestie and vs, by the renewed capitulations of peace; and that we haue with all sinceritie and loue performed, and are hereafter readie to performe whatsoeuer is on our part to be performed and done; and as we haue hitherto, so for euer hereafter also make offer of the same: we most assuredly promise vnto our selues on your Maiesties behalfe, that you in like manner will not suffer any thing on your part to be wanting; but gladly and willingly to do all things which shall be meete and needfull for the preseruation and keeping of this our mutual loue and friendship. Vpon which good hope grounding our selues, to declare our plaine meaning and sinceritie indeed, we will cause our honorable Present (which is now readie) to be brought vnto your most royall Maiestie, at such time as shall be agreed vpon betwixt our Embassador and you: vnto whom in all such matters as he by our commandement shall haue to deale with your most excellent Maiestie, your Visiers, or seruants, we request you to giue full credence. In the meane time your Excellencie shall doe well to prouide, that as we haue now seuerely commanded our subiects to keepe the peace vpon our frontiers, so that your souldiers also make no incursions as enemies into our territories, nor do in them any harme, but to endeauour themselues also to peace and quietnes: and especially that all such things as contrarie to the capitulations of the league haue been there of late taken from our people, or otherwise vnlustly possessed, may be againe restored, the losses recompenced, the new fort of Petrinia demolished, and the Bassa of Bosna and others the authours of breaking of the league, punished and displaced: whereby we shall gather your royal Maiesties most noble and kinde affection towards vs and our State, which as it shall be a thing most iust, so shall it be a singular confirmation of our league. But concerning these matters, and others to the same belonging, our Embassador is to declare our minde more at large, that so our prest acsire for the continuance of our league and friendship with your Maiestie, may more plainely be knowne. So wish we all health and prosperitie vnto your most royal Maiestie. From Prague the eighth of March 1593. The Emperors letters.

The Emperor also at the same time and to the same purpose writ to Sinan Bassa in this sort:

Rodolph the second, Emperour of the Romans, to Sinan Bassa the chiefe Visier, greeting.

We write at this present vnto your most Excellent Emperor our most honored friend and neighbour concerning such matters as we thought fit for the preseruation of the peace and league betwixt vs: for else vnlyotherwise we might seeme to haue forgotten our dutie. Now is shall well beseeme your vprightnes and good will, which we haue at other times proued, for the high place and authoritie which you hold [illegible] which we reioice to be againe restored vnto you) to giue vnto these things such easie passage [illegible] Maiestie, as that we may acknowledge your kindenesse and fauor, and haue occasion thereby [illegible] selues vnto you thankefull. First, we offer our selues most readie to continue the peace, and [illegible] whatsoeuer is according [illegible] the conuentions of the renued peace on our part to be performed [illegible] the honorable Present (which is not as yet by vs sent) when as our Embassador shall haue [illegible] ted any certaine time wherein it may be sent. And we also assuredly hope so to preuaile [illegible] rer, that on your part the places within our territories, by your people forcibly possessed [illegible] such things as haue been wrongfully taken away, may be againe restored, and the [illegible] The Bassa of Bosna also (who we thinke would haue been kept within the compasse [illegible] that time held the place of the chiefe Visier) and whosoeuer els, guilty of the wicked [illegible] to be worthily according to their deserts punished and displaced, and your soulders [illegible] to make any further incursions, nor to do any thing that may tend to the breaking [illegible] wise shall with new and straict commands most carefully restraine our garrisons [illegible] tiers, from all such incursions and enemies actions. But of these things [illegible] at large to entreat with you: vnto whose speech we desire such credence [illegible] we will so prouide, that you shall haue good proofe of our great good [illegible] eighth of March 1593.

Vnto which the Emperors letters, Sinan returned [illegible]

Sinan Bassa chiefe Visier to Amurath the third, Emperor of the Turks; vnto Rodolph the second, Emperour of the Romans, greeting.

Sinan Bassa his Letters to the Emperour.

By these presents your Maiestie to vnderstand, That two of your Maiesties Letters were brought hither before we were chosen and confirmed chiefe Visier in this most royal Court; wherein your Maiestie excuse your selfe, and shew the causes why the sending of the wonted Presents hath been so long deferred; by laying the fault vpon the insolencie of our garrison souldiers in Bosna, and the breach of the publique peace. Which your Letters being by vs read before our most mightie Emperour, his Highnesse in great choler burst out into these words, And thy sonne the Beglerbeg of Buda hath stil hitherto writ and giuen vs to vnderstand, that the vsual presents would certainly come, and that the King of Vienna would not in any case consent vnto the breach of the league, or of the amitie betwixt vs and him: and yet for all that, the Presents are not hitherto come; wherefore thy sonnes writings and relations are not true. *But now the Bassa of Bosna hath sent word vnto the Court, That your Maiestie will not send them, and all your doings to be but meere deceit and fraud. For which cause our most mightie Emperour hath remoued my sonne from his place in Buda, and rewarded the Bassa of Bosna with honorable garments, whereas my sonne is for your Maiesties sake displaced. Now on our behalfe nothing is done against the peace, but our souldiers as with a bridle kept in: whereas on your Maiesties part excursions and harmes into the territories of our Emperour neuer cease, especially into Bosna, whereinto your souldiers haue of late in warlike manner broken, although they were by our garisons ouercome, their great ordnance taken, and brought hither vnto the Court. Wherefore seeing the case so standeth, your Maiestie is to resolue vs vpon two points; whereof the first is, Whether you be minded to keepe friendship with vs as beseemeth; and to send hither the two last yeares Presents or not? And the second, Whether you will set at libertie our captiue Sanzackes, or no? Now if your Maiestie shall be content to keepe the league, and within these two moneths next, to send the two yeares presents, as also to dismisse our Sanzackes; the league shall on our part be likewise vnfeignedly kept, your Territories shall be in no case molested, such Christian captiues as your Maiestie shall require, be enlarged, and a most firme and sure friendship by vs continued. Whereas if you shall vpon any cause or excuse longer delay the sending of those honorable Presents, and vnto these our demands giue vs nothing but certaine vaine and windie answers; let God on high be therefore for euer praised: for then our most mightie and victorious Emperour, who wanteth neither abilitie nor power, hath commanded, That we our selfe should in person go in this war; and putting our confidence in the Highest, with the Armie of the right beleeuing Turkes to come into those parts. And therefore assure your Maiestie, that we will not faile there to encounter you: at which time shall appeare vnto the world, what is by God our Creator (whose holy name be for euer blessed) in his deepe wisdome preordained and set downe for vs. Wherefore seeing that all which concerneth the league, together with the safetie and quiet of our people on both sides, is vnto your Maiestie thus declared; you are to consider the end, and to follow our good aduice: whereas if otherwise you shall be the cause of the breach of this so wholesome a peace and vnitie (which we hitherto haue so sincerely and firmly kept) the excuse thereof both in this world and in the world to come, shall lie vpon your selfe. Now we request of you no more, but forthwith to send vs answer of these our letters. As for the rest, well may he speed that taketh the right way. From Constantinople the last of the moneth * Giumaa Zuleuel, in the yeare of our holy Prophet* Mahomet 10001. *

* Which is the 16 of March, in the yeare of Christ 1593.

Yet for all these faire offers of peace thus made by Sinan Bassa in his letters, was his purpose nothing lesse than to haue performed the same; seeking onely to haue drawne the two yeares presents from the Emperour, amounting to a great summe of money, and so neuertheless to haue prosecuted the intended war; the Emperour being the onely man of whom Amurath his great Master had amongst all the Christian Princes made choice of to exercise his force vpon. Of all which things the Emperour was not ignorant, being thereof (as we said) fully before by his Embassador aduertised from Constantinople.

These troubles of the Spring thus past, ensued the Sommer much more troublesome, for Hassan Bassa of Bosna, the author and deuiser of these broiles, ceased not for the increase of his credit, to worke what mischiefe he could against the Christians that bordered vpon him.

This

This great Bassa mortally hated the Gouernour, or as some call him the Abbot of Siseg, a strong castle scituate vpon the borders of that part of Croatia, yet holden by the Christians, where the riuer Kulp falleth into the famous riuer of Sauus or Saw (and was indeed the verie bulwarke of that countrey) the cause of which his hatred is reported to haue been this. The yeare before, the Bassa had sent a messenger to this Abbot, to require him to deliuer the castle or monasterie vnto him: which messenger for certaine daies the Abbot entertained with many honourable speeches, learning in the mean time of him so much as he possibly could of the Bassaes intention, with what power, in what place, and with what engines he had determined to besiege the castle. In the meane time it was discouered, that his Steward had long before plotted with the Turke to haue betraied the castle, and had for certaine yeres past receiued of him a yerely pension. Vpon which occasion, the Abbot caused both the messenger & his own steward to be apprehended, and so fast bound hand and foot, to be cast out at a window of the castle into the riuer of Saw. The Bassa seeing his messenger not to returne, sent another to the Abbot, grieuously threatning him, if he did not send him back again his messenger: whereunto the Abbot answered, That he had dismissed him certaine daies before, and therfore maruelled if he were not as yet returned: neuertheless concerning his demand, that he was resolued to yeeld the monasterie vnto the Bassa, against whose forces he saw himselfe vnable to hold it: requesting only, that it would please him to send some men of account to receiue it at his hand: for that it would be no small dishonot vnto him to deliuer it vp vnto common souldiers. The Bassa glad of this message, sent forthwith certaine principall men of great account, hoping now without any losse to haue that strong place yeelded vnto him, which had so long time stood in his way. Three daies after, certaine troups of horsemen sent from the Bassa, came to the monasterie as was appointed, and finding the gates open, entred, first the noblemen, and after them fiue hundred others or thereabouts: who were no sooner within the gates, but that the portculleis was let fall, and certain murthering pieces (secretly placed in the court for that purpose) discharged; with the violence whereof, the Turks that were alreadie entred, were most miserably rent in pieces, their heads, arms, and legs, flying in the aire; when presently the garrison souldiers starting out of their lurking places, made a quick dispatch of all them that had escaped the fury of the great artillerie. The rest of the Turks shut out, hearing the noise and crie of them within, turning their horses, betooke themselues to speedie flight. The great Bassa hearing of this slaughter of his men, and how he had beene deceiued, swore in great rage by his Mahomet, to rase this monasterie downe to the ground, and to pluck the Abbots skin ouer his eares: and so by threatning letters gaue him to vnderstand, as followeth.

Hassan Bassa of Bosna, vnto the Abbot of Siseg.

The threatning letter of Hassan Bassa of Bosna vnto the Abbot of Siseg.

It is not to thee vnknowne, how often wee haue sent vnto thee our messengers with letters, declaring vnto thee our loue and good will; requesting thee in friendly sort, and without further resistance to yeeld vp vnto vs thy fortresse of Siseg, not longer to be by thee holden. Vnto which our request thou hast hitherto most wilfully at thy pleasure opposed thy selfe, not without the slaughter of our men; and in so doing, hast giuen cause vnto the great Sultan to ouerthrow and rase that thy fortresse, whereof thou for the Emperour wilt needs be the chiefe. Thinkest thou it will be for thy good, or yet well taken, that thou hast so shamefully and perfidiously circumuented and slaine our Embassadors and seruants sent vnto thee? Nay assure thy selfe, that if Mahomet *grant vs life, we will neuer giue ouer the siege of that thy fort wherein thou so much trustest, vntill I haue before thy face ouerthrowne it, and (if thy God shall giue thee aliue into my hands) haue pluckt thy skin ouer thine eares, to the great reproch and shame of the Christians: for I am fully resolued, not to depart from this place, but to continue the siege thereof vntill I haue it. Let a little time yet passe, and thou shalt see thy selfe on euery side besieged thy fort with more and greater pieces of artillerie than euer, battered, and our power strong enough to constraine thee. Thou hast hitherto put thy greatest hope and comfort in the * Banne* Erodius, for whom by the help of Mahomet we are too much strong. In briefe, we are of nothing more carefull than how to get thee into our power: for we do looke not for any mercie at our hands.

Neither was the Bassa vnmindfull of his promise, or of the losse he had receiued the beginning of Iune with an army of thirtie thousand horse and foot, Amurath himselfe and the great men of the court brought a mile on his way: hauing in charge G from the great Sultan, by the assistance of the Beglerbeg of Græce, the Bassaes of Buda and Temeswar, and other his Sanzacks and commanders in that part of his empire, to reuenge the death of his nephew, and the dishonor receiued at Siseg.

This war Amurath with great pride denounced vnto the Christian Emperour and the rest of the Princes his confederats in this sort.

Amurath the third, by the grace of the great God in Heauen, the onely Monarch of the World, a great and mightie God on earth, an inuincible Cæsar, King of all Kings, from the East vnto the West, Sultan of Babylon, Soueraigne of the most noble Families of Persia and Armenia, triumphant Victor of Hierusalem, Lord possessor of the Sepulchre of the crucified God, subuerter and sworne enemie of the Christians, and of all them that call vpon the name of Christ. H

The proud and blasphemous denuntiation of warre giuen out by Amurath against Rodolph the Christian Emperour

Wee denounce vnto thee Rodolph the Emperour, and to all the Germane Nation taking part with thee, vnto the great Bishop also, all the Cardinals and Bishops, to all your sonnes and subiects: wee earnestly (I say) by our crowne and Empire denounce vnto you open warre. And giue you to vnderstand, that our purpose is, with the power of thirteene Kingdomes, and certaine hundred thousands of men, horse and foot, with our Turkes and Turkish armes, yea with all our strength and power (such as neither thou nor any of thine hath euer yet seene or heard of, much lesse had any proofe of) to besiege you I in your chiefe and metropoliticall cities, and with fire and sword to persecute you and all yours, and whosoeuer shall giue you helpe, to burne, destroy, and kill, and with most exquisite torments we can deuise, to torture vnto death and slay such Christian captiues as shall fall into our hands, or else to keepe them as dogs, captiues in perpetuall miserie; to empaile vpon stakes your faireſt sonnes and daughters: and to the further shame and reproch of you and yours, to kill like dogs your women great with childe, and the children in their bellies: for now wee are fully resolued to bring into our subiection, you which rule but in a small countrie, and by strong hand and force of arms keepe from you your Kingdome, as also to oppresse, root vp, and destroy, the keyes and See of Rome, together with the golden scepter thereof: and we will proue whither your crucified Iesus will helpe you or no, for you as yours perswade you. Beleeue him still and trust in him, and see how he hath holpen his owne bergers which haue put their confidence in K him: for we neither beleeue, neither can we endure to heare such incomprehensible things, that he can helpe, which is dead so many worlds of yeares agoe, which could not helpe himselfe, nor deliuer his owne countrie and inheritance from our power, ouer which we haue so long time raigned. These things O yee poore and miserable of the world, wee thought good to signifie vnto you, that you with your princes and confederats may know what you haue to doe and to looke for. Giuen in our most mightie and Imperiall citie of Constantinople, which our ancestors by force of armes tooke from yours, and hauing slaine or taken prisoners all their citizens, reserued such of their wiues and children as they pleased, vnto their lust, to your perpetuall infamie and shame.

Sinan with his armie thus setting forward, kept still on his way towards Buda; but the Beg- L lerbeg of Græcia with a farre greater power marched towards Croatia, as well to relieue the forts distressed by the Christians, as againe to besiege the strong castle or monasterie of Siseg; which he with his huge armie at his first arriuall compassed about without resistance, & with continuall batterie ouerthrew the walls thereof, giuing no time of rest vnto the defendants. Which breaches they for all that valiantly defended, & with restlesse labour notably repaired the very fearful women bringing tables, stooles, and whatsoeuer els came to hand, that might any wise help to keep the enemie out, of whom a great number was in the breaches slain: but what was that handfull against such a multitude? At length the 3 day of September the Turks by maine force entered the Monasterie, & put to sword all the soldiers therein: among whom were 200 Germans, of whom the Turks cut some in pieces, and the rest they threw into the riuer Kulp. [illegible] man there found among the rest they did flea quicke in detestation of his professio[illegible]d cutting him in small pi[illegible]urnt them to ashes. So taking the spoyle of all that was there to be had, and leauing a [illegible] garrison for the keeping of the place, they passed ouer Sauus, burning the countrie before him, and carried away with them about Siseg taken by the Turkes.

A about a thousand poore Christians into perpetual captiuitie. These inuasions of the Turks caused the Emperor to craue aid both of the States of the Empire, and other forreine Princes farther off, which was by some easily granted, but not so speedily performed.

About this time Peter syrnamed le Hussar (for that hee commanded ouer those horsemen whom the Hungarians call Hussars) captaine of Pappa, by the appointment of Ferdinand countie Hardeck Gouernour of Rab, lay in wait for the Turkes Treasurer in Hungarie, who had the command of 5000 Turkes: him this Hungarian tooke at aduantage, as he was mustering and paying certain companies of his soldiers, mistrusting no such danger, and desperatly charging him, slew him with diuers of his men, and put the rest to flight, and so with the spoile and some few prisoners he returned againe to his castle, carrying with him the Treasurer.

B Now Sinan the Generall being come with his armie to Buda, resolued with himselfe to begin his wars in that part of Hungarie, with the siege of Vesprinium. This Episcopall citie was by Solyman the great Turke taken from the Christians in the yeare 1552, and againe by them recouered about foureteene yeares after, about the yeare 1566; since which time vntill now it had remained in the hands of the Christians. Sinan without delay marching with his armie to Vesprinium, compassed the city round, and encamping as he saw good, planted his batterie, wherewith he continually thundered against the city. The Christians there in garrison easily perceiuing that the city was not long to bee holden against so great a power, placed diuers barrels of gunpouder in certain mines they had made vnder the wals & bulwarks of the town, with traines that should at a certaine time take fire. Which done, they departed secretly out C of the city in the dead time of the night, hoping so in the darke to haue escaped the hand of the enemy: which they did not so secretly, but that they were by the Turks descried, and most of them slaine. Ferdinand Samaria Gouernor of the citie, after he had for a space valiantly defended himselfe, fell at last into the enemies hand, and so was taken aliue, together with one Hofkirke a German captain. The Turks entered the citie the sixth of October, striuing who should get first in, for greedinesse of the prey, when suddenly the ponder in the mines tooke fire, and blowing vp the very foundations of the wals and bulwarkes, slew a number of the Turks that were within the danger thereof, and wonderfully defaced the citie.

Sinan Bassa besieged Vesprinium.

From Vesprinium the Bassa remoued with his armie to Palotia, and gaue summons to the castle: but receiuing such answer as pleased him not, he laied siege vnto it with all his power. D Which at the first Peter Ornand captaine of the castle cheerfully receiued: but being afterward without any great cause discouraged (the castle as yet being but little shaken, & but one man slaine, and the rest of the soldiers ready to spend their liues in defence therof) he sent vnto the Bassa, offering to yeeld the castle vnto him, so that he with his souldiers might with bag and baggage in safetie depart. Of which his offer the Bassa accepted, and granted his request. But hee was no sooner come out of the castle with his souldiers, and ready to depart, but the faithlesse Turke contrarie to his oath and promise caused them all to be cruelly slaine, except only the captaine and two other. After that, the Bassa without any great labor tooke in all the countrey thereabouts neere vnto the lake of Balaton.

Palotia yeelded vnto the Turkes

Now at last, though long first, about the middle of October the Christians began to muster E their armie, in number about 18000, all good and expert souldiers: with which power they shortly after passing ouer Danubius, at the first encounter with the Turkes, put them to the worse, slew a great number of them, and rescued a number of poore Christian captiues.

In the latter end of this month, countie Hardeck Gouernor of Rab, and General of the Christian armie in that part of Hungarie, departing from Comara with all his power, came and laid siege to the strong citie of Alba Regalis, which by the force of his artillerie he in short time made faultable; but in assaulting the breaches, was by the Turks there in garrison notably repulsed. So hauing made sufficient proofe both of the strength and courage of the defendants, & perceiuing no good could be done without a long siege, for which he was not as then prouided; after consultation had with the rest of the captaines, he resolued to raise his siege: which F he did the second of Nouember, remouing that day but halfe a mile from the citie, because he would be sure of all his armie. But as he was about the next day to remoue, news was brought him by his espials, that the enemies power was at hand, and euen now almost in sight: which proued to be so indeed. For the Bassa of Buda by the commandement of Sinan Bassa the Generall, was come forth with thirteene Sanzacks, and twentie thousand souldiers, thirtie field pieces, Alba Regalis besieged by the Christians.

cc[illegible] and fiue hundred waggons laded with victuall and other warlike prouision, to raise the G siege, and to relieue the citie; and was now euen at hand, comming directly vpon the Christians: whereupon the county, assisted by the countie Serinus, the lord Palfi, the lord Nadasti, Peter le Hussar, and other valiant captains of great experience, with wonderful celeritie put his army in order of battell, and so couragiously set forward to encounter the enemie. The Bassa seeing the Christians marching towards him, tooke the aduantage of the higher ground, and from thence discharged his field pieces vpon them; which mounted too hie, by good hap did them little or no hurt at all. The Christians for all that desirous of battel, and nothing regarding the disaduantage of the ground, but calling vpon the name of the Almighty, mounted the hill, and ioyning battell with the Turks, by plaine force constrained them to flie. In this armie of the Turkes, being for most part horsemen, were about fiue thousand foot, and many of them Ianizaries, who in flying, oftentimes made stands, and wounded many, and yet neuertheless were almost all there slaine, with many others: amongst whom were three great men, the Sanzacks of Strigonium, Setchine, and Nouigrade; seuen Chiaus, and many other men of mark, the most valiant captains of the Turks borderers. The lord Nadasti with some others taking view of the Turks that were slaine and lost in this battel, deemed them to haue been at the least in number eight thousand: few prisoners were saued, all beeing put to the sword, which caused Sinan to sweare by his Mahomet, neuer more to spare any Christian. All the Turks artillerie, wagons, and prouision became a prey vnto the Christians: many ensignes were there found, and weapons of great value. It is hard to be beleeued, how much this victorie encouraged the Christians, & danted the Turks. Whereupon the countie with great ioy brought backe his armie to Alba H Regalis, and encamped neere the bulwarke called Stopasch, where the Turkes most feared to be assaulted, Palfi, Nadasti, and some others, earnestly perswaded with the county, not to depart from the city before he had woon it: but he considering the hard time of the yere, the strength of the citie (which was now full of souldiers, by reason of them that were fled in thither from the late ouerthrow) with the want of things necessary [illegible] his army to maintaine a longer siege; and fearing also after long lying to be enforced wi[illegible] honor to forsake it, would not hearken to their perswasions, but calling a counsell, resolued [illegible]ise his siege, and to content himselfe with the victory he had already gotten; which was a[illegible]ard imputed vnto him for more than an ouersight. So setting fire vpon the suburbs of the [illegible], he rise with his army, and departed thence the fifth of Nouember, and returned to Rab. K

Sabatzka taken by the lord Teuffenbach.

Not long after, Christopher lord Teuffenbach, the Emperours Lieutenant in the vpper part of Hungarie, who lay encamped at Cassouia, with his armie of foureteene thousand souldiers remoued thence, & marching along the country two daies, came & laid siege to Sabatzka, one of the Turks strongest castles in those quarters, out of which they vsually did much harm among the Christians. This Castle Teuffenbach battered in three places, and hauing at length made it faitable, tooke it by force the nineteenth of Nouember, and put to the sword all the Turkes there in garrison, in number about two hundred and fiftie, and in stead of them left a strong garrison of his owne: whereby all the countrie thereabouts was restored to great quietnesse.

Filek besieged by the Christians.

Sabatzka thus taken, the Christian Generall remoued with all speed to Filek a strong citie L of the higher Hungarie, which Solyman the Turkish Emperor tooke from the Christians in the yere 1560, and placed therein a Sanzacke, vnder the command of the Bassa of Buda. The Generall encamping before this citie, the next day after planted his batterie, and in most terrible manner without intermission thundered against the wals and gates of the citie. The Sanzacke Gouernour thereof, considering the power of the Christians, got out secretly by night with a few souldiers, to acquaint the other Turkish Sanzackes his neighbours with the comming of the Christians, and the number of their armie; and further to consult with them, how the city might be relieued. The Bassa of Temeswar, with the Sanzacks of Giula, Hadwan, Scantzag, and Solnok vndertooke the matter: and thereupon the Bassa sent for eight hundred Ianizaries, of la[illegible] Sinan Bassa in garrison at Buda and Alba Regalis; who all flatly refu- M sed to goe to this [illegible]saying, That they would [illegible]ee led as beasts to the slaughter, as were their fellowes but a little before at Alba Reg[illegible] Neuertheless they enforced the Armenians, whome Sinan and his sonne had brought thither, to goe; but of Buda, Alba Regalis, and Scanboth, were sent onely fifteene hundred common souldiers. For all that, the

Bassa

A Bassa with the Sanzackes his followers, firme in their former resolution for the relieue of the distressed citie, hauing made great preparation, and raised an armie of 18000 strong, with manie field pieces, by night drew neere vnto Filek, and stayed within two miles of the citie. But the General of the Christians, with Stephen Bathor and the other captaines, vnderstanding of their comming, with 7000 good souldiers chosen out of the whole armie, went out prestently against them, and the one and twentieth of Nouember suddenly assailing them in their tents, ouerthrew them and put them all to flight, whom the Christians fiercely pursued with a most terrible execution. In this fight and flight there was slaine 6000 Turks, and but few or none taken. The Bassa himselfe, with the Sanzacke of Filek, and many others of great name, were found amongst the bodies of the slaine Turks. This victory gained with little or no losse, yeelB ded vnto the Christians a rich prey, many gorgeous tents and faire ensignes, much cattell, and 29 field pieces, with 200 waggons laded with victual and other prouision; all which they carried into the campe at Filek, and so more straitly besieged the citie than before. The same day the Lo. Palfi and Martin Lasla came to the camp with six thousand soldiers; and forthwith three Trumpeters were sent to them of the citie, That if without further resistance they would forthwith yeeld the citie, they should haue leaue in safetie to depart with life and goods, although the Turks had of late in like case broken their faith with the Christians at Palotta: but if they refused his grace, and would needs hold it out to the vttermost, then to denounce vnto them all extremities. For all this, the Turks nothing dismaied, refused to yeeld: whereupon the batterie began afresh, and in more terrible manner than before; so that though the Citie C was most strongly fortified both with walls and rampiers, yet had the Christians in three daies space with continual batterie made a faire breach into it, whereby they in despight of the enemie entred without any notable losse the foure and twentieth of Nouember, ransacked the citie, and burnt a great part thereof. The same day they also tooke the vttermost castle, wherein the Sanzacks palace stood. This castle standeth vpon a very high hill, strengthened both by art and nature, and had in it a strong garrison of valiant souldiers, who spared not lustily to bestow their shot amongst their enemies, of whom they slew a great number. Neuertheless the Christians after they had for the space of two dayes and two nights with a most furious batterie shaken the walls, by plaine force entred the castle the six and twentieth of Nouember, and put to sword all the garison souldiers, except such as had in good time forsaken this caD stle, and retired themselues into another more inward. Who being in number eight hundred, with their wiues and children, without hope of relieue, and seeing the cannon now bent vpon them, set out a white ensigne in token of parley: which granted, it was agreed that they should depart with life, and so much of their goods as euery one of them could carrie. Vpon which agreement the castle was yeelded the eight and twentieth day of Nouember, and the Turkes with a safe conuoy brought vnto the place they desired. In this castle was found a great booty, many pieces of artillerie, and much other warlike prouision, but of victuals small store. The Generall with the rest of the captaines entring the castle, fell downe vpon their knees, and with their hearts and hands cast vp to heauen, thanked God for their victorie, and for the recouerie of that strong citie; but especially for the deliuery of so many Christians out of the Turkish thraldome: for it is reported, that there were aboue eight hundred countrey villages subE iect to the jurisdiction of Filek, the poore inhabitants whereof were now all freed from the Turkish seruitude, by the taking of this onely citie. The Christians forthwith repaired the walls, bulwarkes, and trenches, and strongly fortified euerie place against the enemie: and so leauing a sufficient garrison in the citie and castles, departed with their armie, now in number about twentie thousand, towards Stuloch, six miles from Filek. But as they were vpon the way, newes was brought vnto the General, how that the Turks had for feare abandoned the castles of Dijwin and Somoske: whereupon he sent out certaine companies of soldiers to take in both those places: who comming thither, found them indeed forsaken by the enemy, but yet many pieces of artillerie and other warlike prouision there still left.

Filek taken by the Christians.

F In the latter end of Nouember the General marched with his armie towards Setschine, a strong towne in the dioceese of Agria; but the Turkes in that place had two or three daies before prepared themselues to flie, and sent their wiues, their children, and the best of their substance, some to Hatwan, some to Buda; and now hearing of the approch of the Christian Armie, set fire on the towne and fled. The Christians immediately entring, did what they could pitching their tents, and incamping themselues: yet before night they had planted certaine great pieces vpon an high hill from whence them might see into the castle: whereof the master of the ordnance called three of the greatest about the going downe of the Sun to be discharged against the castle, to giue the Turkes to vnderstand that they wanted nothing for the siege. The same night also the Christians cast vp a great mount in the valley, from whence they presently ten dagges two into the castle: but early in the morning, the Sun being yet scarce spredd ouer the hils, they began to batter the castle, and the day out of ten great pieces did discharge 300 great shot against the Castle towards the Danow: for the Castle was on the vpper side strong, rocky, fortified with eight and three walls, and a deepe ditch betwen euery the same rocke, which compassed the castle round. And for the more strength therein was it fortified with pallisadoes made of strong timber. And there was no accesse into the walls yet by the commandement of the Generall, vpon the ceasing of the Christians preparing themselues to assault the breach, furnished with their weapons, carrying with them ladders and setting them on fire, burne the pallisadoes in diuers places, and opened the way vnto the walls: and encouraged with the successe, approched neerer, and slew diuers of the Turks vpon their rampiers. Who discouraged with their owne weakenesse, and the hardnes of the enemy, faintly defended themselues, and yet slew diuers of them, casting them downe from the walls with stones, timber, fire-works, and such like. This assault giuen in the night, was continued vntill foure a clocke in the morning, and so giuen ouer. Shortly after came the Archduke with 1000 horse into the campe, and caused the batterie to be againe renued; whereby it chanced that the chiefe canonier in the castle being a renegat German was taken with a great shot and slaine; whose death so dismaied the rest of the defendants, that they presently set forth three white flags in signe of parley: which for all that, the Christians seemed not to regard, but still continued their batterie. The Turks then pittifully crying out, named two captaines, whom they desired to haue sent vnto them, with whom they might fall to some reasonable composition. So for a while the batterie ceased, and those Captaines being sent vnto the Towne, brought nine of the best of the Turkes in the Citie with them vnto the Archduke: who by their Interpreter declared, that they well considered the force of the Christians, and seeing no reliefe to come from the Bassa of Buda, as he had promised, thought themselues to haue alreadie discharged the parts of good soldiers, and seeing no other remedie, were contented to yeeld the castle, yet so, as with bag and baggage they might in safetie depart. Whereunto the Lord Palfi (taking vpon him the person of the Archduke, for that he himselfe would not be knowne) answered, That forasmuch as they had not yeelded at the first summons, but holden it out to the losse of many of his mens liues, and his great charge, they were vnworthie any fauor; yet of his owne clemencie he would receiue them, if they would absolutely without any further condition yeeld themselues to his mercie. This answer being reported to the Sanzacke Gouernour of the Towne, pleased him not, and therefore said hee would still stand vpon his defence. Whereupon the Christians were about to haue begun a fresh assault. But after a new parley, it was at last agreed, That the Turkes yeelding the towne vnto the Archduke, should in safetie depart with their apparel and scimiters only. With which agreement two of the Turks were sent backe into the castle, & the rest detained. Foure houres the Turks in the castle delaied the time, as men doubtful what to do: but being earnestly called vpon for a resolute answer, and seeing the Christians readie againe to assault them, they for feare yeelded: and so 450 of them came forth, amongst whom was the Sanzacke gouernour of the towne, with his wife and daughter, the Sanzacke of Selendre (sent thither to haue aided him) and one Chiaus lately come from the Court. These great men brauely mounted, were commanded to alight from their gallant horses, and had in their steads other bad jades giuen them to ride vpon: and as they passed by, as well the women as the men were searched, that they carried with them nothing more than their cloathes: if any thing els were found, it fell vnto the soldiers share for good bootie. This strong towne of Nouigrade had continued in the possession of the Turks about 60 yeares, and serued as it were for a bulwarke to Pesth and Buda; which being now cut out of their hands, opened a way vnto their further harmes. The keeping of this towne was by the Archduke committed to the Lord Rebei a nobleman of Hungarie and kinsman to Palfi, with a strong garrison and certaine troupes of Hussars.

Nouigrade yeelded vnto the archduke.

The Sanzacke of Nouigrade, after he had lost the towne, comming to Buda, was presently apprehen-

A apprehended by the Bassa, and laid in prison: who although he excused himselfe, by alledging that the towne was not possibly to be holden with so small a garison against so graet a power; and that if any fault were, it was to be imputed to them of Buda, for not sending relief in time; and therefore appealed vnto the further hearing of Amurath himselfe: yet all serued him not, but was by the Bassa's commandment in the night hanged vpon a tree neere vnto the gate of the citie, and afterwards cut in pieces.

The Sanzacke of Nouigrade hanged at Buda.

Whilest these things were in doing, the Emperors sent his Embassador to the great Duke of Muscouia, the King of Polonia, and the Prince of Transyluania, to proue how they stood affected towards those his wars against the Turke, and what aid he might procure from them. Into Muscouie was sent one Warkutsch a gentleman of Silesia; who comming to Musco, found B in that Court the Embassadors of the Tartar, the Turke, the Persian, the Polonian, and the Dane. Of all these, the Embassadors of the Tartar and the Turke could haue no audience, but were with contumelious words reiected as miscreants. The Emperours Embassador was honorably entertained, and after the manner of that countrey, a large proportion of wine, mede, aquavitæ, flesh, fish, and fowle of sundrie sorts allowed him dayly all the time of his abode. At length hauing audience, he declared vnto the great Duke the cause of his comming, and in the name of his Master requested his aid against the Turke. Whereunto the Duke answered, That he would giue the Emperor towards the maintenance of his wars against the common enemy, 500000 duckets, and allow him yerely 400000 during the time of that war; requesting him not to make any peace with the Turke, and promising to send him aid also of men in this war, C if he should so need. The Persian Embassador also honorably feasted the Emperors Embassador, and had with him great conference concerning the wars of the Christians with the Turks, and in his masters name promised the continuation of his warres against the Turke, so that the Emperor would likewisea promise not to haue any league with him, so to giue him leisure to turne all his forces againe into Persia. This Embassador after he had almost foure months tarried in Muscouia, returned to the Emperor. At which time Doctor Wacker the Emperors Embassadour into Polonia, returned also with joyfull newes, how that the Polonians with an armie of eight and twentie thousand had stopped the passage of an hundred thousand Tartars whom the Turke had sent for against the Emperor; and that if he needed, he should be aided with the Polonian Cossackes: but vnto the rest of his requests he could haue no answere of D the States of that Kingdome, for that the King was then absent in Sweden; and was therefore referred to be further answered at his returne.

At the same time, Countie Serinus with three hundred harquebusiers and certaine troups of horsemen, and the footmen of Stiria and the countries thereabouts, assembled to the number of ten thousand, departed from Canisia, to besiege Bresenza a castle of the Turks. But they vnderstanding before of his comming, conueyed away the best of their substance, and setting the castle on fire, departed the three and twentieth of March. The Earle comming thither, tooke the forsaken castle, and put thereinto a garrison of his owne souldiers. In like manner he tooke also Sigesta, forsaken of the Turks, where he also placed a garrison of the Christians. And so going on to Babostcha, besieged it; which castle although it was strongly scituated in E a marish, and could not easily haue beene woon, was for all that, for feare abandoned by the Turks, and so taken by the Countie: by recouerie of which places, there was a safe and easie way layd open euen to Ziget, the Bassa whereof stood in no small doubt to haue been euen then besieged.

Certain castles of the Turkes vpon the borders of Stiria taken by the County Serinus.

Amurath intending by all meanes he could to vex the Emperor, had determined to send his fleet into the Adriatique, to besiege Zegna a citie of the Emperors scituate vpon the sea coast, in the bay Quernero, called in antient time Flanaticus Sinus. Which the better to effect, hee sent one of his Chiaus Embassador to the Venetians, to request them, That his fleet might by their leaue passe alongst the Adriaticke, and haue the vse of their ports and harbours, as need F vnto: fearing (and not without cause) the vnfaithfulnesse and treacherie of the Turkes, whose oathes and promises are no longer strong, or by them regarded, than standeth with their owne good and profit: neuertheless they most honourably vsed the Embassadour, and so sent him away without obtaining of that he was especially sent for.

In the vpper part of Hungarie Christopher Lord Teuffenbach the Archdukes Lieutenant hauing

ing gathered an armie of twentie thousand soldiers, the sixteenth of Aprill laied siege to Hatwan a strong towne six miles from Buda, fortified with a triple ditch and bulwarkes of exceeding strength. Against which although the Christians could not do much either by mines or mounts, (by reason it was so enuironed with water) yet they so shut vp all the passages thereunto, that nothing could be brought or carried in or out of the towne. They of the towne seeing themselues thus blockt vp, by secret messengers certified the Bassa of Buda in what case they stood, praying of him aid: who with ten thousand chosen souldiers, which he had then in readinesse, and the Sanzacks of Sirnah, Giula, Lippa, Lerwoge, and Tschangrad, with fiue thousand moe, forthwith set forward toward Hatwan to raise the siege: and the last of Aprill being come within sight of the Christian armie, about one of the clocke in the afternoone encamped on the side of the riuer Sagijwa: but when he could not or els durst not, for the deepenesse of the way, the aboundance of the water, and neerenesse of the enemie, aduenture to passe the riuer, he retyred backe againe to passe ouer at Iasperin (otherwise called Iasbrin) where the riuer was joined with a bridge, and not far off a good foord also to passe ouer at; thinking so to haue come vpon the backes of the Christians, and with more safetie to haue relieued the besieged towne. But Teuffenbach perceiuing his purpose, forthwith after his departure passed the riuer with much difficultie, and ouertaking him with his armie the next day, being the first of May, about one of the clocke in the afternoone, betweene Zarcha and Fuscasalua, with his great ordnance disordered the rereward of the enemies battell; and comming on couragiously with his whole armie, began a most cruell fight: which the Turkes a great while endured with wonderfull resolution; but now destitute of their wonted multitude (their greatest confidence) and hardly layed vnto by the Christians, they in the end turned their backes and fled; whom six thousand Hungarians and Germanes fiercely pursued, and had the killing of them almost to Buda. In this battell the Christians tooke all the enemies great Ordnance, with seuenteene ensignes, and also the Castle of Iasperin, which the Turks had for feare abandoned; wherein was found good store of victuals, certaine great pieces, with much other warlike prouision. Of this so notable a victorie Teuffenbach by Letters presently aduertised the Archduke, after he was againe returned to the siege of of Hatwan. Which letters because they containe many particularities and circumstances of this battell, I haue thought it not amisse here to insert.

The copie of the letters of the L. Teuffenbach, to Matthias the Archduke, Generall of the emperours armie against the Turks.

Although (said he) I haue by a speedie messenger vpon the very Kalends of May certified your Excellencie of the notable victorie which God of his great goodnesse gaue vnto vs the same day ouer our hereditarie enemie: yet afterward vpon diligent inquisition we vnderstood many particularities, as well of the Captiues themselues, as of the Inhabitants about Zolnocke, Pesth, and Buda; whereof I thought good to aduertise you. The Captiues themselues confesse, That the Bassa of Buda, with the Sanzackes of Zolnocke, Zarwacke, Giula, and Tschangrad, Cippato, Genne, and others, had with great celeritie raised an armie of thirteene thousand souldiers, amongst whom were many Tartars, with purpose to haue relieued the besieged Towne of Hatwan, and open the sudden to haue oppressed vs in our tents. Filled with which hope, they in great haste came with all their power the last of Aprill towards Hatwan: but forasmuch as they could not passe ouer the riuer Zagijwa by reason of the height of the water, they were the next day, being the first of May, conducted by the Captaine of Iasparin to a more commodious passage, so to come the neerer vnto vs, and the next day in the morning to haue surprised vs in our Tents. But our most mercifull God hath auerted this so great a mischiefe from vs, and turned it vpon their owne heads. For as it most constantly reported from Zolnocke, Pesth, and Buda, and confirmed by the Inhabitants of the same places, there are two thousand fiue hundred of the Turks slaine, and as many wounded, of whom many perished, and are found dead vpon the high-wayes leading to Pesth and Zolnocke: of these we haue sent a thousand heads to Cassouia, and caused many of the Turkes to be buried for feare of infection in this so great heate. Verily it was a bloudie battell; so that the old Souldiours say, they haue not remembred or seene the Turkes (no moe in number) to haue stood so long in battell, and to haue so fought it out without flying. Many men of great name and place there perished and fell, amongst [illegible] seemed the Sanzacket of Pesth. Nauigrade, and Temeske; Genne Alexius, Bogste, Mustafa, Marcianus, and certaine Chiaus lately [illegible] from the Court, with the Bassa his guard wherein were eight hundred right valiant soldiers, of whom [illegible] escaped with life. Many fell that would haue yeelded great ransome; but it was agreed vpon betweene the Germanes and the Hungarians, not to

to spare any of the enemies, but to put them all to sword; and that whosoeuer did otherwise, it should be imputed vnto him for dishonour. So that more than sixteene common souldiers, none were taken prisoners, of whome wee might learne how things went amongst the Turkes, with other circumstances of the battell. Wee tooke thirteene field pieces, whereof foure were greater than the rest, which they called organes, and foure and twentie of the enemies ensignes. The Bassa of Buda (beside other three wounds by him receiued) was grieuously wounded in the side. Of our men were lost about an hundred, and many of them most expert souldiers: and about six hundred others grieuously wounded, of whom there is small hope, many of them beeing alreadie dead. Neither is the losse small wee haue receiued in our horses and armour, for there be few amongst the Germane horsemen, which haue not lost one, two, or three, of their horses or seruants, whereby our horsemen are wonderfully weakened: yet was the victorie great, to God be the praise, to him be the glorie and thankes therefore. Let vs in the mean time prosecute the siege begun. The last night I commanded the water to bee drawne another way, so that now our trenches may be aduanced many paces, and bulwarkes raised within two hundred paces of the wall. Wee haue alreadie planted fiue great pieces of artillerie in one bulwarke, and hope the next night to place fiue moe vpon a mount fast by, and will doe what shall be needfull for a straight siege: and when time shall serue, vndertake the towne with all our power, God grant vs therein good successe and victorie.

The Turks in garrison at Zabola, a fort there by, discouraged with the ouerthrow of their friends, forsooke the fort; which for strength and greatnesse was comparable with Tocay or Erla. Which strong place the Christians without any losse now recouered.

Strigonium besieged by the Christians.

Whilest this valiant captaine the lord Teuffenbach thus lay at the siege of Hatwan, Matthias the Archduke General of the Christian army in Hungarie, incouraged with the good successe he had at Nouigrad, came with his armie (being 44000 strong) before Strigonium (sometime the Metropoliticall citie of Hungarie, but now of long a sure receptacle of the Turks) and the sixth of May encamped his armie about a quarter of a mile from the castle in a most pleasant medow, from whence both the citie and the castle were plainely to be seene. Vpon whom the Turks out of the castle, and three gallies that lay vpon the riuer, discharged certain great pieces without any great harme doing: but after the Christian fleet was a little before night come downe the riuer, and with their great ordnance began to answer them againe, the enemy ceased shooting, and lay still that night. In the meane time it fortuned, that a Turkish youth taken in a garden there by, and brought into the camp and examined, confessed that there was no garrison in the citie, more than foure hundred Ianizaries, and that a new supply was dayly expected from Buda. The Christians laboring that night, were by the breaking of the day, come with their trenches to a hil ouer against the castle, where they placed their batterie, and forthwith began to batter the citie. The same day (being the seuenth of May) two and twenty Turks heads were presented to the Archduke, and foure men taken aliue, newly sent out of the citie to haue viewed the Christian campe. About night certaine bals of wilde fire were shot into the citie, whereof one fell vpon the tower called S. Adelbert, and set it on fire; wherewith first the Church, and afterward a great part of the towne fell on fire. The Sanzacks house, with all his horses and armor, and a great quantitie of pouder was then burnt, and inestimable hurt don in the citie. The next day the Christians had with continuall batterie made a breach in the castle wall: but adioyning vnto the wall was an high and broad sandie rampier, which could hardly be battered: for all that the Germans gaue a fierce assault to the breach, hoping to haue entred by the ruins of the wall, but not being able to get ouer the sandie rampier, were inforced with losse to retire. The day following they bagan again the batterie with eighteen great pieces; when about eight a clocke in the morning, the Rascians that were in the old citie gaue the Generall to vnderstand, That if he would at a place by them appointed, assault the greater citie, to draw the Turks thither, they would in the mean time deliuer vnto the Christians certaine little posternes, and receiue them into the old citie; vpon condition, that no violence should be done vnto them or theirs. Which being so agreed vpon, the Christians accordingly gaue the assault the eleuenth of May in the euening, and by the help of the Rascians tooke the citie; who according to promise, were all taken to mercie, and the Turks slaine, except such as by their good hap recouered the new towne. The keeping of this citie was committed to the charge of two companies of Germane footmen, and six hundred Hungarians, with three ndred Rascians and other townesmen. Thus was the old citie of Strigonium gained by the G ristians, the suburbs whereof they presently burnt, neuertheless the new towne with the astle was still holden by the Turks. Wherefore the Christians hauing cast vp certaine trenches and mounts, and placed their artillerie as they thought most conuenient, began again to rage assailed the breach, which the Turks valiantly defended: so that the Christians were glad to retire, leaving behind them about an hundred & thirty of their fellowes slain in the breach.

The Turks a little before the comming of the Christians, had fortified an hill, whereunto the castle was something subiect, called of the Christians S. Nicholas his hill, this hill so fortified, the Christians with continuall batterie and assault gained the 17 of May, and put all the Turks left aliue therein to the sword; and turning the ordnance, from thence also battered the castle. H
The two and twentieth of May a little before the going downe of the Sun, certaine ensignes of footmen were drawne out of the campe, to haue the next day assaulted the lower towne; who taking the benefit of the night, attempting to haue entred the town in the dead time of the night, were notably encountered by the Turkes, sallying out of the towne vpon them. The Christians for all that hauing enforced them to retire, prosecuted their former resolution, and with much adoe got ouer the vttermost wall: but finding there contrarie to their expectation, such a deepe and broad countermure as was not possible to be passed, they stood as men dis-maid: neither could they in the darkenesse of the night, well see how to get backe againe ouer the towne ditch, but disorderly retiring, stucke fast many of them in the deepe mud, and there perished. In this assault there were about a thousand of the Christians wounded and slaine: and I albeit that they twice or thrice renewed the assault, yet preuailed they nothing, but were still repulsed with losse. Many also of the the Turkish garrison were likewise slaine; yea the Sanzacke himselfe hurt with a great shot, with many other wounded men sent downe the riuer to Buda, brought thither true newes of the aforesaid assaults, and of the state of the besieged.

The Rascians rise vp against the Turks. In the mean time news was brought to the c[illegible]nat Sinan Bassa the old enemie of the Christians, and the Turkes great Lieutenant, co[illegible]towards Hungarie with a great armie, and hauing by boates coueied ouer part thereof, was set vpon by the Rascians (these are poore oppressed Christians dwelling on both sides of Danubius, who weary of the Turkish thraldom and desirous of their antient libertie, haue oftentimes taken vp armes against the Turks as they now did, encouraged by the good successe of the C[illegible]ians on the other side of Hungarie) and K that after diuers skirmishes, they had taken thir[illegible] of the Turkes vessels, wherein besides victuals and certaine great pieces of artillerie, they [illegible]nd about 2400 weight of pouder, 447 hundred of lead, 46454 bundels of match, 1200 great shot, whereof 1005 were of 66 pound weight, and of small shot for harquebusiers 48500, with much other warlike prouision: a great part whereof was brought into the campe at Strigonium, and the rest reserued to future vses. This losse so troubled the great Bassa, that hee altered his purpose before entended for Cassouia.

The fourth of Iune, about fiue hundred Turks sent vp the riuer from Buda, conducted by two Sanzacks vnder two red and white ensignes, landed neere to Gokara on the further side of Danubius, ouer against Strigonium: where after they had a while refreshed themselues, and L left some few for the more assurance of the place, all the rest were conueied ouer the riuer into Strigonium: where they had been long looked for, the old garrison being now sore weakened by the former assaults. Foure daies after, the Turks encouraged with this supplie, sallied out vpon a sudden, and had entred one of the forts of the Christians; but were forthwith again repulsed, hauing lost six and twentie of their men, and two of their ensignes: not far off lay a troupe of horsemen, who if they had in time come in, not one of the Turks had escaped. Long it were to tell, how often and in what manner the Christians assaulted this citie, but were by Fiue thousand Christians lost at the siege of Strigonium. the Turks so receiued, that in fiue assaults they lost fiue thousand of their men, amongst whom were diuers captaines, lieutenants, antients, and others of good account: three and twentie canoniers were also slaine, and ten great pieces of artillerie so spoiled, as that they were no more M seruiceable. [illegible]on of this citie consisted for most part of the Ianizaries (the Turks best

A possible to be done for defence of the city. About the same time certain Turks chancing vpon a troupe of Germane horsemen, in sight slew about fiftie of them, and put the rest to flight: whereupon an alarme being raised in the campe, many ran out to the rescue of their fellowes, taking with them certaine small field pieces. Which the Turks perceiuing, began to flie: whom the Christians eagerly pursuing, were suddenly assailed by other Turks, sallying out of a fort fast by, and enforced shamefully to retire, and to leaue their field pieces behind them. Which the Turks seazing vpon, cloyed them, brake their carriages, and made them altogether vnseruiceable.

All this while the Lord Teuffenbach lying at the siege of Hatwan, about this time requested The Archduke sendeth aid to the siege of Hatwan.
aid of the Archduke, for that his power was with often conflicts, hunger, and other difficulties B alwaies attending long sieges, so much weakened, as that hee had scarcely six thousand sound men in his camp: to whom the Archduke forthwith sent twelue hundred footmen, being loth to spare any moe, for too much weakening of his owne armie.

Amurath disdaining to see the frontiers of his Empire in so many places impugned by the Christians, and daily to receiue from them so great harmes, sought by all means to be reuen-ged: wherefore beside the great power of his owne, which he was now about to send with Si- nan Bassa into Hungarie, he had also procured from the great Tartar a wonderfull number of those rough and sauage people, to be sent into Hungarie, there to ioine with his armie. These wild people, to the number of seuentie thousand, according to direction giuen, breaking into Podolia, Walachia, and Moldauia, gathered together an incredible number of oxen and kine; C to this end and purpose, that driuing them before them, they might both be assured of victuals, and the safer trauell through a part of Polonia. But when they were come vnto the borders of that countrie, and there found the power of Samoschie the great Chancellor and the Polonian Cossacks in armes, they easily perceiued that they could not that way passe without great losse. Wherefore they placed the aforesaid heards of cattell, some before, some behind, and some on each side of the army, and so inclosed round about with those cattell as with a trench, marched on. But when they were come neere vnto the Polonians, this rude deuice serued them to no other purpose than the ouerthrow of themselues; for the Polonians discharging their great ordnance, so terrified the cattell, that they turned vpon the Tartars; and ouerthrowing D whomsoeuer came in their way, did exceeding much harm: whom the Polonians immediatly following, and hardly charging the confused armie, armed only with bow and arrowes, after some small fight put them at last to flight, and obtained of them a notable victorie, with an exceeding rich prey. Of the Polonians were lost about eighteene hundred, but of the Tartars were slaine thirtie thousand. The rest retiring into Podolia, and passing the riuer Nester by the way of Transyluania, where they did exceeding much harme, came to Temesware, and so afterwards further into Hungarie: vnto whom the Turks sent seuen hundred horsemen, to conduct them to the armie.

But to returne againe to the siege of Strigonium. The foureteenth day of Iune the Christi- Strigonium assaulted.
ans betweene eight and nine of the clocke in the morning, with great fury assaulted the towne in three places: which assault they most notably maintained, vntill it was almost three a clock in the afternoone. Neuertheless, the Turks so valiantly defended themselues, that at last the E Christians were glad to giue ouer the assault, and with losse to retire. The Archduke from an high place beholding the assault, had one of his footmen slaine fast by him with a small shot.
Many of the Turks were also slain in this assault, and amongst them one of the three Sanzacks that defended the city. The night following there arose a most horrible tempest, with such raging wind, and abundance of raine, that many thought they should neuer haue seene day: with the violence whereof the Archdukes tent was ouerthrowne, and diuers others blown downe or rent in sunder, were in the aire carried from place to place. About the same time the Lord Palfi within the sight of the castle cast vp a notable fort, with high mounts and strong trenches (euen in the selfesame place where Solyman lay about fiftie yeares before, when he besieged & F woon Strigonium (by which fort so built, the enemie was embarred to conuey any thing vp the riuer for relief of the citie, to the great discomfiture of the besieged: for to haue hindred the which worke, the enemy oftentimes sallied out, but to no purpose. This fort being brought to perfection, the Christians tooke also another fort in an Island on the further side of the ri-uer, which the Turks had but few daies before taken from the Christians, & cloyed the great pieces therein: which fort the Christians now againe repaired, furnished it with a sufficient garrison and other great ordnance.

Strigonium fort battered.

These things thus done, the castle and the lower town were in fiue diuers places out of the new built fort, the old towne, and the Island, so battered with continual shot, that a man should haue said, that one stone would not haue been left vpon another, but that all should haue been beaten downe and laied euen with the ground. The seuenteenth of Iune one of the Christian canoniers so dismounted one of the great pieces in the castle, that the piece together with the Turkish canonier that had charge thereof fell downe out of the castle into the ditch. And the same day a mason that fled out of the castle into the camp, among other things reported, That many of the Turks were slaine with this continuall batterie and often assaults, and that not past an houre before, forty of them were slaine in one chamber, and now acknowledged themselues to be indeed besieged: and to haue resolued, that when they were brought to the last cast, then desperatly to sallie out vpon the Christians, and so either to returne with victorie, or to make shift euery man for himselfe as he might. Which his report seemed not altogether feigned: for about midnight a thousand of the Turks sallying out of the castle vpon the fort newly built vpon the riuer, in hope to haue surprised it, were by the Christians therein notably repulsed and inforced to retire; in which conflict fiftie of the Turks were slaine, and many mo wounded and taken prisoners. And the same day toward euening eight Turks of good sort being taken and brought into the camp, confessed, That but six daies before, they had seene seuen boats full of wounded and dead men sent downe the riuer from Strigonium to Buda. Whereby it was easily to be gathered, how bloudie a siege this was vnto the Turks, forasmuch as all those bodies were the bodies of men of good account and place; for the bodies of such common souldiers as were slaine, they still threw into the riuer running by.

The new built fort hardly assaulted by the Turks.

The fort newly built vpon the banke of Danubius, much troubled the besieged Turkes in Strigonium, because nothing could without danger of it be sent vp the riuer for their reliefe, Wherfore they by fit messengers sent word out of the castle to the Admirall of the Turks gallies lying below in the riuer, That he should at an appointed time come vp the riuer with his gallies as high as the fort, and on that side at least wise to make shew as if he would assault it: at which time they of the towne would be likewise ready to sally out, and to assaile it indeed on the other side by land. The Admirall accordingly came vp the riuer with his gallies, and by discharging of certaine great pieces, made shew as if he would on that side haue battered the fort: but was so welcommed thereout of, that he was glad with his rent gallies quickly to fall downe the riuer againe further off out of danger. But whiles the thundering shot was thus flying too and fro towards the riuer, they of the towne sallying out, assaulted the fort on the other side toward the land, and that with such desperat resolution, that some of them were got vp to the top of the rampiers, & there for the space of two houres maintained a most cruell fight: wherein many of them were slaine, and wounded, and the rest enforced with shame to retire.

The Christians thus still lying at the siege, & intentiue to all occasions; partly by their espials, and partly by such as they had taken prisoners, vnderstood, that a new supply both of men and victuals was shortly to be put into Strigonium: and therefore sent out certaine companies of souldiers, who lying in two conuenient places, the one vpon the riuer, the other by land, might intercept the said supply. Both which places were before by the prouident enemy possessed: who suddenly assailing the Christians comming thither, & fearing no such matter, slew some of them, & put the rest to flight: who neuertheles in their retreat, brake the bridge which the Turks had made of boats vnder the castle of Strigonium ouer Danubius. Of which boats some were carried away with the violence of the streame, and of the rest 30 fel into the hands of the Christians, without losse of any man more than fiue, who making too much haste, out of a little boat, fell into the riuer, and so perished. In this time, Fame the forerunner of all great attempts had brought newes into the Christian camp, That Sinan Bassa the Turks great Generall was comming to the reliefe of Strigonium: of whose power diuers diuersly reported. But the greater part doubting the worst, and wearie of the long siege and of the calamities incident thereunto, added still something to the last report, to make the danger of longer stay to seeme the greater: certaine it is, that the newes of the comming of so great and puissant an enemie raised many a troubled thought in the mindes of so great a multitude. Now were the besieged Turkes in great wants in Strigonium, as appeared by Letters intercepted from the Sanzacke

A zacke to the Bassa of Buda, declaring vnto him the hard estate of the besieged, and humbly craning his promised help, without which the citie could not for want of victuals possibly be defended by the fainting souldiers aboue three daies. Which letters being read in the camp, caused great preparation to be made for the continuing of the siege and the withstanding of the enemie, whose comming was euery houre expected. All this while the great ordnance neuer ceased on either side: whereby many were slaine, as well of the Christians as of the Turks; and amongst others many of the cannoniers.

But forasmuch as the rife fame of Sinan Bassa's comming encreased daily, and the Christian camp possessed with a general feare, gaue vnto the wise, iust suspition of some great mischiefe likely to ensue: Matthias the Generall entered into counsell with countie Ferdinand Hardeck, B the Lord Palfi, the lord Vngenade President of the counsell for the warres, and Erasmus Eraun Gouernour of Comora, What were best to be done in so dangerous a time. Who with generall consent agreed betimes, before the comming of Sinan, to raile the siege, and to remoue with the armie into some place of more safetie. Which their determinat resolution, the day following, beeing the six and twentieth of Iune, they made knowne to the other Princes and great commanders in the army: who wonderfully discontented therwith, especially the Germans; both openly by word, and solemnly by writing, protested against the same, as most dishonorable, and altogether made without their knowledge or good liking. To whom the President of the counsell for their further satisfaction, declared, That the enemie was comming with a very great army, and euen now at hand, whose strength encreased daily, and with what C power he had purposed to assaile them in their tents, was vncertain: besides that, it was manifestly knowne vnto the world, how that in the former assaults they had lost many of their best souldiers, beside others that died in the camp: and that the place wherein they lay encamped, was subiect to many dangers: for which so vrgent causes the Generall had resolued to raise his siege, and before the comming of so strong an enemy, to remoue his army into a place of more safety. Which reasons for al that did not so well satisfie the German princes and commanders, but that they still vrged their former protestation, requesting his excellencie to haue them excused before God and the World, if they yeelding to his command, as to their Generall, did that which they thought not altogether best, and which they would not otherwise haue done. For the more euidence whereof, the said German princes and great commanders caused their D said protestation to be solemnly conceiued in writing, which they firmed with their seales, and subscribed with their owne hands in order as followeth: Francis Duke of Saxonie, Augustus Duke of Brunswick, Sebastian Schlick, county Wigand Maltzan, Ernestus of Alstan, Henry Phlugk, Iohn Nicholas Ruswormb, Henry Curwigger Heerrath, Iohn Oberhausen, Henry Rottcirch, Melchior of Nothwith.

But the Archduke with the rest constant in their former resolution, first sent away the great ordnance, and raising the siege the 28 of Iune, followed after with the whole army, passing ouer Danubius not far from Kokara, doubtfully expecting what course Sinan the great Bassa (who was then reported to be euen at hand) would take. Yet before their departure they set the old E towne on fire, and rased the fort S. Nicholas, before taken from the enemie, which they had once purposed to haue kept. This vnexpected departure of the Christians much gladded the besieged Turks: who for want of victuals had not been able long to haue holden out. Yet lay the lord Teuffenbach still at the siege of Hatwan, labouring by all means to take from the besieged Turks their water, and with earth and faggots to fil vp their ditches; which worke he had now happily brought to some good perfection. Whereof they in the towne by letters aduertised the Bassa of Buda, and that except they were within the space of three daies relieued, they should bee enforced to yeeld the towne. Which their distresse the Bassa considering, with speed assembled all his forces, and so set forward to relieue them, hoping to haue come vpon the Christians before they were aware of his comming. But Teuffenbach vnderstanding therof, Fiue thousand Turks slaine.
F vpon him, fearing no such thing, slew fiue thousand of the Turkes, put the Bassa to flight; and together with the victory obtained an exceeding rich prey.

Hatwan in vain assaulted by the Christians.

Now was there no lesse expectation and hope of the winning or yeelding vp of Hatwan, than was before of Strigonium: but according to the chance of war it fell out otherwise. For Teuffenbach hauing with continuall batterie laied the breaches faire open, and made choice of such souldiers as he thought meetest for the assault, was in the performing thereof so notably repulsed by the Turkes, that he was glad to retire, with the losse of his best and most resolute soldiers: which put him out of all hope of taking the towne by force. For beside the losse of these good men, he had scarce so many sound men left, as might suffise to furnish his garrisons for defence of those frontiers: by reason that the Hungarians were almost al shrunk home, and of the Germans were left scarce two thousand. Besides that, he had oftentimes craued new supplies of the Archduke, but all in vain: for which causes he was glad to abandon two strong forts hee had built before Hatwan, and to leaue the towne, now brought to great extremitie. Thus two notable cities, which were now as it were in the hands of the Christians, & by the recouerie whereof, the broken state of the afflicted Christians in Hungarie had beene much strenthened, were as it were againe restored vnto the barbarous and cruell enemie.

Teuffenbach giueth ouer the siege of Hatwan.

Whilest the Christians thus lay at the siege of Strigonium and Hatwan, the Rascians (of whom we haue before spoken) striuing still more and more to rid themselues from the Turkish thraldome, gathered themselues together to the number of fifteene thousand, betweene Buda and Belgrade, vnder a Generall of their owne chusing. For feare of whom, the Bassa of Temeswar with an armie of fourteene thousand went to fortifie and victuall Lippa, doubting lest it should by them be surprised: but hauing done that he went for, in his returne hee was met with by the same Rascians, and twice fought withall in one day, and both times put to the worse, with the losse of the greatest part of his armie. After which victorie the Rascians tooke Beczkerek a strong towne standing in a marish foure miles from Belgrade, & slew al the Turks they found therein. After that, they tooke a castle called Ottadt, and dealt with the Turkes in like manner. From thence they went and besieged Beche, a Castle standing vpon the riuer Tibiscus or Teise, where the towne adioyning vnto it yeelded presently, but they in the castle standing a while vpon their guard, offered at last to yeeld also vpon certaine conditions. But the Rascians knowing that the Turkes thereabout had conueied into the castle the best part of their wealth, and withall that it was but weakely manned, would accept of no conditions, but needs haue it absolutely deliuered vp to their pleasure. In the mean time the old Bassa of Temeswar and his sonne, knowing it to tend to their dishonour to suffer this base people so to rage at their pleasure about them, gathered together 11000 Turkes, and so in great haste came to relieue the besieged castle. Vpon whom the Rascians turned themselues, and in plaine battell ouerthrew the Bassa, and so pursued the victorie, that of those 11000 Turkes scarcely escaped 1000: the Bassa himselfe being there slaine, and with him three Sanzacks, his sonne escaped by flight. In this battell the Rascians tooke 18 great pieces of artillerie: and not long after tooke also Werserza and Lutz, two strong places. After which so happie successe, they sent vnto the Archduke Matthias for aid, but especially for canoniers, professing themselues now vtter enemies vnto the Turkes. The Rascians also about Temeswar sent word vnto the other in the campe, that they would come and ioyne with them. And they which inhabit the countrey betweene the riuer Danubius and Tibiscus, by messengers sent of purpose vnto the Lord Teuffenbach (the Archdukes Lieutenant in the vpper part of Hungarie) offered in short time to send him ten or twelue thousand men, so that hee would receiue them and their countrie into the Emperors protection; which he easily granted them, and thereof assured them by writing. And to the Archduke himselfe they sent also their trustie messengers, requesting him to send them a Generall to lead them, promising vnto him all obedience: which messengers departing from them the fourteenth of Iune, shortly after returned with such answer as was thought most conuenient for their present state. Thus against the comming of Sinan, was Hungarie almost all on a broile.

A diet of the empire holden at Ratisbone for the withstanding of the Turkes

The Emperor long before distrusting the Turks purpose for war, and wel considering what a difficultie it would be for him with his owne forces onely to withstand so puissant an enemy as was Amurath, had by his Embassadors praied aid of diuers Christian Princes, but especially of them of the Empire, as those whom this war concerned most. Wherefore he after the antient and woonted manner of his State in so common and imminent a danger, appointed a generall assembly of the Princes and States of the Empire, to be holden at Ratisbone, in the latter end of Februarie: which for sundrie vrgent causes was put off vntill March, and againe vntill Aprill, and so afterward vntill May. At which time the Emperour in person himselfe, with the Princes Electors, and other the great States of the Empire, being met together with great pompe

A pompe at Ratisbone, and solemnely assembled in the Bishops palace, began there to sit in counsell the second of Iune. Vnto which Princes and States to assembled, after that the Emperour had first by the mouth of Philip Countie Palatine of the Rhine, giuen great thanks for their so readie apparance, & briefly declared the cause of their assembly; he himselfe after some complaint made of the Turkish infidelitie, in expresse words declared vnto them, how that he by his embassador then lying at Constantinople, had in the yeare 1591 made a league for eight yeares, with the present Turkish Sultan Amurath: which league Amurath himselfe had approued and confirmed, and thereof sent him publike and solemne instruments: wherein it was prouided, That no hostility should be on either side during that time attempted. And yet notwithstanding that, he, contrary to his faith giuen, as an hereditarie enemie of the Christians, had violated this league, and by sundrie incursions barbarously spoiled and wasted, not Hungary only,

The Emperour grieuously complaineth vnto the Princes Electors & States of the Empire of the infidelitie of the Turke, & craueth their aid.

B but other of his Imperial prouinces also: but especially by Hassan Bassa of Bosna, who first with a strong armie besieged, battered, and tooke Repitz an antient frontier castle, & after that, Wihitz, Drenik, Crassowitz, with other places of name; and had in his dominion and territorie built Petrinia, a most strong fort, hurtfull to all that country, out of which he had done incredible mischiefe in Croatia, Windismarch, and the most fruitfull Island Turopolis; and had out of those places carried aboue 35000 Christians into most miserable captiuity. Of which shameful iniuries and breach of faith he had many times by his Embassadors complained vnto the Turkish Sultan at Constantinople; and requested, that all hostility set apart, due restitution might haue bin made: but to haue therein preuailed nothing: and that the same Bassa in stead of

C condigne punishment, had bin for the doing thereof honored by the great Sultan his lord with honorable gifts, the sure tokens of his fauor. Whereby he was so confirmed in his barbarous proceedings, that he began to make open war, and hauing raised a full armie, and strengthened also with certaine companies of Ianizaries sent from the Court, had passed ouer the riuer Kulp, and besieged the castle of Sisek: but by the iust iudgement of God the reuenger of wrongs, had there receiued the reward of his faithlesse and cruell dealing, being there [illegible] and almost all his armie vtterly destroyed by his small forces, raised in haste for his owne full defence. Neuertheless the faithlesse Turke (as if he had bin highly wronged himselfe) haue made this his breach both of league and faith forthwith knowne to all the world

D commanding open war to be solemnly proclaimed against the kingdome of Hungarie, [illegible] Constantinople and Buda: and by the Beglerbeg of Græce to haue [illegible] the strong Fortresse of Sisek. Wherein on the other side, because nothing should be wanting, which might make his defiance of peace more known, [illegible] times by his Embassador put the Turke in remembrance of [illegible] his Faith. Who for all that had regarded nothing of his [illegible] Bassa, with the Beglerbeg of Græcia and many [illegible] garie, who with fire and sword enforced the Christians [illegible] left alone to serue the Turke, [illegible] tooke Vesprimium and [illegible] Bassa by commandement [illegible] imprisoned Eugenius Erasmus [illegible]

nt of the Princes Electors of the sacred Empire, appointed that present Diet of the Empire; G and not for the aforesaid causes only, but for diuers others both necessarie and weightie also:
as the general peace of the empire, the pacification of the Low-countries, the reformation of justice, and amendment of the coine: but especially & aboue all other things, to make it known vnto the world how much it concerned to haue the Turks pride betime abated, and some effectual defence for Hungarie (now in danger) at length prouided; being the most sure defence and strongest bulwarke of that part of Christendome. And that whereas his owne hereditarie prouinces were not of themselues alone sufficient to maintaine so chargeable a war, he therefore requested the Electors, Princes, and States both present and absent, not to grudge to be present with their helpe, their counsell, and whatsoeuer els should be needfull against so puissant and dangerous an enemie. So ending his speech, he caused all his demands before conceiued into writing, to be read, and so deliuered vnto them. For answer whereunto the Princes Electors and others there present required time. Which granted, after many sittings and long H consultations they at last with one consent answered, That it was a hard matter, by reason of the late dearth and other like occasions, for them to grant such helpe and aid as the Emperour had in writing required: yet hauing before their eyes the great and imminent danger wherin the Christian commonweale then stood, they not regarding their owne proper and neere difficulties, had in regard of his sacred and Imperial Majestie, for the comfort and defence of the endangered Christians, and for the repressing of the Turkish furie, of their owne free will and meere compassion, granted beside their accustomed contribution, such further reliefe for the space of six yeares, as they thought sufficient for the maintenance of a defensiue war, both for the present and for the time to come. What was by them further decreed concerning the Em- I perors other demands, as not pertinent to our purpose, we willingly passe ouer.

Of all these things, as also whatsoeuer els had hapned at Strigonium, Hatwan, or other places of Hungarie, was not Sinan Bassa ignorant: who now euen vpon the departure of the Christians from Strigonium, was come with an huge army before Buda and Alba-Regalis: vnto whom fortie thousand Tartars, that by force had made themselues way thorow Podolia and the vpper part of Hungarie, had joined themselues: so that in his armie were reckoned aboue 150000 fighting men; to the great terror not only of Hungarie, Austria, Stiria, Croatia, Bohemia, and the prouinces thereabout, but also of the whole State of Germanie. With this great armie the old Bassa had purposed to haue ouerwhelmed the Christians in their campe at K Strigonium: but now that they were before his comming departed ouer the riuer towards Comara, he resolued to keepe on his way, and to besiege the strong citie Iaurinum, now called Rab. And to make all sure before him, he thought it best to take in his way Dotis, a strong towne of the Christians in the mid way betweene Strigonium and Rab, about fiue Hungarian miles short of Rab. The Christian armie but newly passed ouer Danubius, in marching toward Comara, might see the mountaines and fields on the other side of the riuer all couered with the multitude of the Turks armie: who though they were indeed many, yet marching disperssedly, made shew of more than in truth they were. So both armies marching in sight the one of the other, and seperated only with the riuer, held on their way, the Christians to Comara, where they encamped vnder the very walls of the citie, yet in such sort as that they might afar L off well descrie one another: and the Turks towards Dotis, where the Bassa with all his armie encamped the 21 day of Iuly. The night following, hauing planted his batterie, he began in furious manner to batter the castle, the chiefe strength of the towne, the Christian armie looking on, but not daring at so great odds to relieue their distressed friends. So whilest the Bassa granteth no breathing while vnto the besieged, but tyring them out with continuall batterie and alarmes, they of the towne dispairing of their owne strength, and to be able for any long time to hold out against so mightie an enemie, within three dayes after yeelded vp the towne, being in that short time sore battered, and in diuers places vndermined: yet with this condition, That it should be lawfull for the garrison souldiers and townesmen with their wiues and children, in safetie to depart. Which was vnto them by the Bassa franckly granted, but not so M faithfully performed: for at their departure many of their wiues and children were stayed by the Turks, and the Lord Baxi gouernor of the towne cruelly entreated. Immediatly after, the Bassa without much ado tooke the castle of S. Martins also, not far from Dotis, being by the Captaine yeelded vnto him.

Sinan Bassa with an army of 150000 betweene Buda & Alba-Regalis.

Dotis and S. Martins yeelded vnto the Turkes.

In

A In the meane time the country villages round about forsaken of the poore Christians, were by the Turks most miserably burnt, and all the countrey layd waste. Yea some of the forerunners of the Turks armie passing ouer the riuer Rabnitz, ran into the country as far as Altenburg within fiue miles of Vienna, burning the country villages as they went, and killing the poore people, or that worse was, carrying them away into perpetual captiuitie: yet not without some losse, foure hundred of these roaming foreiners being cut off by the Lord Nadasti. Palsi also, and Brun gouernor of Comara, following in the taile of the Turkes armie, set vpon them that had the charge of the victuals, of whom they slew a great number, tooke 120 of them prisoners, and 150 camels, and thirtie mules laded with meale and rice, which they carried away with them to Comara.

B Dotis and S. Martins thus taken, Sinan Bassa constant in his former determination, set forward againe towards Rab, and being come within a mile of the citie, there encamped; the Christian armie then lying not far off on the other side of the riuer. The citie of Rab is a strong & populous citie, honored with a Bishops See, and was worthily accounted the strongest bulwarke of Vienna, from whence it is distant about twelue Germane miles, standing vpon the South side of Danubius, whence the riuer diuiding it selfe, maketh a most fertile Island called Schut; in the East point whereof standeth the strong citie of Comara. The defence of this citie of Rab was committed to Countie Hardeck, a man of greater courage than fidelitie, with a garrison of twelue hundred choice soldiers; vnto whom a little before the comming of the Bassa were certaine companies of Italians joined, who together with the citisens, made vp the num- Rab.
C ber of fiue thousand able men: a strength in all mens judgement sufficient for the long defence of that place. The last of Iuly, Matthias the Archduke about the going downe of the Sun departing out of the citie of Rab, ouer the riuer into the Island ouer against it, came Sinan Bassa with his huge armie and beset it round, casting vp trenches and mounts, whereon he skilfully placed his gabions and great artillerie, and whatsoeuer els was necessarie for so great a siege: and that with such celeritie as was to the beholders thought most strange. The second of August he with great furie battered the citie, and brought his trenches within musket shot of the walls. At which time foure thousand Tartarian horsemen swam ouer the Danubius betweene Rab and Comara, after whom followed six thousand Turkes, who being with much adoe got ouer to the farther side, suddenly surprised a fort of the Christians next vnto the riuer, and D forthwith turning fiue great pieces of ordnance which they found therein, discharged them vpon the campe of the Christians: who terrified with the sudden accident, rise vp all in arms, and hardly charging those desperat aduenturers, slew many of them, especially such as seeking after bootie, had dispersed themselues from their fellowes, and forced the rest againe to take the water, wherein most of them perished. About fiue dayes after, the Tartarians (liuing for most part vpon prey) swam againe ouer the riuer, and vpon the sudden burnt a village in the Island, and slew certaine Christians in their tents; but being quickely encountered by the Christian horsemen, they were easily ouerthrowne and many of them slaine: the rest casting away their weapons, and forsaking their horses, ran headlong into the riuer, trusting more to their swimming than to their fighting: whom the Christians hardly pursuing, in the verie Ri- The Tartarians the second time ouerthrowne.
E uer slew about 2000 of them; and by this victorie obtained many of the Tartarians swift horses, with their scimiters, their bowes and arrowes, and such ensignes as they had. All this while Rab battered. Sinan Bassa without intermission lay thundering with 60 great pieces of batterie against the citie; but to little or small purpose, for as yet he had made no breach whereby to enter, but the harme that was done, was vpon the towers, or high built houses, or in the campe, by such randome shot as flying ouer the towne, fell by chance among the tents of the Christians. And the Ianizaries intentiue to all opportunities, in a great raine furiously and with a most horrible cry (as their manner is) assaulted an vtter bulwarke of the Christians, which they for feare forsook and retired themselues into the citie. Vpon which bulwarke so taken the Ianizaries had set vp three of their ensignes; when the Christians ashamed of that they had done, and better aduised, taking courage vnto them, forthwith sallied out againe, and couragiously charging the Ia-F nizaries, but now entred, slew many of them, and recouered againe the bulwarke. A Bassa slaine.

Sinan Bassa leauing nothing vnattempted that might further his desire for the winning of the citie, was now casting vp a great mount against the citie: which whilest he daily surueyed, he chanced to fall sick, and therefore appointed one of the Bassa's in his own stead to ouersee the worke; vorke; who whilest he was walking too and fro hastening the worke, and commanding this G and that thing to be done, he was taken with a shot out of the towne and slaine.

The fifteenth of August certaine Turks before the rising of the Sun getting ouer Danubius in boats, assailed a fort of the Christians: which the soldiers that had the keeping of it, presently forsooke and left it to the enemie. Which Iohn de Medices, lately come into the campe with two thousand Italians, perceiuing, forthwith came to the rescue of the fort, draue out the Turks, and hauing slaine diuers of them, forced the rest into the riuer, where they were all drowned. At which time fiue thousand Tartars in another place passing ouer the riuer into the Island, were encountered by the Lord Palfi and the Hussars his followers, and without any great resistance put to flight, wherein many of them were slaine: the rest taking the riuer, were A fight in the Riuer betwixt the Turks and the Tartars. in good hope to haue got ouer, and so to haue saued themselues: but other Turkes meeting H them in the riuer, would with their weapons haue beaten them backe and stayed their flight: against whom the Tartars opposing themselues, made with them in the very riuer a most cruel fight, but with such losse vnto the Tartars, that of the fiue thousand which aduentured ouer, few returned to carrie newes vnto their fellowes, how they had sped. Now began great scarcitie of victuals in the Turks campe, so that the souldiers were faine to feed vpon vnripe fruit, and such other vnwholesome things; whereof ensued the bloudie flix and many other dangerous diseases: which raging amongst them, did wonderfully consume the Bassa's army. Beside that, they of the citie with continual shot had slaine many, and amongst them a son in law of the great Bassa's, whose death he is reported to haue taken so vnpatiently, that he fell sicke for griefe, but in short time after passed it ouer and recouered againe. I

The Tartars not yet warned by their often losses, but passing againe ouer the riuer into the Island the 19 of this moneth, were there 3000 of them slaine. In the meane time certain companies also of the Turks hauing secretly passed the riuer, in another quarter assailed the Christians in their campe: in which hurly-burly other of the Tartars got ouer the riuer not far from Comara, hoping now at length to performe some great matter, which they had before to their cost vainly attempted. But finding the Turks ouerthrowne before their comming, & the Christians (contrarie to their expectation) in armes readie to receiue them, they were easily discomfited, and two thousand of them slaine. In this conflict the Sanzacke of Strigonium, with two others, and many moe of great account among the Turks, perished. Shortly after, the Christians sallying out of the citie, slew a great number of the Turkes, and so retyred with small K losse. Thus was the Turks armie dayly diminished, besides that the want of victuals with the bloudie flix so increased, that many perswaded the Bassa to haue raised his siege, and to haue remoued with his armie to some other more wholesome place and of greater plentie: but he resolutely set down not to depart before he had either woon the towne, or enforced them therein to yeeld, would not hearken to any persuasions to the contrarie.

Whilest Sinan thus lay at the siege of Rab, Maximilian the Emperors brother tooke Crastowitz a fortresse of the Turks vpon the borders of Croatia, and put to sword all the Turkes there in garrison. After that, he laid siege to Petrinia, a strong fortresse of the Turks, which they but a few yeares before had contrarie to the league built in the Emperors territorie, for the annoying of Croatia, and for the exceeding strength thereof was thought almost impregna- L ble. Yet such was the industrie of Maximilian and his souldiers, that what with continual batterie and mines, they so terrified the Turks there in garrison, that they for feare set fire on the fort, and flying away by night, made shift euery man for himselfe as he might. Which they in the castle of Siseg hearing, set fire also vpon it, and so left it to the Christians. Whose example they also of Gara followed: by which so prosperous and happie successe of Maximilians, not the frontiers only, but euen the whole country of Croatia was for that time deliuered of a wonderfull trouble and no lesse danger.

A great skirmish betwixt the Turks and the Christians. The eight and twentieth day of August twentie thousand of the Christians passing ouer the riuer by a bridge out of the Island, and ioyning with them of the Towne, sallied out vpon the M Turks campe. The Hungarian Heidons in the foreward at the first onset tooke two of the Turks bulwarks, and hauing beaten out the enemies, cloyed certaine of their great pieces: but the Turks returning with greater power, enforced the Christians to retire, & recouered again their lost bulwarkes. In this conflict many were slaine, as well Christians as Turkes. In the meane while Thonhause a great captain of the Christians, and Geitzhofer, Countie Hardeck his lieutenant,

A nant, with 1500 Hungarians and German foot came in great boats to haue holpen their fellowes, but landing somewhat too late, they were by the enemie beaten backe, and enforced with such speed to retire, that many of them being not able to recouer the boats, were drowned in the riuer, amongst whom Geitzhofer himselfe perished, and Thonhause was deadly wounded in his brest. Yet the Christians not discouraged with this losse, but gathering themselues together vnder the very walls of the citie, gaue a second assault vnto the enemie. In the foreward were the footmen, who were by the enemies horsmen easily repulsed; but by the comming in of the Lord Rhinsberg (who was at the first onset slaine) the Turks were enforced into their trenches, except some few, which diuided from the rest, hid themselues in the Vineyards, but being found out by the Christians, were there all slaine. In this skirmish the Lord
B Palfi was grieuously wounded in his thigh. Of the Christians were slaine 400, and of the Turks about 2000. These conflicts endured from seuen a clocke in the morning, vntil twelue, Two thousand Turks slain, & 17 of their Ensignes taken. at which time the Christians returning into the citie, and so into the campe, amongst other spoiles, carried away with them seuenteene of the enemies ensignes.

No day now passing without some skirmish, at length the ninth of September 10000 Turks, some in boats, some by other meanes, hauing got ouer the riuer of Danubius into the Island of Schut, suddenly set vp the Christians, all sleeping in securitie, and little fearing any such danger: of whome they slew about two thousand, and after some small fight put the rest to most shamefull flight, in such sort, that Matthias the Archduke himselfe with the other noblemen and captaines had much ado by flight to escape. Thus whilest euery man surprised with feare, C made what shift he could for himselfe; the enemie in the mean time entred the trenches, tooke their tents, their great ordnance, the shot and pouder, and all the mony which but a little before was brought for the soldiers pay; besides about a thousand waggons and two hundred boats well loaded with prouision for the campe, and ten gallies, wherein were an hundred and twentie pieces of great ordnance. The losse receiued this day was valued at 500000 duckets. And A great spoile taken by the Turks.
albeit that this victorie cost the Turks two thousand and fiue hundred of their liues, yet thereby they gained the masterie both vpon the riuer and the land, so that now roming far & neere without resistance, they spoiled the countrey all about, and burnt certaine countrey villages not far from Vienna: so that for many miles space the countrey townes were for feare of the D enemie forsaken by the inhabitants; of whom some were taken and slaine, some carried into captiuitie, and some others (reserued to a better fortune) with such things as they had, got themselues farther off into places of more securitie. And the more to encrease these calamities, the Tartars shortly after passing ouer Danubius neere vnto Altenburg, first sacked Weisenburg, and after burnt it, with certaine towns thereabout: but aduenturing to haue gone farther into the countrey, they were with losse enforced to returne.

Whilest the Turkes thus preuaile in Hungary, Cicala Bassa the Turkes Admirall then at sea with a fleet of gallies, landing his men in diuers places of Italie, did exceeding much harm, but especially in Calabria, where he vpon the sudden surprised Rhegium, rifled the towne, and afterwards burnt it. From thence taking his course towards Sicilia, hee in the sight of Messana landed certaine of his men; who aduenturing too far ashore, were by the country people ouer- Rhegium raced by the Turks. throwne and put to flight. So the Turks returning againe to Rhegium, vtterly raced what they E had before left of that towne. In the mean time not far from Messana, euen in the sight of the garrison of the towne, they tooke a certaine ship comming out of the East countries, and three other comming from Apulia. Afterward chancing vpon certaine gallies of the East, they changed some few shot with them, but to no great purpose: and so turning their course, and sailing alongst the coast of Calabria, they oftentimes landed certaine companies, which skirmishing with the Calabrians, had sometime the better, and sometime the worse, and so with such fortune as befell them, were againe receiued into their gallies. They of Messana, vnto whose eyes those dangers were daily presented, both by letters and speedie messengers gaue the Viceroy knowledge thereof (who then for his pleasure lay at Palermo) requesting his present aid: but he F dallying off the time, they for the more safegard of the citie and of the sea coast, of themselues raised fiue hundred horsemen, whom they committed to the leading of Philip Cicala, the renegate Turkish Admiralls brother; and beside stored the Citie with all such things as they thought necessarie for the enduring of a siege, if it should chance the Turke to haue any such purpose: of all which they certified the King of Spaine, as also of the negligence of the Viceroy,

Viceroy, requesting his speedie aid against these terrors of the Turks. In the meane while the Neapolitans for safegard of their coast put to sea 30 gallies: vnto whom the Pope, the Duke of Florence, the Genowaies, and the Knights of Malta joined also theirs, in all to the number of about 80 gallies, vnder the conduct of Auria. The prouident Venetians also, although they were as then in league with the Turke; yet for the safetie of their State put to sea a fleet of about an hundred saile, some ships, some gallies, vnder the leading of Foscarin their Admiral. Which two fleets sailing vp and downe those seas, deliuered Italie, Sicilie, Dalmatia, with many prouinces and Islands of the Christians, of a great feare.

Rab assaulted by the Turkes.

Sinan Bassa hauing before encouraged his soldiers with great hope and large promises, commanded an assault to be giuen to the citie of Rab: which was accordingly by them begun the 23 of September, the Sun being as yet scarce vp, and furiously maintained all that day from morning vntil night. But they of the towne so valiantly defended themselues, that at last the Turks were glad to giue ouer the assault, and with losse to retire. Neuertheless the next day the assault was again renewed, & most desperatly continued by the space of two daies: wherein 12000 of the Turks there lost their liues, the other with shame retiring themselues into their trenches. In few days after, the Turks by a mine blew vp one of the bulwarks of the town, with the fall whereof the towne ditch was in that place somwhat filled: whereby the Turks with all their power attempted thrice the next day to haue entered, but were by the valour of the defendants still notably with losse repulsed. Yet notwithstanding all this cheerefulnesse and couragiousnesse of them in the towne, the puissant enemy ceased not with continual batterie and furious assaults to attempt the citie, vntill that at length he had gained two of the bulwarks, from whence he might to his great aduantage, by the rubbish and earth fallen out of the battered bulwarks and rampiers, haue accesse vnto the towne, to the great terror of the defendants. Whereupon Countie Hardeck the gouernor (who corrupted by the Turke, had of purpose many times before said that the towne could not possibly be long defended) now tooke occasion to enter into counsel with the other captains of the towne (diuers of whom he had alreadie framed to his purpose) what course were best to take for the yeelding of it vp. And so after a little consultation, holden more for fashion sake, than for that he doubted what to doe; resolued to send a messenger vnto the Bassa, for a truce to be granted for a while, to see if haply in the meane time some reasonable composition might be agreed vpon. Yet the gouernor considering into what scorne and danger he should expose himselfe, by yeelding vp of so strong a towne; to colour the matter, and to excuse his doings vnto the rest of the nobilitie and garrisons of Hungary, caused a publike instrument to be made in his and all the rest of the Captains names conceiued in writing: wherin they solemnly protested vnto the world, That forasmuch as it was impossible (by reason of the weakenesse of the garrison) for them longer to defend the town against so mighty an enemy, without new supplies in stead of them that were slain (which they had oftentimes in vaine requested) they were therefore of necessity enforced to come to composition with the enemie. Which protestation so made, the gouernor with the chiefe captains confirmed with their hands and seals. So after a truce granted, and pledges giuen on both sides, at length it was agreed vpon, That all the garrison soldiers, together with the County and other captains, should in armes with ensignes displaied with bag and baggage depart in safety, and with a safe conuoy be brought to Altenburg. Which agreement, though by oath confirmed, was not on the Turks part altogether performed: for when the County had the 29 day of September at 10 a clocke in the forenoone deliuered vp the city to the Bassa, and the Christian garrison was all come out, the Countie himselfe with a few of his friends was with a conuoy of Turks brought in safety to the appointed place: but the Italians and other garison soldiers that came behind, and ought to haue bin by the gouernor protected, were contrarie to the Turks promise, spoiled of all that they had, and hardly escaping with life, came that night to Hochstrate, and the next day to Altenburg. Thus was Rab, one of the strongest bulwarkes of Christendome, traiterously deliuered vnto the most mortal enemy of the Christian religion; being euen then when it was giuen vp, victualled for a yeare, and sufficiently furnished with all things necessarie for defence: all which prouision, together with the citie, fell into the hands of the faithlesse enemy. A losse neuer to haue bin sufficiently lamented, had it not bin about foure yeares after, euen as it were miraculously againe recouered, to the great rejoycing of all that side of Christendome, as in the processe of this Historie shall appeare.

Sinan

Sinan glad of this victorie, as the greatest trophey of his masters glorie ouer the Christians, gaue him speedie knowledge therof, both by letters and messengers. Of whom he was for that good seruice highly commended, and afterward bountifully rewarded: for now had Amurath alreadie in hope deuoured all Austria, with the Prouinces thereabout. The great Bassa, because hee would not with too long stay hinder the course of his victorie, without delay repaired the rent citie, new fortified the battered bulwarkes, enlarged the ditches, and filled the Cathedral church with earth, in maner of a strong bulwarke, wherupon he planted great store of great ordnance: and with exceeding speed dispatched all things necessary for the holding of the place. In the meane time he sent certaine Tartars to summon the towne and castle of Pappa; which castle and little town subiect thereunto, the Christians the night following, set on fire, because it should not stand the enemy in any stead for the farther troubling of the country; and so fled.

Rab repaired by the Turke.

Komara besieged by Sinan Bassa.

The Bassa hauing at his pleasure disposed of al things in Rab, and leauing there foure thousand Ianizaries, and two thousand horsemen in garrison, departed thence with his army & laid siege to Komara, a strong towne of that most fertile Island which the Hungarians call Schut; which scituated in the very point therof about foure miles from Rab, is on the East, South, and North, inclosed with the two armes of Danubius. All these waies Sinan with his fleet (which he had there notably well appointed) laied hard siege vnto the towne, and gaue thereunto diuers assaults: and by land, the Beglerbeg of Græce ceased not both by continuall batterie and mines, to shake the wals and bulwarks thereof. Thus was the citie on all sides both by water & by land hardly laied vnto. But the Christians within, with no lesse courage defended themselues and the city, than did the Turks assaile them; shewing indeed, that the liberty of their religion and country, was vnto them dearer than their liues. Matthias the Archduke in the mean time, not ignorant how much it concerned the emperor his brother to haue this city defended, hauing after his late ouerthrow gathered together a good army of Germans, Bohemians, and Hungarians, resolued to go and raise the siege: and so marching forward with his army, came and encamped the 28 day of October at Nitria, about fiue miles from Komara. Now were the Tartars a little before departed from the camp, with purpose to returne home: yea the Turks themselues wearie of the siege, and wanting victuall both for themselues and their horses, began also as men discouraged to shrinke away. Which the Bassa wel considering, thought it not best with his heartlesse souldiers and army now sore weakened, to abide the comming of the Christians: and therfore vpon their approch he forthwith forsooke the city, which he had by the space of three weeks hardly besieged, and by a bridge made of boats transported his army and artillerie ouer Danubius to Dotis, where he the next day after brake vp his army. Immediatly after the Turkes were thus departed, the Archduke arriued at Komara, where he with great diligence caused the breaches to be repaired, the mines to be filled vp, & new bulwarks and rampiers to be made in diuers places for the more strength of the citie, leauing the charge thereof still vnto the lord Erasm the old Gouernor, who in the defence therof had receiued a grieuous wound in his right knee: of whom also this notable fact is reported. The Bassa in time of the late siege of Komara, vnder the colour of a parley, had sent fiue Turks into the city, to the Gouernor, but indeed to proue if he were by any means to be woon to yeeld vp the citie, and not to hold it out to the last. The faithfull Gouernor, hauing giuen them the hearing vntil they had discharged their whole trecherie, presently caused foure of their heads to be stricken off, and to be set vpon long pikes vpon one of the bulwarkes for the Bassa to looke vpon; but the fift (the beholder of this tragedie) he sent backe vnto the Bassa, to tell him, That although hee had found one in Rab to serue his turne, he was much deceiued, if in him hee thought to finde Countie Hardeck, and that he wished rather to die the Emperors faithfull seruant in the bloud of the Turks, than to betray the city committed to his charge.

Sinan Bassa raiseth his siege.

Countie Hardeck late Gouernour of Rab, generally before suspected to haue treacherously betraid that strong towne vnto the Bassa, was therefore sent for to Vienna, & there by the Emperors commandement committed to prison. Where among many things laid to his charge, as that hee should in the beginning of the siege negligently haue suffered many things to bee done by the enemy, which afterwards turned to the great danger of the towne: and that in the time of the siege, he had caused some of the canoniers to discharge certain great pieces against the enemie, with powder only without shot: and that seeing one piece among the rest to do the

...mie much harme, he had caused the same to be remoued, and so placed, as that it serued to little or no vse: beside that, he (as it should seem) making small reckoning of the towne, should oftentimes say, That if the Turkes should win it, he should be but one towne the richer: with diuers other such things, giuing iust cause of suspition. The thing that lay most heauy vpon him, was the ... ony of one of Sinan Bassa his chamber, who being taken yong by the Turks, and seruin... Bassaes chamber, was now fled from the Turks, and comming to the Archduke in the time of his siege, declared vnto him, that there was treason in his campe: and that he but three daies before by the commandement of his master, had deliuered two bags full of duckats vnto two Christians, of whom the one had a notable scarre in his face, and was afterwards knowne to haue bin one of the Counties seruants. Vpon this and such like proofes, the Countie was after many daies hearing, in open court, by the iudgement of seuen and forty noblemen and captains of name, condemned of treason, and adiudged to be hanged, his dead body to remaine vpon the gallowes by the space of three daies, and all his lands and goods to be confiscat: the rigor of which sentence was afterward by the Emperor mitigated, and the traitor by him adiudged to haue his right hand (by him before giuen vnto the Emperor, in pawne of his faith) and his head strucke off vpon a scaffold at Vienna, and so buried. Which seuere sentence was afterwards accordingly put in execution: for the tenth of Iune following, the traitor being brought to the scaffold built of purpose in the hie street of Vienna, after the sentence of his condemnation there solemnly read, commending himselfe vpon his knees to the mercy of God, with his eies couered, and his right hand laied vpon a blocke couered with blacke, had both his hand & head so suddenly strucke off by the executioners, as that the beholders could hardly iudge which of them was first off. His dead body with his head and hand, was presently by his seruant wrapped in a blacke cloth, and layed in his coach, which stood there by of purpose couered with blacke, and was afterwards buried amongst his ancestors.

Bonaty Hardeck condemned & executed for betraying of Rab.

The Tartars but lately before departed from Sinans campe, passing ouer Danubius at Strigonium, had purposed through the vpper part of H...garie, and by the borders of Transyluania and Moldauia, to haue againe returned into th... untry: of whom two companies falling into the hands of the lord Palfi, were by him cut off ... vtterly defeated: the rest comming vnto the borders of Transyluania, and finding the passages so beset by the Prince and the Vaynod of Valachia, as that they could not without most manifest danger passe that way, returned againe the same way they came: and hauing ribe... and burnt certaine townes and villages in the vpper Hungarie about Tockaie, passed the riuer againe at Strigonium, and wintering at Vesprinium, Palotta, and other places in the Countrey which is about Rab, liued vpon the spoyle of the poore distressed Christians, vpon the frontiers of Austria, euen as farre as Meinerstorf.

These Tartars (of whom we haue so often spoken) at their first comming to the aid of Sinan, by direction from the Turkish Sultan, staied vpon the frontiers of Transyluania, of purpose to haue surprised that country, and either to haue thrust Sigismund Bator the yong prince out of the gouernment thereof, or else to haue sent him in bonds to Constantinople: for it was commonly reported, That he wearie of the heauie tribute which he yerely payed vnto the Turke, and had now after their greedie manner been diuers times enhaunsed; had purposed to reuolt from the Turkish Sultan, and to enter into confederation with the Christian Emperor. Which innouation and change, certaine of the Nobilitie and chiefe States of Transyluania, sought by all means to hinder: and acquainting Amurath with the matter, and entring into conspiracie with the Tartars, vndertooke to deliuer the whole country into their hands, & to send the Prince prisoner to Huft, where the Tartars then lay vpon the borders encamped. Wherefore dissembling their purpose, they cunningly perswaded the Prince, that Samosche the great Chancellor of Polonia, in the confines of his countrey lay with a great power expecting his comming, to consult with him of matters of great importance. And the better to colour this their trecherie, they had counterfeited letters to that effect from the Chancellor to the Prince, and had wrought so effectually, that the Prince not suspecting any such treason, gaue credit to their perswasions, & so put himself vpon his way towards ... Chancellor (as he supposed:) but by the way, he was aduised by some of his friends whi... got some suspition of the matter, not to goe any farther, for that his comming was not entended by the Polonians his friends, (as he was perswaded) but by the Tartars his enemies, who lay in wait for him at Huft, to bereaue reaue him of his life and gouernment. The Prince astonied with the nouelry of the matter, listned vnto their perswasion, and retired with his traine to the strong fort of Kehwere; where he stayed foureteene daies, as if it had been onely for feare of the Tartars. In the meane time, hee gaue notice to the Nobility and Gouernours of the countrey, his friends, of the imminent and common danger; who forthwith repaired vnto him in armes. But the traitours proceeding in their purpose, ceased not to perswade Bornemissa, who had the leading of the Princes army, that to fight with the Tartars was a matter of no small danger: and that therefore if he wished wel to his country, he should not haue to do with them, but onely shew himselfe neere vnto them, and that he was not vnprouided for them: which was accordingly done, and the Transyluanian armie brought so nigh vnto the Tartars, as that they might heare the noise of their drums and trumpets. Whereby the Tartars as by the watchword, perceiuing themselues discouered, and nothing to fall out according to their expectation, as had bin vnto them promised for the betraying of the Prince; they remooued thence, and by another way breaking through the midst of Transyluania, and so into Hungarie, rifled and burnt fiue hundred villages, slew al the males that were aboue twelue yeares of age, and carried away the rest vnto the Turkish army then lying at the siege of Rab. In the meantime the traitors (when as this first plot serued them not) conspired to set vp one Balthazor Bator, the yong Princes nigh kinsman, and with the good fauour of Amurath to preferre him to the soueraigne gouernment of their countrey. Which their purpose the Prince perceiuing, and doubting altogether to trust vnto the fidelitie of his owne subiects; writ to his neighbors the Rascians, and other his confederats, praying their aid in this his so dangerous and doubtfull estate. Which after he had receiued, he appointed a generall assembly of all his states to be holden at Clausenburg, and that vpon a great paine to be inflicted vpon all such as should not there personally appeare: so at the prefixed day all came, except the Cardinall Bator and Stephen his brother, who guilty of so foule a treason against their owne bloud, were now before fled into Polonia. Being all thus met together, the Prince commanded the gates of the citie to be shut, and diligent watch and ward to be kept, forbidding by open proclamation, That any man vpon pain of death should so much as speake of any imagined treason. And at the same time politickly caused to be published in writing, how that the Germans had in the farther side of Hungarie got a notable victory ouer the Turks; for ioy whereof he commanded bonefires to be made, and the great ordnance to be in triumph shot off, with many other signes of ioy and gladnesse: and withall caused a notable banquet to bee prepared, whereunto together with others, were inuited also all the chief of the conspirators: of whom, euen as they were at dinner & least feared any such matter, he commanded fourteen to be apprehended and committed to prison; and the next morning caused fiue of them to be executed in the open market place. The principal of whom, who had vndertaken to haue himselfe slain the Prince, after three or foure light cuts in the necke, he caused to be drawne in pieces with foure horses: the other foure, namely Alexander, and Gabriel Gengi, Gregorie Diace, & Ladislaus Sallentz were beheaded, and their dead bodies al that day left in the market place for the people to behold: the rest were also afterwards worthily executed; and Balthazor Bator, whom the conspirators had intended to haue exalted, strangled. Hauing thus reuenged himselfe vpon his enemies, he by a publicke edict diuulged through all his dominion, gaue leaue to all his subiects in general, of their owne charge to take vp armes against the Turks, & whatsoeuer they could take from them, to haue it to themselues, as good prise gotten from their lawfull enemies. By which vnwonted libertie, the Transyluanians encouraged as with a great bounty, armed themselues on all hands, to the number of forty thousand; who being mustered and sworne to hold together against the Turks, made their first expedition towards Danubius: where at their first arriual, by good hap they light vpon certain of the Turks ships laded with prouision for the campe, and merchandise of all sorts, and much treasure: of which rich ships, they at the first onset tooke seuen, but the eighth (beeing indeed the Admirall) escaped their hands. In these ships they tooke an exceeding rich bootie, slew many of the Turks, and in token of the victorie, carried backe vnto the Prince seuen of the Turkish ensignes. This victorie caused great ioy in Transyluania, euery man of so prosperous a beginning, conceiuing good hope of most happie successe. It is reported, that Sinan Bassa hearing of this losse, should say, That if this prouision had come to him in safety, he could with that treasure more easily haue bought Vienna in Austria, than he had Rab in Hungary. After this victory the prince laid siege to

The Ianizaries in a tumult at Conſtantinople

Not long [illegible] about the two and twentieth of December a tumult riſe among the Ianizaries of the court at Conſtantinople, which grew to ſuch an height, that in the heat thereof one of the Baſſaes was by them ſlain, with ſome others of good account, and one of Amuraths ſons ſore wounded, and with much adoe ſaued. Vpon conceit whereof, Amurath for anger & griefe fell into a fit of the falling ſickneſſe (whereunto hee was much ſubiect) and was therewith for the ſpace of three daies and three nights ſo grieuouſly vexed, as if he ſhould haue preſently giuen vp the ghoſt: ſo that the citie was filled with heauineſſe and feare, and the great men of the Court were euen ready to thinke vpon a new Lord. This tumult of the inſolent Ianizaries H many ſuppoſed to haue been the cauſe of Amurath his death, which ſhortly after enſued: his griefe and maladie encreaſing daily by the euill news ſtill brought vnto him both by meſſengers & letters, eſpecially out of Tranſyluania, where the Prince waiting vpon euery occaſion, was ſtill at hand with the Turks, cutting them ſhort in euery place; and in ſundrie rodes which he made vpon them this moneth, tooke many of their caſtles and forts from them. He had at that time in the field in diuers places three armies: one vnder the conduct of Geſty Ferens, in the country of Lugaz, neere vnto Temeſwar: another vnder the leading of Michael Horwat, on the ſide of Danubius, to intercept the Turks comming to Buda: and the third commanded by Caſpar Cornoyſe in the countrie neere to Giula, vnto whom came ſhortly after fifteene hundred horſemen out of the vpper Hungarie.

1595 The Tranſyluanian Prince Sigiſmund Bator thus lately reuolted from the Turke, for the I ſtrengthning of his ſtate thought it beſt betime to enter into confederation with his neighbors of Valachia and Moldauia (who moued by his example, ſhortly after in like maner alſo caſt off the ſeruile yoke of the Turke) but eſpecially with the Chriſtian Emperor Rodolph. For which purpoſe he ſent Embaſſadors honourably accompanied: who comming to Caſſouia in Hungarie the fourteenth of December, arriued at Prague the twelfth of Ianuary, with twenty waggons, and an hundred and fiftie horſe, where they were by the Emperors appointment moſt honourably receiued and royally entertained: and after a few daies hauing deliuered vnto the Emperor the ſumme of their embaſſage, which was for a confederation to be made betweene the Emperour and the Prince: after much graue conſultation and ſerious diſcourſe it was fully K concluded and agreed vpon: the chiefe points whereof I thought it not amiſſe here in briefe to ſet downe, for the ſatisfying of ſuch as deſire to know in what termes that worthy Prince next neighbour vnto the Turke then ſtood with the Chriſtian Emperour.

The capitulations of the league betwixt the emperor & the Tranſyluanian prince.

Firſt it was agreed vpon, That the Emperour for himſelfe and for the States of Hungarie ſhould promiſe to proceed in his wars begun againſt the common enemie, and not to conclude any peace with him, without the knowledge and good liking of the Prince. And that in all concluſions of peace to be made betwixt him and the Turke, the countries of Tranſyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, ſhould be alwayes compriſed: in regard whereof, the Prince likewiſe promiſed for himſelfe and the States of Tranſyluania, to proſecute the commenced warre, and not to enter into any league with the Turke, without the knowledge and conſent L of the Emperor and the Nobilitie of Hungarie, and this to be confirmed by ſolemne oath on both ſides.

Secondly, that the Prouince of Tranſyluania with all the parts and confines thereof hitherto poſſeſſed by the Prince of Hungarie, ſhould remaine vnto the ſaid Prince Sigiſmund and to his heires male, with all the profits ariſing thereof, in ſuch ſort as they had done in the time of Iohn, Stephen, and Chriſtopher, his predeceſſours, to haue therein a moſt free and abſolute authority: yet ſo, as that they ſhould acknowledge his Imperiall Maieſtie and his lawfull ſucceſſors for their lawfull ſoueraignes; vnto whome they ſhould alwayes ſweare their fealtie, but without any homage doing: and that to bee performed by his ſucceſſours at the time of the change, but by the Prince himſelfe, preſently after the confirming of this league. But that for M lacke of heires male, the countrey of Tranſyluania with all the territories thereunto annexed, ſhould diſcend vnto his ſacred Maieſty and his ſucceſſors the Kings of Hungarie, as a true and inſeparable member thereof: whereunto the Prince and all the States of Tranſyluania ſhould bind themſelues by ſolemne oath. But yet that at ſuch time as the heirs male ſhould faile in the line

A line of the preſent Prince, and that the country of Tranſyluania ſhould according to theſe preſent conditions be deuolued to the crown of Hungarie; as well his preſent Imperiall and Royall Maieſty as his ſucceſſors, ſhould keep inuiolate the antient lawes, priuiledges, and cuſtomes of that countrey, and alwaies appoint one of the nobilitie of Tranſyluania to be Gouernour or Vayuod of the ſame, and no other ſtranger.

Thirdly, that his Mateſtie ſhould acknowledge the Prince of Tranſyluania for an abſolute Prince, and by ſpeciall charter confirme vnto him the title of Moſt excellent.

Fourthly, that his Imperial Maieſty ſhould procure one of the daughters of the late Archduke Charles his vncle, for a wife for the Prince, that as they were now to be ioyned in league, ſo they might be ioyned in affinitie alſo.

B Fifthly, that the Emperor ſhould procure him to be made one of the order of the Golden Fleece.

Sixtly, that the Prince might with more cheerefulneſſe and ſecuritie make war againſt the common enemy, his imperiall and royall Maieſty ſhould not at any time, howſoeuer things fel out, forſake the ſaid Prince or any of the countries ſubiect vnto him: and euen now preſently to aid him according as the preſent occaſion required, and afterward (if greater need ſhould be) with greater help, whether it was by his Generall of Caſſouia, or others: and this giuing of aid to be on both ſides mutuall and reciprocall, according as the neceſſity of the one or other part ſhould require: and that where moſt need was, thither ſhould moſt helpe be conuerted.

Seuenthly, that the ſacred Roman Empire ſhould take vpon it the protection and defence C of the Prince and his territories. And that his Imperiall Maieſtie ſhould create the ſaid Prince and the Princes his ſucceſſors, Princes of the Empire: yet ſo, as that they ſhould haue neither voice nor place among the ſaid Princes.

Eightly, that whatſoeuer caſtles, townes, cities, or other places of ſtrength, ſhould by their common forces be taken or recouered from the common enemie, at ſuch time as his imperiall Maieſtie ſhould ſend into the field a full armie, ſhould be all his Maieſties: but ſuch places as the Prince ſhould by his own forces or policie gaine from the enemie, ſhould remain vnto the Prince himſelfe. Yet that what places ſoeuer the Prince ſhould recouer, which at any time before belonged to the kingdome of Hungarie before it was taken by the Turke, thoſe he ſhould D forthwith deliuer to his Maieſtie, as ſoone as reaſonable recompence were by him therefore made vnto the Prince.

Ninthly, his ſacred Maieſtie ſhould promiſe of his own bountie to giue vnto his Excellencie ſufficient aid for the fortifying and defence of ſuch places as ſhould be thought neceſſarie for the behoofe of the Chriſtians: as againſt the ſaid Prince ſhould likewiſe promiſe not to ſpare his own cofers or forces, that the ſame places ſhould be throughly fortified and defended for the behoofe of his Maieſtie and the common good of the Chriſtian commonweale.

Laſtly, that foraſmuch as the euents of war are vncertain, and many things ſuddenly happen contrary to mens expectation, if ſuch neceſſity ſhould chance vnto his Excellencie or his ſucceſſors (which miſhap God forbid) that hauing ſpent themſelues, they ſhould not be able longer to defend their ſtate & country, but that the mighty enemy preuailing, they ſhould at laſt be enforced to forſake the ſame: in this their extremitie, his imperiall & royall Maieſty ſhould E promiſe both for himſelfe and his ſucceſſors, within the ſpace of one moneth to aſſigne ſome certain place in ſome other of his dominions, where the ſaid prince & his ſucceſſors might honorably liue: and the like regard to be had alſo of other ſuch principal men, as ſhould together with the Prince aduenture their liues and liuings in defence of the Chriſtian commonweale.

Which articles of confederation agreed vpon, & ſolemnly confirmed, the ſame Embaſſadors were with all kindnes, bounty, & magnificence diſmiſſed and ſent back again vnto the Prince: who was not himſelfe in the meantime idle, but labouring by all the means he could to draw vnto him Michael the Vayuod of Valachia (a man of no leſſe worth than himſelfe) and Aaron the Palatine of Moldauia, both of them then the Turks tributaries; & by them to alienat from F the Turke both thoſe countries, that ſo with their combined forces they might the better defend their liberty, and withſtand their common enemy: wherein he did ſo much, and preuailed ſo farre with them both, that caſting off the Turks obeiſance, they ſhortly after to the great benefit of the Chriſtian commonweale, and no leſſe hinderance of the Turkes proceedings in Hungarie, ioyned hands both together with him for the recouery of their loſt liberty. Which reuolt reuolt of these bordering Princes, for that it so much concerned the common good, as that the safegard of Austria, and of the remnants of Hungary, with some good part of Germanie also, is euen by them that in those matters saw much, not without cause supposed to haue rested therein; & that this noble Vayuod (of whom much is to be said hereafter) was the second actor herein, it shall not be from our purpose to see the manner of his reuolt also from the Turke, as we haue already the Transyluanians. For the more euidence whereof, as for the honor of the man (whilest he liued, a most worthy member of the Christian commonweale) we will a little step backe to see how hee obtained of the great Turke this so honourable a preferment, as was the Vayuodship of Valachia, not without his reuolt long now to be holden.

Valachia oppressed by the Turkes.

Alexander the late Vayuod of Valachia, a Moldauian borne, and by Amurath himselfe promoted to that dignitie; proud aboue measure of this his so great a preferment, as also of his owne nobilitie, and the deceitful fauor of Fortune still fawning vpon him; not only oppressed his people himselfe with intollerable impositions, but to be in farther fauor with the Turkes, brought into that country (too much before exhausted) such a company of them, as that they seemed now almost wholly to haue possessed the same, oppressing the poore Christians (the naturall inhabitants) with new exactions, and more than tyrannicall iniuries, euen such as were not elswhere by the Turks themselues vsed; not only breaking at their pleasure into their houses, and dispoiling them of their goods, but taking tythe also of their children, as if it had bin of their cattell, a thing neuer before there seene: and for the satisfying of their beastly lust, rauishing their wiues and daughters, euen in the sight of their husbands and parents, with diuers other such outragious villanies, not with modestie to be rehearsed. So that by this meanes he had violently taken from his Christian subiects all hope of recouerie of their antient libertie, had it not as sometime it falleth out in these worldly things both vnto men & commonweals, which brought vnto the last cast, & euen as it were to the bottome of dispaire, by the goodnes of God, contrary to all hope, find sometime such vnexpected help and reliefe, as that thereby they, beyond their hope, euen to the astonishment of the world, mount vp again vnto a greater lustre of their state than was that from which they before fell: it had euen so by the singular mercy of God now hapned vnto the Valachians, not knowing which way to turn themselues. There was at Crailowa (a city in the confines of Valachia towards the confines of the Hungarians and Turks, where the Gouernor of those borders is for the defence therof with a strong garrison alwaies resiant) a noble gentleman called * Ion Michael, son to Peter the Palatine of that countrie, the aforesaid Alexander his predecessor: who as he was vnto the people for the honor of his father, the prerogatiue of his birth, the comelinesse of his person, and talnesse of his stature, well knowne; so was he for his zeale towards the Christian religion, his loue towards his country, his kindnesse towards his equals, his courtesie towards his inferiours, his vpright dealing, his constancie and bounty vnto them, no lesse gracious; & for other the noble vertues of his heroical minde and naturall disposition for the performance of great matters, his deepe wisedome and quicke foresight, his sweet and pleasing speech, void of all affectation, vnto all good men most deare: whose fame, both for the honor of his house, & of his own vertues, still more & more encreasing, and rife in the eares of Alexander the Vayuod, was the cause that he commanded him as the ready or rather naturall competitor of his state and honor, to be secretly apprehended, and so taken out of the way; wherof he by good fortune hauing intelligence, and carefull of his owne health, for safegard of himselfe fled first into Hungarie, and there not staying long (God so directing him) went to Constantinople in the yeare 1591, to sue for the Vayuod his place, all the nobilitie of his country and the Prouinces thereunto adioyning, secretly reioycing thereat. About which time the chiefe and most graue of the Valachian nobilitie and counsellors prostraiting themselues at the feet of Amurath, most grieuously complained vnto him of the manifold and intollerable iniuries they had already sustained, and were still like to endure, without hope of redresse, from Alexander their Vayuod, and the followers of his court; the Turks garrisons and merchants with plentifull tears orderly declaring many his most foule and detestable facts, and afterward highly commending Ion Michael for his rare vertues, as the true heire of their prouince; most humbly requested Amurath either to haue him appointed the lawful Gouernor of their country, or else some other place by him assigned for them to dwell in, wishing any where to liue, rather than vnder the heauie command of so mercilesse a man as was Alexander. For the furthering of which their sute, Michael his vncle by the

A the mothers side, a Greeke borne, and a man for his exceeding wealth in great fauour in the Turks Court, spared for no cost. So Michael by the goodnesse of God was by Amurath with great solemnitie created Vayuod of Valachia, and the oppressed and almost forlorne state of that sometime most flourishing countrey by little and little well relieued (although not altogether without most sharpe and violent remedies, such as extremities oft require) began now againe to lift vp the head, and to aspire vnto the antient libertie and honour thereof. At the beginning of whose happie soueraignetie, Alexander his predecessour in his owne conscience guiltie of his euill and shamefull gouernment of that so notable and great a prouince, and now in feare to be called to account, secretly fled. But certaine yeares after remouing to Constantinople with his wife, and there attempting diuers euill meanes for the obtaining of the Pala-
B tinat of Moldauia, and for those his vnlawfull practises accused by the Palatine his Agent; he was by the commandement of Amurath taken in his owne house, and there in his princely apparell most miserably strangled vpon Palme Sunday, in the yeare 1597, about six yeres after his departure out of Valachia.

Michael by Amurath created Vayuod of Valachia.

Alexander strangled at Constantinople.

Michael thus made Vayuod of Valachia, long it was not but that it fortuned the reuerend Father Cornelius de Nona, sent from Pope Clement the eighth vnto the great Duke of Muscouie; in his returne conferring with Sigismund the Transyluanian Prince, and Aaron Palatine of C Moldauia, enformed them of the great consent of diuers zealous Christian Princes, for the maintenance of the war against the dangerous and common Enemie; with many graue and effectuall reasons persuading them (but especially for that they were themselues Christians) in that Christian quarrel to ioine vnto them their forces also, raised in those their countries neere vnto the great riuers of Danubius and Nester: but vnto Michael the Vayuod of Valachia, hee could not for diuers his other important businesses then come: whom for all that, the aforesaid Transyluanian Prince Sigismund his neighbour desirously sought to draw into the fellowship of this war, euen for the same reasons almost wherewith he had been himselfe mooued. First, by diuers great reasons remouing such doubts as might justly seeme to hinder him from giuing thereunto his consent; and then by declaring the Turkish insolencie daily increasing, with the infinite grieuances by them deuised against the miserable Valachians; when as the incursions of the Turks or Tartars, or their passages that way (no lesse troublesome than their inrodes) was almost euery moneth to be feared, their armies as friends to be in Winter and D Sommer receiued, their souldiers to their great charges relieued, and their commanders and captaines rewarded. Valachia thus impouerished, was not able (as he said) to pay the great sums it did alreadie owe, neither was to expect any releasement of the euils it was wrapped in, much lesse was it able to suffice vnto the grieuous exactions to be thereunto by them afterwards imposed. None of his predecessors (as he said, and as truth was) had for many yeares now past, for any long time, or with any securitie held their state or gouernment: but that either by the calumniation of the Enuious, or bribes of their ambitious competitors, brought into suspition with the Sultan, they were violently thrust out, or most cruelly put to death. In briefe, he said it was a wise mans part, not without most manifest and weightie reasons, to E promise vnto himselfe better fortune, or more assurance of his state, than had his vnfortunate predecessors before him; but warned by their harmes, betimes to prouide for his owne safetie. By which persuasion he so preuailed, that the Vayuod (whose name, whose fame, whose wealth and life together with his subiects was all thereby indangered) although he would not (for the weightinesse of the matter) at the first yeeld thereunto; yet assuredly promised, with his friends and the rest of the Nobilitie of his countrey to consider thereupon. Hauing it by the Prince plainly laid downe before him, how a sufficient number of souldiers might at all times be raised, their pay prouided, and aid still sent him as need should be, from the German Emperor, or himselfe out of Transyluania: as also that Aaron the Palatine of Moldauia would at all times be readie to combine himselfe vnto them; that so with their vnited forces they might vpon the banks of Danubius and Nester easily repulse the incursions both of the Turkes F and Tartars their enemies: the Christian Emperor in the meane time with lesse trouble proceeding in his wars against the Turke in the other side of Hungarie.

Now whilest this plot was thus in laying, and matters too and fro debating, not altogether without the Turks suspition; Sinan Bassa comming with a great armie into Hungarie, had taken the strong Towne of Rab, as is before declared: with which mischance so much concerning

ing the poore remainders of Hungarie, the Vayuod not a little moued, began more deeply to G conſider of his owne eſtate. And as he was a man of a great ſpirit, and no leſſe zeale toward his countrey, grieuing to ſee his ſubiects committed to his charge, to be ſo daily by the inſolent Turks ſtill mo[re] and more oppreſſed: he (as he had before promiſed to the Tranſyluanian) called an aſſembl[y] of all the States of Valachia, to conſult with them what were beſt to be done for the remedie o[f] ſo great euils, as alſo for the preuenting of greater, not without cauſe then to be feared. Where by the general conſent of them all it was agreed, rather to joine with the Emperor and the other Chriſtian Princes in confederation, as they had bin oftentimes by them requeſted, than longer to endure that heauie yoke of the Turkiſh thraldome and ſlauerie.
Michael the Vayuod of Valachia reuolteth from the Turks. Whereupon the Vayuod taking vnto him two thouſand of the Hungarian garriſon ſouldiers, H now before for that purpoſe ſecretly layd vpon the frontiers of his country; and calling vpon the name of Chriſt Ieſus, in one day to begin withall, ſlew about two thouſand of the Ianizaries (who without his leaue had in that country proudly ſeated themſelues) with all the reſt of the Turks (in the midſt of their inſolencie) together with the traiterous Iewes, not leauing one of them that he could come by aliue in all the open countrey. And purpoſing to driue them out of their ſtrong holds alſo, and ſo to make a cleane riddance of them, he within fourteen dayes after ſet vpon Dziurdzowa, a great towne of the Turks vpon the banke of Danubius, which he burnt all ſauing the caſtle, and hauing there made a great ſlaughter, and loded with the ſpoyle of the Turks, returned to Bucharesta the chiefe ſeat of his Palatinat.

But long it was not after this his ſo great preſumption, but that he perceiued the Turks in reuenge thereof to ſeek after his life: although he yet ſeemed to yeeld his obedience vnto Amu- rath, and to haue done that he did as enforced thereunto by the inſolencie of the Turks, & for I the neceſſarie reliefe both of himſelfe and his ſubiects. For the ſame moneth (Rab being, as is a-foreſaid, taken by Sinan) one of the Turks * Emirs, diſcended of the great familie and ſtock of
The Turks call all them that are diſcended of the ſtocke of their Prophet Mahomet, by the name of Emirs, or Lords.*
Mahomet their falſe prophet, and then Cadileſcher (a man of great account and place amongſt the Turks) accompanied with 2000 choſen ſouldie[rs] of the great Sultans chamber, and many of the Zauſij and Spahi, vpon the ſudden came to Bucharesta vnder the colour of refreſh-ing themſelues after their long trauell, but indeed with purpoſe to haue taken the Vayuod:
where they without controlment committed all kind of outragious villanie; and taking vp all the chief houſes in the citie, imperiouſly demande[d] of the Vayuod (who then lay in his palace neere vnto the new monaſterie without the city, but [w]ithout any caſtle or defence, vpon the K riuer Dembowiza) 10000 florens for a Preſent, with victuals and other neceſſarie proui-ſion for his followers. And preſently after being certainly informed that he lay there but ſlenderly accompanied, and almoſt himſelfe alone, the Emir himſelfe on foot with a thouſand of his ſol-diers, went out of the city, as if it had bin but for his pleaſure, and in curteſie to haue ſeene him.
Of which ſo ſuſpitious a gueſts comming the Vayuod vnderſtanding, got him betimes away into the campe of his Hungarian mercinaries, which then lay but faſt by: when the Turke thus deceiued of the hope he had before conceiued for the taking of him, craftily ſent certaine of his followers, to know of him to what end he in time of peace did entertaine ſuch a number of Hungarian ſoldiers? Whereunto the Vayuod cunningly anſwered, That they were at the firſt entertained for the taking of Peter the ſonne of Alexander, ſometime Palatine of Moldauia: L who although he were now before apprehended, and openly hanged vpon an hooke at Conſtantinople, yet that thoſe ſoldiers were for their readie ſeruice, of neceſſitie ſtill to be bilited in the countrey vntill ſuch time as their pay might be prouided. Which the Turke hearing, commanded the Vayuod forthwith to diſcharge them as men vnneceſſarie, and to his ſubiects troubleſome, promiſing the next day to lend him a tunne of gold to pay them their wages.
Which feigned promiſe the Vayuod ſeemed thankfully to take; yet neuertheleſſe commanded the Hungarians forthwith in armes to ſtand in readineſſe in the campe, for the intercepting of the Turks, if haply by him diſtreſſed, they ſhould betake themſelues to flight: whileſt he in the meane time with his courtiers and other ſouldiers ſecretly aſſembled into a vally there by, came ſuddenly vpon the Turks (not as then dreaming of any ſuch thing) compaſſed about M the Innes wherein they lay, and ſetting fire vpon th[em] in fiue places, notably forced them both with fire and the ſword, the two greateſt extremities of war; ſeeking now for nothing more than the juſt reuenge of his ſpoiled Citie, his forced Virgins, and wronged ſubiects.
Howbeit the Turkes [fo]r a ſpace right valiantly defended themſelues, and by plaine force

A (although in vaine) ſought to haue broken thorow the midſt of their enemies, and ſo to haue fled. Yea many of them by force of the fire driuen out of their lodgings, and tearing off their burning cloathes, fought ſtarke naked: but moſt of them which could, fled vnto the palace where the great Emir lay, there with him readie to die or liue. All which, their laſt endeuors of deſperation the Vayuod eaſily fruſtrated, with two great pieces of Artillerie opening a way for his ſoldiers vnto them. So that the proud Emir now in deſpaire (like the hunted Caſtor) threw downe out of a window a great cheſt full of gold and pretious ſtones, and other jewels of great value, if happily he might haue ſo appeaſed the Vayuods wrath; humbly now re-queſting no more, but to haue his life ſpared; fearefully promiſing a large ranſome for him-ſelfe and thoſe few which were yet left aliue with him. Howbeit the Vayuod mindefull of The Cadileſcher with all the Turkes his Followers ſlaine.
B the manifold iniuries by them done vnto him and his ſubiects, and nothing mitigated or moued with the rich ſpoiles thruſt vpon him, or the large promiſes the Turks had made him; commanded all thoſe his enemies now in his power, to be ſlaine euery mothers ſon: of whom his ſouldiers had a wonderfull rich ſpoile, although much more was loſt in the fire: and ſo gi-uing thanks vnto God for the victorie, reſted with his people a while at quiet. Yet within leſſe than a month after, he ſent Albertus Kiral his Lieutenant with an armie to Phloch (a great Phloch ſpoiled by the Vayuod. open vnwalled towne on the farther ſide of Danubius, equally diſtant from Vroſzok and Nicopolis) from whence the Turks oftentimes paſſing ouer that frozen riuer into Valachia, had there done great harme: which towne not inferior vnto a good citie, he ſuddenly ſurpriſed, and ſacked it, put to the ſword all the inhabitants thereof, except ſuch as were before his com-C ming fled. And ſhortly after (the more to annoy the Turks) marching againe ouer the frozen riuer to haue ſurpriſed Herſowa a walled citie but one dayes journey from Brailoua, he was by Herſowa taken.
the way vpon the yce encountred by the Turks, whom he there in a great conflict ouerthrew, and hauing ſlaine many of them, and put the reſt to flight, holding on his intended journey, tooke that rich citie, which he rifled and burnt downe to the ground all except the caſtle, which was yet by the Turks valiantly defended: and ſo with the ſpoile of the citie returned againe ouer the riuer, there to refreſh his ſouldiers, wearied with labour and the extremity of the Winter weather. And yet not ſo contented, within ſix dayes after paſſing againe ouer the riuer, and hauing vpon the ſide thereof in a great battell ouerthrowne the Turks garriſons, tooke Siliſtra a great citie of Macedonia built by Conſtantine the Great (being the ſeat of one ked, and hauing ſlaine moſt part of the inhabitants, burnt it downe to the ground as he had the other, no leſſe terror than griefe vnto the Turks.

But whileſt the aforeſaid confederation betwixt the Emperor and the Tranſyluanian prince Amurath dieth was yet in hand, and the troubles in Valachia thus ariſing, Amurath the great Sultan grieuouſly troubled with the Stone, and attainted with the falling ſickneſſe his wonted diſeaſe, and inwardly alſo tormented with the late inſolencie of the Ianizaries, and reuolt of the countries of Tranſyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, (no ſmall hinderance to the proceeding of his wars in Hungarie) as a man both in ſoule and bodie tormented, with great impatiencie and agonie of mind departed this life the eighteenth day of Ianuary, in the yeare of our Lord 1595; when E he had liued one and fiftie, or as ſome ſay two and fiftie yeares, and thereof raigned nineteen.
At the time of his death ariſe ſuch a ſudden and terrible tempeſt at Conſtantinople, that manie thought the world ſhould euen preſently haue been diſſolued. His dead bodie was not long after with great pompe tnd ſolemnitie buried by Mahomet his eldeſt ſonne, in a Moſchie which he himſelfe had before built at Conſtantinople.

Turks (in the midst of their insolencie) together with the traiterous Iewes, not leauing one of them that he could come by aliue in all the open countrey. And purposing to driue them out of their strong holds also, and so to make a cleane riddance of them, he within fourteen dayes after set vpon Dziurdzowa, a great towne of the Turks vpon the banke of Danubius, which he burnt all sauing the castle, and hauing there made a great slaughter, and loded with the spoyle of the Turks, returned to Bucharesta the chiefe seat of his Palatinat.

But long it was not after this his so great presumption, but that he perceiued the Turks in reuenge thereof to seek after his life: although he yet seemed to yeeld his obedience vnto Amu- rath, and to haue done that he did as enforced thereunto by the insolencie of the Turks, & for I the necessarie reliefe both of himselfe and his subiects. For the same moneth (Rab being, as is aforesaid, taken by Sinan) one of the Turks * Emirs, discended of the great familie and stock of Mahomet their false prophet, and then Cadilescher (a man of great account and place amongst the Turks) accompanied with 2000 chosen souldiers of the great Sultans chamber, and many of the Zausij and Spahi, vpon the sudden came to Bucharesta vnder the colour of refreshing themselues after their long trauell, but indeed with purpose to haue taken the Vayuod:
where they without controlment committed all kind of outragious villanie; and taking vp all the chief houses in the citie, imperiously demanded of the Vayuod (who then lay in his palace neere vnto the new monasterie without the city, built without any castle or defence, vpon the K riuer Dembowiza) 10000 florens for a Present, with victuals and other necessarie prouision for his followers. And presently after being certainly informed that he lay there but slenderly accompanied, and almost himselfe alone, the Emir himselfe on foot with a thousand of his soldiers, went out of the city, as if it had bin but for his pleasure, and in curtesie to haue seene him.
Of which so suspitious a guests comming the Vayuod vnderstanding, got him betimes away into the campe of his Hungarian mercinaries, which then lay but fast by: when the Turke thus deceiued of the hope he had before conceiued for the taking of him, craftily sent certaine of his followers, to know of him to what end he in time of peace did entertaine such a number of Hungarian soldiers? Whereunto the Vayuod cunningly answered, That they were at the first entertained for the taking of Peter the sonne of Alexander, sometime Palatine of Moldauia: L who although he were now before apprehended, and openly hanged vpon an hooke at Constantinople, yet that those soldiers were for their readie seruice, of necessitie still to be bilited in the countrey vntill such time as their pay might be prouided. Which the Turke hearing, commanded the Vayuod forthwith to discharge them as men vnnecessarie, and to his subiects troublesome, promising the next day to lend him a tunne of gold to pay them their wages.
Which feigned promise the Vayuod seemed thankfully to take; yet neuertheless commanded the Hungarians forthwith in armes to stand in readinesse in the campe, for the intercepting of the Turks, if haply by him distressed, they should betake themselues to flight: whilest he in the meane time with his courtiers and other souldiers secretly assembled into a vally there by, came suddenly vpon the Turks (not as then dreaming of any such thing) compassed about M the Innes wherein they lay, and setting fire vpon them in fiue places, notably forced them both with fire and the sword, the two greatest extremities of war; seeking now for nothing more than the just reuenge of his spoiled Citie, his forced Virgins, and wronged subiects.
Howbeit the Turkes for a space right valiantly defended themselues, and by plaine force

The Turks call all them that are discended of the stocke of their Prophet Mahomet, by the name of Emirs, or Lords.*

A (although in vaine) sought to haue broken thorow the midst of their enemies, and so to haue fled. Yea many of them by force of the fire driuen out of their lodgings, and tearing off their burning cloathes, fought starke naked: but most of them which could, fled vnto the palace where the great Emir lay, there with him readie to die or liue. All which, their last endeuors of desperation the Vayuod easily frustrated, with two great pieces of Artillerie opening a way for his soldiers vnto them. So that the proud Emir now in despaire (like the hunted Castor) threw downe out of a window a great chest full of gold and pretious stones, and other jewels of great value, if happily he might haue so appeased the Vayuods wrath; humbly now requesting no more, but to haue his life spared; tearefully promising a large ransome for himselfe and those few which were yet left aliue with him. Howbeit the Vayuod mindefull of The Cadilesher with all the Turkes his followers slaine.
B the manifold iniuries by them done vnto him and his subiects, and nothing mitigated or moued with the rich spoiles thrust vpon him, or the large promises the Turks had made him; commanded all those his enemies now in his power, to be slaine euery mothers son: of whom his souldiers had a wonderfull rich spoile, although much more was lost in the fire: and so gi-uing thanks vnto God for the victorie, rested with his people a while at quiet. Yet within lesse than a month after, he sent Albertus Kiral his Lieutenant with an armie to Phloch (a great Phloch spoiled by the Vayuod. open vnwalled towne on the farther side of Danubius, equally distant from Vroscozok and Nicopolis) from whence the Turks oftentimes passing ouer that frozen riuer into Valachia, had there done great harme: which towne not inferior vnto a good citie, he suddenly surprised, and sacked it, put to the sword all the inhabitants thereof, except such as were before his com-C ming fled. And shortly after (the more to annoy the Turks) marching againe ouer the frozen riuer to haue surprised Hersowa a walled citie but one dayes journey from Brailoua, he was by Hersowa taken the way vpon the yce encountred by the Turks, whom he there in a great conflict ouerthrew, and hauing slaine many of them, and put the rest to flight, holding on his intended journey, tooke that rich citie, which he rifled and burnt downe to the ground all except the castle, which was yet by the Turks valiantly defended: and so with the spoile of the citie returned againe ouer the riuer, there to refresh his souldiers, wearied with labour and the extremity of the Winter weather. And yet not so contented, within six dayes after passing againe ouer the riuer, and hauing vpon the side thereof in a great battell ouerthrowne the Turks garrisons, tooke Silistra a great citie of Macedonia built by Constantine the Great (being the seat of one ked, and hauing slaine most part of the inhabitants, burnt it downe to the ground as he had the other, no lesse terror than griefe vnto the Turks.

But whilest the aforesaid confederation betwixt the Emperor and the Transyluanian prince Amurath dieth.
was yet in hand, and the troubles in Valachia thus arising, Amurath the great Sultan grieuou-sly troubled with the Stone, and attainted with the falling sickenesse his wonted disease, and inwardly also tormented with the late insolencie of the Ianizaries, and reuolt of the countries of Transyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, (no small hinderance to the proceeding of his wars in Hungarie) as a man both in soule and bodie tormented, with great impatiencie and agonie of mind departed this life the eighteenth day of Ianuary, in the yeare of our Lord 1595; when E he had liued one and fiftie, or as some say two and fiftie yeares, and thereof raigned nineteen.
At the time of his death arise such a sudden and terrible tempest at Constantinople, that many thought the world should euen presently haue been dissolued. His dead bodie was not long after with great pompe and solemnitie buried by Mahomet his eldest sonne, in a Mosche which he himselfe had before built at Constantinople.

In English thus:

If ought there be might make thee great that on the earth is found, What then should let thy name among the greatest for to sound?
That sees thy kingdomes and thy townes, so many and so great:
And giuing place thy selfe to none, do'st sit on royal seat.

THE LIFE OF MAHOMET, THE THIRD OF THAT NAME, SEVENTH EMPEROVR OF THE TVRKES.

1595 THe death of the late great Sultan Amurath was not forthwith made knowne in the Court, but with wonderful secrecie concealed, not onely for feare of the Ianizaries, (who in time of the vacancie of the Empire alwaies do whatsoeuer pleaseth themselues) but also for that the people hauing in distrust the fierce nature of Mahomet, Amurath his eldest sonne, were generally better affected to Amurath the yonger brother, a Prince of a more milde spirit and curteous disposition, vnto whom they in heart wished those stately honours, which could by no meanes without the great wrong and preiudice of his elder brother, and danger of the whole state, be giuen vnto him. Ten dayes after, came Mahomet in post from Amasia to Constantinople, and was there by the great Bassa's and other his mightie fauourits saluted Emperour: which done, he presently after caused all his brethren to be inuited to a solemne feast in the court: whereunto they (yet ignorant of the death of their father, came cheerefully, as men fearing no harme; but being come, were there all by his commandement most miserably strangled: and at once to rid himselfe of the feare of all competitors (the greatest torment of the Mightie) he the same day (as is reported) caused ten of his fathers wiues and concubines, such as by whom any issue was to be feared, to be all drowned in the sea.

Mahomet saluted Emperor of the Turkes.

He murthereth his brethren.

The Ianizaries in a tumult.

The Ianizaries and other soldiers of the court not before acquainted with the death of Amurath, neither with the choice that the great Bassa's had without their priuity made of Mahomet, and not a little offended to see themselues so disappointed of such spoiles as they reckon due vnto them in the time of their vacancie; as men discontented, rise vp in a rage, and made such hauock and spoile in the Imperial city, as greater they could not wel haue made, had there biin as yet no Emperor chosen at all; and not so contented, were now euen vpon the point to haue rifled their new Emperors court, and to haue laid violent hands vpon the person of himselfe, in reuenge of the tyrannie by him executed vpon his brethren and fathers wiues (which inhumane cruelty the Turkish Emperors easily excute by the name of the policie of their state.) For the appeasing of which so dangerous a tumult, Mahomet called vnto him certaine of the chiefe men among these seditious, such as were thought to be able to do most with them, whom he fought by faire perswasions and large promises to win vnto him, and by them to pacific the rest. Which serued him to little or no purpose, vntill such time as the great Bassa's themselues came out with their followers: who with many faire perswasions, mixt with most grieuous threats, and firme promise of a generall pardon, with much ado appeased the tumult: yet for the more safetie, kept all the chiefe streets of the citie with a strong watch and ward. This broile thus ouerblowne, a new tent was by the commandement of the new Emperor set vp before the Temple of Sophia: wherein on the right hand was placed the dead bodie of the late Sultan Amurath his father, and on the left hand the bodies of his nineteene strangled brethren, layed forth

The tumult appeased.

A forth of purpose, as an heauie spectacle for the people to behold: who all not long after were together with their father with great solemnitie after the Turkish maner buried, and Mahomet himselfe (being about nine and twenty yeares old) now openly proclaimed great Emperor of the Turks, and lord of all, from the rising of the Sun, to the going downe of the same. After that, returning to his pallace, he made vnto his Bassaes and other great men a sumptuous and royall feast, as the manner was: but whilest they were in the midst of their mirth, vpon the sudden all the city was again in an vprore, & the people in arms, in such sort, as that it was thought scarce one man would haue escaped aliue from that banket, had not the chiefe Bassa with his grauitie and wisedome and wonderfull labor in good time appeased their fury, and withall to their greater terror, caused al the great ordnance in the city to be brought forth into the streets ready charged, to be shot off amongst them.

The Ianizaries againe in an vprore.

B Whilest these troubles thus passed at Constantinople, vpon the late confederation made betweene the Emperor, the Transyluanian Prince, the Valachians and Moldauians, diuers fortunate inrodes and skirmishes were by them made in the frontiers of the Turkes dominions, many strong places were surprised, many rich booties taken, and notable exploits done, which we will but briefely passe ouer, as the precedents of a greater war. The city of Weitze, before taken by the Turks, was now againe in the beginning of this yere recouered: and the Christians about Scuthia, in number about foure thousand, breaking into the Turkes frontiers, carried away an exceeding rich prey, with diuers notable captiues. The like did also the Christians of Viuaria: at which time also the garrison souldiers of Altenburg making a rode into the coun-Diuers fortunat rodes made by the Christians vpon the Turks.

C trie about Rab, encountered with foure thousand Turkes, of whom they slew two hundred, tooke certaine prisoners, whom they sent some to Presburg, some to Altenburg: and Sinan Bassa the late Generall returning towards Constantinople with much treasure, which he had greedily scraped together in the late wars in Hungarie, was by the Valachians set vpon by the way not far from Belgrade, and stript of all that he had, hauing much adoe to escape himselfe with some few of his followers. The same Valachians, together with the Transyluanians, vnder the conduct of their valiant captaine Gestius Ferens, entring further vpon the Turks, tooke from them diuers of their townes and castles, as Pondesie, Nicoplise, Killa, and Rebnichi, and meeting with twelue thousand Tartars, slew a great number of them, and put the rest to flight.

D With this insolencie of the Valachians his late tributaries, but now his enemies, the Turkish Emperour was highly offended: and therefore sent one Bogdanus a Valachian borne, descended of the Palatines house, with a great power to expulse the old Vayuod, and to possesse himselfe of that honour, as his tributarie; promising vnto him all fauour and kindnesse. Bogdanus thus supported and furnished, came with his power into Valachia; yet thought it best before hee attempted any great matter, to expect the comming of the Tartars left the last yeare in Hungarie by Sinan: of whose comming the Valachians and Transyluanians hauing vnderstanding, met them by the way, and ioyning battell with them, slew eight thousand of them, put the rest to flight, and so returned: vnto whom presently after this victorie the Transyluanian Prince sent fourteene thousand souldiers moe to aid them against the Turks. But Bogdanus vnderstanding both of the ouerthrow of the Tartars and the comming of this new supplie, durst not proceed any farther in his enterprise, but kept himselfe stil in his trenches. Not long after,

E by the commandement of the Turkish Emperour, Han the Crim Tartar with a great power of his Tartarian horsemen entered into Moldauia, with purpose to haue by fire and sword reduced that countrey againe vnto the Turkes obeisance: of whose comming Aaron Vayuod of Moldauia hauing knowledge, and aided by his neighbour Michael Vayuod of Valachia, so belayed the Tartars, that hee in three diuers battels ouerthrew them, and hauing slaine twelue thousand of them, enforced the rest to retire againe out of his countrey: and following the course of this victorie, presently after tooke Bendar, Schinitz, Tigna, Mechnis, with some other Castles and fortresses of the Turkes neere vnto the riuer of Danubius, all which hee furnished with his owne garrisons; and withall tooke in the rich Countrey of Bobraga, the

F inhabitants thereof willingly submitting themselues vnto him, as men wearie of the Turkish thraldome. With like good fortune, aided by the Polonian Cossackes, hee ouerthrew Iaicula the sonne of Bogdanus, sometime Vayuod of Moldauia, now sent by Mahomet with a great power, as a most fit instrument to trouble the Vayuod, and to recouer againe that countrey: with whom Aaron couragiously encountering at Scarpetra, a mile from Danubius, ouer-ouerthrew him in plaine battell, and hauing slaine eight thousand of his Turkes, put him to G flight, and tooke the spoile of his whole campe. Neither yet so contented, marched presently to Nesster Alba, where he put the Turkes in a great feare, and afterwards burnt the suburbs of the citie, and so retired.

How Mahumeth the late Sultan in the beginning of these troubles, had at Constantinople shut vp in prison Frederick Krecowitz the Emperors Embassador, is before declared. This Embassadour Sinan Bassa brought with him the last yeare when he came into Hungarie, who after many indignities by him suffered both vpon the way and at Belgrade, there died: fiue of whose seruants the false Bassa caused to be kept in straight prison, as guiltie of their masters death, so to auert the infamie thereof from himselfe. But now lying himselfe at Belgrade for the better mannaging of this yeares warres, vpon the comming of a new Treasurer from the Court, H he caused the fiue poore prisoners to be brought before him, and most impudently charged them with the death of their master: saying, that they should answere for the same vnto God and their Emperour; and that his purpose in bringing of him from Constantinople, was to no other end, but to haue vsed his helpe in concluding a peace betweene the Great Sultan and the Emperour, and so to haue set him with all his at libertie: But now that hee was dead, he would send them his treacherous seruants to the Emperour to bee by him examined: and withall to tell him, That hee was sent from the Great Sultan, (whose power was not by any but God onely to be withstood) to besiege Vienna, which he could (as he said) the last yeare haue taken with lesse labor than he had done Rab: and that therefore it were best for him betime to seeke for peace, before so great a power had taken the field: and that for farther in- I structions, he would referre them to his sonne the Bassa of Buda, to whom he sent them from Belgrade, together with the new come Treasurer. Being come to Buda, they were forthwith brought before the Bassa, and amongst them the late Embassadors Secretarie, vnto whom after he had said somwhat of the hard dealing with the Embassador and his followers, he declared, that he had alwaies disliked of that manner of proceeding, and oftentimes entreated his father for their liberty; and now at last to haue obtained, that the Embassador being dead, his seruants might be set free: and so put them in good hope, that they should in short time be restored to their wonted libertie. In the meane time, that one of them should go vnto the Emperors Court, and there speake with one of his Secretaries, whom he had before aduised to bethinke himself of peace: vnto whom also he afterwards [illegible] on what conditions he thought peace K might be at the Sultans hand obtained. Which were, If all the castles and strong holds taken by the Emperours forces in these wars, as Filek, Setchine, and Nouigrade, with their territories, should be restored, Siseg in Croatia surrendered; if the Emperor should from thenceforth refuse to aid or protect the Transyluanians, Moldauians, and Valachians, and leaue them to the Great Sultan to bee chastised as rebels; if finally the Emperour would at once send vnto the Turks Court his woonted tribute for the yeres past, and so yerely afterwards: so he could be content by the mediation of his father, to attempt to appease the fierce and inueterat displeasure of the Sultan, and to further the treatie of peace. This he commanded the Secretarie to write, and to send it by the yong lord Perling, and to require thereof answer: yet that he should go with this condition, That if the said Perling within the space of fiue and twentie daies re- L turned not with answer, all the rest should for his default lose their heads. A subtill deuice and full of deceit, wherein the craftie Bassaes, both the father and the son, sought for nothing else but to see what confidence the Christians had in themselues, and to breake the confederation made betweene the Emperor, the Transyluanians, Moldauians, and Valachians: and that other Princes, whom God had stirred vp in defence of so iust a cause, hearing of a rumour of peace, might grow cold, and deferre to send their promised aid. For now the Turks had found by experience, how hurtfull and dangerous the reuolt of the three countries of Transyluania, Moldauia, and Valachia was vnto them, as they which brought ten hundred thousand duckats yearely into the great Sultans Treasurie: besides that, those people now become their enemies, were of all other fittest to intercept all manner of prouision to be brought by land either M to or from Constantinople, were it victuall or other warlike prouision. Notwithstanding this motion of peace made by the two Bassaes, Sinan the [illegible]assa in the mean time, with great diligence at Belgrade prepared al things necessary for war, and caused three bridges to be made, whereby hee might in diuers places as hee thought best, transport his armie ouer Danubius; and

The Emperors embassador dieth in prison at Belgrade.

A and at the same time sent for the garrisons round about, and other souldiers before billited in the countrey, and put in readinesse all things necessarie for a most mortall warre.

The Bassaes subtill demands answered with like.

Within the appointed time came Perling from the Emperors court with answer to the letters written by the Embassadours Secretarie, at the commandement of the Bassa; the effect whereof was, that he had receiued his letters by Perling, and did thereby vnderstand what had passed betweene the captiue seruants of the late Embassador, and Sinan Bassa at Belgrade, and also betweene them and Sinan Bassa his son at Buda; and that the Emperors minde was neuer other, but that a firme peace might haue been made between him and the Sultan; and that the Emperour had done nothing else by his Embassador at Constantinople, or by others in other places, but that such reasonable conditions might haue beene found out, as might haue ended B those wars, and haue on both sides deliuered their innocent subiects from their great and daily calamities; which might easily haue been done, if Sinan the author and fautor of this warre, had with like desire furthered the peace. But that it was manifest vnto the whole world, that all complaints of infinit grieuances, being by the Embassador, yea and by the Emperour himselfe, by his letters laid open vnto the Sultan and his chiefe Bassaes, had not only nothing preuailed, but also to haue beene with great contempt reiected, and the treatie of peace once begun, to haue by the insolencie of the Bassa of Bosna bin interrupted: That the Emperour, because the matter should not breake out into open warr, had sent his double tribute into the confines of Hungarie, which was a great while laid vp at Comara vntill the Sultans minde were C known. But when all his designes tended to war, and the Christian Prouinces were by his robbers on euery side spoiled, the inhabitants led away into most miserable captiuitie, the townes and villages burnt, yea whole countries lay desolate, and all manner of outrages were vpon a meere pride and contempt as it were of the whole world exercised: then the Emperour to haue taken his refuge vnto the defence of his iust cause, and to haue vsed such remedies as are both before God and the world to be allowed, and so by lawfull war to haue repulsed warre. And that although all had not the last yeare prospered in his hand, but that he had receiued some losse: yet that Sinan Bassa him selfe, & the Bassa of Buda his sonne with other of the wiser sort of the Turks must needs confesse that to haue chanced, not by their wisedome, policie or power but by the sufferance of God, by a rare misfortune, through the inexcusable negligence and treason of such as he had put in trust with the confines of his empire, worthie most seuere
D chastisement. And that no man could denie, but that great powers of the Turks, had not once, but oftentimes bin ouerthrowne and discomfited, by small handfuls of the Christians: therefore their power not to be so inuincible, as they vainly vanted of. But wheras it is written, that the great Visier Sinan and the Bassa his sonne are of opinion, that the Emperor is brought to so low an ebbe, that he must be glad to accept of most hard and dishonorable conditions of peace propounded by them: therein they erre much, and deceiue themselues far; for by the power of God they should shortly by experience know, that his imperiall Maiestie wanteth neither power nor wealth, to repaire the losse receiued through the treason of them he trusted, yea and to recouer whatsoeuer he had lost else: and that it should in short time be witnessed vnto the whole world, by the help of God and the defence of a most iust cause, that the Emperour E was not so poore and weake as they supposed him to be. Yet as he of his owne naturall goodnesse and clemencie, with his owne incomparable losse and harme, had alwayes sought for the quiet and profit of his subiects, and to the vttermost of his power staid the effusion of innocent bloud; so now also forgetting all iniuries, he could happily be content to thinke of an honorable peace: whereunto he was more enclined than to protract the warre with the vnspeakeable harmes of the subiects on both sides. Yet aboue all things it behooued Sinan to know, that he was to restore all such castles and townes as haue in this warre beene taken by the Turkes, beginning at Wihitz in Croatia euen to the last innocent subiect by them carried away into captiuitie. And that the Transyluanians, Moldauians, and Valachians (people many ages ioyned and vnited as inseperable members to the kingdome of Hungarie, as vnto the true bodie, and F now of late by the practise and treacherie of certaine rebellious persons seperated from the same) were from henceforth to be left vnder the protection and gouernement of his imperiall Maiestie, and neuer more to be impugned by the Turkes. If these things were done, and ordertaken that the iniurie and disgrace done vnto the Emperors late Embassador (a fact that all the Princes of the world cried shame of) might not remaine vnpunished: and that his seruants in in durance at Buda and Constantinople, might be restored vnto their woonted libertie, then some good forme of peace, and bounding of their territories might happily be agreed vpon: without which conditions, all talke of peace was but vaine; for that God the iust and mightie protector of such as put their trust in him, would not faile to helpe his imperiall Maiestie, with the rest of the confederat princes, in their so iusta quarrell, and abate the pride of such as trust to their owne strength and power.

This answer the captiues at Buda were commanded to giue vnto the Bassa, either by writing or by word of mouth: and withall earnestly to request him both for their owne libertie and their fellows, wrongfully detained at Constantinople. Which if it could not be obtained, yet to comfort themselues with that, that they should in bounteous manner receiue from the Emperour such allowance, as should suffice to prouide them things necessarie: as he had granted to Perling, whom he might haue iustly detained and not sent him backe againe, but for his oathes sake being no lawfull prisoner. Thus were the vnreasonable conditions of peace craftily by the Bassa propounded, by others answered: but by whom he knew not, no mans name being set thereunto.

The Emperor not ignorant with what an enemie he had to doe, and of nothing more carefull than of the kingdome (or more truly to say, of the reliques of the kingdome) of Hungarie, lying now as it were in the Lyons mouth, ceased not to pray aide, not of the Princes Electors onely, but of others also farther off; yea euen as far as Italie and Spaine, but especially of the King of Polonia, as his neere alliance & neighbor. Vnto whom both he and the States of Hungarie sent their Embassadors, at such time as he, moued with the daily incursions of the Turks and Tartars into the countries adioining vpon his, had for the safetie of his owne Kingdome, called a parliament of all his States in Februarie last, at Cracouia. Wherof Mahomet the Great Turke hearing, sent also two of his chiefe Chiaus, his vsuall Embassadors vnto the king and his States so assembled, to craue his aid in his wars in Hungarie: which if the king should not refuse, then to promise him to want no coine to pay his souldiers; and that Mahomet mindfull of so great a courtesie, would at all times be ready to requite him with like, when his occasions should require. These Embassadors, hauing obtained safe conduct from Michael the Vayuod of Valachia for their passage through his countrie; comming thither, were by the Vayuod himselfe honourably entertained and welcomed, and so brought into a faire lodging, where they discoursed with him of many matters. But the Vayuods followers, grieued to see so great honor done to these their sworne & mortall enemies, with weapons in their hands brake into the roome where the Embassadors were, and without more adoe slew them both: and in the same fury setting vpon the rest of the Turks their followers, cut them all in pieces, so that of them none came into Polonia to do their great Masters message, either yet returned to Constantinople to carrie newes of the rest, but there altogether perished. Of which outrage Mahomet yet vnderstanding, was therewith wonderfully enraged, threatening all euills both to the Moldauians and Valachians, and forthwith sent out other Embassadours to the same purpose; who with better fortune afterwards in safetie arriued in Polonia.

The Tartars in many places (as is before declared) ouerthrown, and many strong castles and forts taken from the Turkes by the Transyluanians, Valachians, and Moldauians, the Turkish affaires going to wracke in those quarters, and sore shaken on that side of Hungarie, Mahomet the Turkish Emperour called home to the Court Sinan Bassa his Generall in Hungarie, to conferre with him (as it was thought) of some great matters. In whose place he sent Ferat Bassa, hee who sometime had the leading of Amuraths great armies against the Persians: who now departing from Constantinople, came to Belgrade in Aprill, and there tooke the charge vpon him. Where at his first comming, in the night time all the ropes and cordes of the tents were suddenly cut in sunder, and so the tent let fall about his eares: which some supposed to haue beene done to his disgrace, by the procurement of Cigala Bassa before by him wronged; or as others thought, by the insolent Ianizaries, who disliking of him, did it despight, wishing rather to haue beene led by Mahomet himselfe. Now at his comming, the Famine which the last yere began amongst the Turks, was growne exceeding great, not at Buda and Belgrade only, but euen generally in most places of Hungarie possessed by the Turks: insomuch, that the Tartar women that followed the campe, were faine to roast their owne children & eat them. This Famine was also accompanied with a most terrible Plague, whereof great numbers of the the Turks and Tartars died daily: so that of fourescore fiue thousand Tartars which came the last yeare into Hungarie, now remained scarce eight thousand, the rest being all deuoured with the Sword, Famine, and the Pestilence.

Great were the harmes the Turkes still dayly receiued from the late reuolted countries of Transyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, the Christians of those places seeking by all meanes to annoy them. Michael Vayuod of Valachia, not contented with that he had already done, but entring into the Turks frontiers, surprised Scihmele, together with the castle; wherin he found foureteene field pieces, amongst which were two which had vpon them the armes of the Emperor Ferdinand, and other two hauing vpon them the armes of Huniades, which pieces he afterward sent as a Present to the Transyluanian Prince. After that, he tooke Orosige, a famous port towne, the dwelling place of the Turks great purueyor for butter, cheese, and hony, and such other prouision for the court, wherein he found such store of the aforesaid prouision, as might well haue sufficed eight thousand men for a whole yeare: and still prosecuting his good fortune, took from the Turks Kilee and Galempe, with the strong castle of S. George, commonly called Grigio, and at length besieged Laganoc.

With the beginning of the Spring came Matthias the Archduke and Generall of the Christian armie, from the assemblie of the nobilitie of Hungarie at Presburg, to Vienna, and so from thence to the Emperor his brother at Prague; who appointed him General of the lower Hungarie, and Maximilian his brother Generall of the vpper Countrey: giuing them for their Lieutenants, vnto Maximilian the Lord Teuffenbach, and to Matthias the Countie Charles Mansfelt, by him sent for out of Flanders, and after created one of the Princes of the Empire. Iohn de Medices, who was yet in Hungarie, he made Master of the great ordnance, with charge to fortifie Komara; which he so well performed, as that it was thought nothing in strength inferior to Rab. All this while the Emperor ceased not by his Embassadors and letters to solicite the Christian Princes, for the repressing of the common enemie to put too their helping hands: and so much preuailed with them, that out of his owne hereditarie prouinces, & from other Princes his friends, he had this Spring raised a right puissant and strong army for the defence of Hungarie: which how it was raised, & from whom, it shall not be much from our purpose briefly to remember, as the chiefe strength vnder God, whereby the Christian commonweale was this yere most noably defended. Out of the higher Saxonie came a thousand two hundred horsmen, and out of the lower Saxonie six hundred: from Franconia a thousand horsmen: from Sueuia foure thousand footmen: out of the Countie of Tirol as many: from Bauaria three thousand: out of Bohemia two thousand men at armes, six hundred light horsemen, and six thousand footmen: from Silesia a thousand fiue hundred horsemen: from Lusatia fiue hundred horse and a thousand foot: from Morauia a thousand horse, and two thousand foot: out of Austria two thousand horse and six thousand foot: from Hungarie fiue hundred horsemen and a thousand foot: from the nobilitie of Sueuia and Franconia foure thousand foot: from the King of Spaine out of the Low-countries vnder the conduct of Charles Countie Mansfelt, two thousand horsemen and six thousand foot: vnto these the Bishop of Rome added two thousand horsemen, and eight thousand foot: the great Duke of Florence sent fiue hundred horse & three thousand foot: the of Duke Ferrara a thousand fiue hundred footmen: the Duke of Mantua a thousand foot: & the Duke Vrbine fiue hundred horse. Al which being put together, fill vp the number of fifteene thousand nine hundred horsemen, and fiftie thousand fiue hundred foot. Which notable armie, raised from the power of diuers Christian Princes, and conducted by worthy Chieftaines, had by the goodnesse of God much better successe this Summer against the antient enemies of Christendome, than had the like armie the yeare before, as in the processe of this Historie shall appeare.

The notable army of the Christians, & from whence it was raised.

Among the worthie Commanders that were in this puissant army, Charles Countie Mansfelt the sonne of Peter Ernestus the old Countie, from his youth brought vp in armes, was by the King of Spaine at the request of the Emperour sent with the aforesaid forces of two thousand horse and six thousand foot out of the Low-countries, as a man for his approued valor & direction, fit to mannage these dangerous warres against the Turke vnder Matthias the Archduke, as his Lieutenant Generall: who hauing raised the appointed forces, for most part Wallons, departed from Bruxelles about the midst of Februarie, and by the way taking his leaue of his aged father at Luxenburg, and trauelling through Germanie, came in March to Prague, where where he was by the Emperour and the Archduke his brother most honourably entertained, and shortly after with great solemnitie created one of the Princes of the Empire. His forces following after him, were by the way staied, partly by the inundation of waters (the riuers they were to passe ouer at that time rising to an vnwonted height) partly by the iealousie of some of the German Princes, who denied them passage through their territories, vntill such time as that the Emperour by his letters had opened vnto him the way: which Princes for all that stood vpon their guard, and so gaue him passage.

Now ran great rumors of the wonderfull preparations of the Turks, as also of the Christians; Fame after her woonted manner, encreasing the report of all things aboue measure; which caused the Turkes with exceeding care to looke to the fortification of their frontier townes, especially of Rab and Strigonium, as did the Christians to the fortification of Komara and Altenburg. In the meane time many hot skirmishes passed betweene the Christians and the Turkes, especially in the late reuolted countries of Transyluania and Valachia, wherein the Turkes were still put to the worse, to the great discontentment of their Emperour. Neere vnto Temeswar the Bassa of Buda was ouerthrowne, by the valiant captaine Gestius Ferentz, and the Transyluanians. And in Valachia the Turks Generall entering with a great armie, was there also by the Lord Nadasti and the Valachians, aided with the Transyluanians, in a great battell discomfited and ouerthrowne. Eight thousand of the Turks heads in token of this victorie the Lord Nadasti sent to Alba-Iulia to the Transyluanian Prince, and certaine ensignes, amongst which one was most richly garnished with precious stones and pearle, thought to be worth thirtie thousand dollars; which the Prince afterward restored againe to Nadasti, offering him great possessions in Transyluania, if he could haue beene content there to haue seated himselfe.

Perat Bassa ouerthrowne in Valachia.

All this Spring the Turks countenanced their warres with greater boasts and threats, than true force; giuing it out, That they would in short time worke wonders both by sea and land. For the more credit wherof, Murat Rays, a notable pyrat was sent out with twelue gallies, who landing here and there vpon the coasts of Italie, did some harme, causing it to be reported in euery place where he landed, That this was but the beginning of a greater war, and that a wonderfull fleet was to follow him: which raised a great feare, as well in other places, as in Italie. Howbeit, no such fleet afterwards appeared: for why, the Turkish Emperor, much troubled with the reuolt of Transyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, and the great mortalitie then raging both among his souldiers and their horses, was not at time to looke into the sea, hauing his hands full enough with the troubles of Hungarie, where his men of war enioyed little rest in the frontiers of his territories.

Sigismund the Transyluanian Prince, had vpon some iust causes, of late suspected Aaron the Vayuod of Moldauia, to haue intelligence not only with the Polonians, but also with the Cardinall Bator and other his mortall enemies, and secretly to haue been about to make his peace with Mahomet, and so againe to fall off from him vnto the Turke: which vehement suspition growing daily more and more, was about this time manifestly confirmed by certain letters intercepted concerning that matter. For the preuenting whereof, the Prince caused Aaron to be apprehended, and with his wife and sonne to be sent as prisoners to Prague: in whose roome he by the consent of the nobilitie of the countrie, placed one Stephen Rozwan, a wise and discreet man amongst them, and such an one as had been vnto him alwaies faithfull. So as much as in him was, prouiding, that that countrie should not be rent from him and the vnion of the other. But against the secret practises of the Polonians, he protested openly by letters vnto the Emperour, by the power of God, and aid of his faithfull subiects, to redresse those so great iniuries himselfe by the sword.

Mahomet sendeth Embassadours to the prince of Transyluania.

In the middest of these troubles came three Chiaus, Embassadors from the Turkish Sultan vnto the Prince, to persuade him againe to put himselfe into his protection, and to giue him passage through his countrey, as in former time, into Hungarie; promising him, that all the iniuries by him or his people done, should be for euer forgotten and forgiuen: and that he should haue those three countries of Transyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, as his owne free inheritance, without paying any tribute, and so to be accounted as the Turks most louing friend and vassall. What the Prince answered thereunto, was not knowne, but by his doings afterward: it was easily to be gathered, that hee hearkened not vnto the deceitfull charmes of the faithlesse faithlesse tyrant, trusting more vnto the league he had with the Christian Emperour. These Embassadors were scarce gon, but that a secret messenger came with letters from the chiefe of the Christians in Bulgaria to the Prince, declaring vnto him, That if he did with any good successe prosecute his wars, they would be readie to follow his fortune, and to joine hands with him against the cruel tyrant, and to shut vp all the passages that way into Valachia, Moldauia, and Hungarie.

Whilest these troublesome times thus passed in Transyluania and Hungarie, one of the old Ianizaries called Wasuode Giezi, an old souldier, but a confident bold spoken fellow, moued as should seeme with the discontentments of the time, came vnto Mahomet the great Sultan at Constantinople, and there openly set vpon him with this rough and abrupt speech:

How long at last, most mightie Emperour, wilt thou endure thy selfe to be seduced and blinded by the great Bassa's of thy Court, and Commanders of thine Armies? How long wilt thou suffer thy selfe to be deceiued, to the great danger of thy selfe, and hart of thy Subiects? Seest thou not how ouerthwartly, fraudulently, and cunningly they, mooued onely with their owne couetous and ambitious humour, haue hitherto deals with thee and thy father? especially in that, that perswaded by them, thou hast dishonourably broken thy league, and taken vp armes against the Christian Emperour. At length open thine eyes and see their deceit, and how much they abuse thy power. Sinan Bassa, who must haue himselfe honoured and exalted aboue all others, hath not by strong hand honourably woon Rab, as hath been the manner of thine Auncestors, but hath craftily bought it with thy money, and thereby cast thee into a most dangerous war and infinite troubles. O Rab, Rab; now the cause of great triumph and reioycing, as if thereby all Christendome should in short time be subdued to thy Scepter. But thou art therein much deceiued; thy barnes, thy store-houses, as are Transyluania, Valachia, Moldauia, Bulgaria, and other Prouinces adioyning, from whence this thy Imperial citie of Constantinople, with the countrey about it, thy Court, yea thy selfe art to be relieued, are by this war shut vp; so that downe the riuer of Danubius out of the West, or by the Euxine out of the East, thou art not able to looke for any prouision. From whence then o most mightie Emperour, wilt thou maintaine thy selfe, thy Court, this populous Citie, and the Countrey hereabout? Not to speake in the mean time of thy mightie Army now in Hungarie, flesh, fish, corne, all manner of victual are now at such a price, that the common souldier cannot buy them. In this extreame dearth of all things, not men onely, but euen the very beasts and cattell starue for hunger. Thy horses go fat perhaps into Hungarie, but neither thou nor thy select soldiers can liue by grasse and weeds, all that is left in that countrey. This miserie and calamitie of thy people thou seest daily, and yet thou wilt not with sound iudgement lift vp thine eyes, to see from whence these harmes come, and how that they by thee put in greatest trust, studie not for thy profit or the profit of the commonweale, but onely how by all meanes to enrich themselues.

Mahomet much mooued with the confident speech of the old Ianizarie, commanded him to be forthwith committed to ward, and by faire means to be examined, by whose setting on, and for what cause he had so boldly vttered this rude speech vnto his Soueraigne, and what further thing he had intended: but the rest of the Ianizaries hearing thereof, rise presently in a tumult, and by strong hand tooke him out of prison, and by solemne oath combined themselues to defend him, euen to the spending of their owne bloud; whereat Mahomet was glad to winke.

The greatest part of the aid promised by the Christian Princes for the maintenance of this yeres wars against the Turke being now come to Vienna in Austria, Countie Mansfelt Lieutenant General vnder the Archduke, forthwith called a Councell of the Colonels, captains, and other great commanders of the armie, to consult with them what course to take for the beginning of this great war: as whether they should presently lay siege ro some towne of the Enemies, or else to expect him in the plaine field, and to giue him battell. All things well considered, and that resolued vpon which was thought most expedient, he remoued from Vienna to Altenburg, where he mustered his whole armie; and departing thence, with some few of his followers came to Walkenburg, a village vpon the side of Danubius, where he made choice of a place to incampe his army in: which after he had marked out, hee returned againe with speed to Altenburg, and by open proclamation thorow the Campe gaue straight commandement, That against a certaine houre euery man should be in readinesse to remooue and set forward ward toward the enemy: but diuers of the souldiers, and especially the Germans, began forth- G with after their wonted manner to cry out for their pay before they would stir any farther: so that the Countie was glad by a second proclamation to command them to rise, promising them their pay within eight days. But they still standing vpon their former resolution for their pay, refused [illegible] archer to follow their captaines, and sent six of the best sort among those mutinous soldiers to the Countie, in the name of all the rest to demand their pay; whom he forthwith commanded to be all hanged: but three of them hauing reasonably excused themselues, he let them go, and causing the other three to cast lots for their liues, hanged vp two of them.

Which seuere execution so terrified the rest, that vpon the signe giuen they all rise, and with the rest of the armie followed the Countie. The whole army being come to Walkenburg vnto the place where they were to encampe; the Countie himself with others of the nobility began H with spades and shouels to dig and cast vp the trenches; and so wrought vntil they sweat again; with whose example all the rest of the armie, of what degree soeuer, being moued to labor, had in short time cast vp a very great trench from Danubius vnto the Marishes, large enough for 80000 men to incampe in, the great worke with restlesse labor going forward both night and day vntill it was fully finished. The Countie lying thus intrenched with his armie, was still carefull by his espials to vnderstand where the enemie lay, and what he did. He was ready still to heare all, but to beleeue that which seemed most like to be true: what he purposed, he kept most secret, so that the enemy could neuer discouer any of his designes (wherein the Generals of late yeres before him had much erred:) and commonly his most certaine resolutions were shadowed vnder the open shew of some other matter nothing meant: securitie he much abhorred, as neuer free from danger: and although it was by diuers messengers brought vnto him, I That the enemy was but of small strength, vnable to meet him, disorderly incamped, and in great distresse for want of victuals; yet would he giue little credit thereunto, as knowing such reports to haue oftentimes bin giuen out by the Turks, of purpose to lul the Christians in se-curitie, the more easily to oppresse them. The Christian armie thus strongly entrenched, and the trenches planted with great ordnance, the Countie himselfe with certain troupes of horsemen would oftentimes shew himselfe before Rab, and sometime before Doris, viewing sometime the one place, and sometime the other, as if he had verily purposed to haue besieged one of them: and to giue the greater shew that he had so determined, he caused the ground to be marked out for his armie most conueniently to incamp, and for the casting vp of his mounts. K Which caused the Turks of Strigonium, Vesprinium, Iauarin, Comara, Agriotta, and other places farther off, to send part as well of their warlike prouision, as of their garrison souldiers, some to Rab, some to Doris, for the defence of those places, neere vnto the which they thought vnto danger. The Countie in the meane time hauing now put all things in readinesse, came with his army and sat downe before Doris, demanding to haue it yeelded vnto him. And the more to confirme the Turks that he would assuredly besiege that place, he began to cast vp his trenches, and to raise his mounts as seemed most conuenient; straitly commanding euery man of what condition soeuer, to put his hand in some measure to the furtherance of those works: and the more by his own example to encourage others, would oftentimes himself carry a faggot or some other thing before him vpon his horse for the raising of the mount. For all that, certaine Hungarian gentlemen disdai- L ning such base labor (as they deemed it) refused to do any thing therein: which the Countie perceiuing, straitly charged one of them by his example, to carry a fagot to the mount: which the Hungarian gentleman refusing, the Countie therewith much mooued, laid the fagot he was carrying himselfe, before the Hungarian vpon his horse, charging him to see that he caried it to the appointed place: the Hungarian disdainfully taking it, carried it vntill he thought he was out of the Counties sight, and then in scorne threw it down: which the Countie (hauing still an eye after him) perceiuing, commanded him to be taken, and all armed as he rid to be presently hanged vpon the next tree for his obstinacie. Which wholsome seueritie, both then and afterwards caused others more diligently to do what they were commanded by their superiours.
It happened about this time, that three Turkes being taken prisoners, were brought into the M camp: whom the Countie straitly examined of many matters. But the first of the three could neither by faire or foule means be induced to answer to any thing that he was asked; and was therefore by the commaundement of the Countie in the sight of the other two cut into small pieces. Who terrified with his dismembring, confessed many things wherof they were asked:
and

The vigilant carefulnes of Countie Mansfeld.

Both besieged by the Christians.

An obstinate Turke.

A and among others, That the Turkish Sultan had determined to turne his greatest forces into Transyluania, Moldauia, and the vpper part of Hungarie; and therefore would this Sommer send small forces or els none at all into those quarters.

Now was Dotis so belayd by the Countie, as that no man doubted but that he had thereon purposed to haue gaged his whole forces, when suddenly the last of Iune, commandment was giuen through the campe, That euery man vpon signe giuen, should be in readinesse to follow his leaders, for that the Countie had determined forthwith to remoue: yet whither the army was to be remoued, few or none knew, more than certaine of the chiefe commanders. As for to go to Strigonium, few there were that so much as dreamed thereof, all was kept so secret: yet was it the Counties purpose euen from the beginning to attempt the winning of that city; which the Archduke had in vaine the last yere besieged. The next night being both darke and foule, the Countie rise with all his army, and the next day being the first of Iuly, came to Strigonium, they of the citie not hearing of his comming before they saw him vnder their walls. Wherefore the Turks in the suburbs called the Rascian city, and they in the fort vnder S. Thomas hill, despairing of the keeping of those places, setting fire on the houses, and defacing the fort so much as in that sudden feare they possibly could, fled into the lower towne. The next day the Countie without resistance tooke the foresaid places forsaken by the Turks, which he manned with certaine companies of Wallons, and made a bridge of boats ouer Danubius, cast vp certaine mounts, and did many other things for the furtherance of the siege. In three dayes he had againe repaired the fort vnder S. Thomas hill abandoned by the Turks, and therein placed foure great pieces of artillerie, wherewith he began to batter the lower towne, & in other C places to strait the besieged more than they had bin the yere before. The Bassa of Buda not ignorant of the want both of men and munition in the besieged city, (and the rather, for that they had but a little before sent part of their garrison with shot & pouder to Rab and Dotis) attempted thrice (as he did many times after during the time of the siege) to haue by the riuer put new supplies both of men and munition into the citie: but was still by the diligence of the Christians excluded, and enforced with losse to returne. In short time the lower towne, which they call Wasserstat, or the Water-towne, was with continual battery sore beaten, so that scarcely any house or building was left whole; and a counterscarse made the last yeare, beaten downe. Whereunto certaine Wallons were sent, onely to haue viewed the bredth and manner of the D ditches: after whom certaine companies of the Hungarian Heidons presently followed, without any command of their captaines; who with great courage got to the top of another high counterscarfe, & there set vp some of their ensignes. Which the Turks beholding, & comming on close together, by plain force enforced them with losse to retire. Among these Hungarians were diuers also of the Wallons slaine, with some others of good name and place, to the great griefe of the County, being not a little offended with that disordered seruice: yet day & night the battery ceased not, and the Christians out of their trenches with their musket shot slew many of the Turks vpon the walls, receiuing little hurt againe, the Turks still shooting sparingly, for feare of wanting shot and pouder at their greater need; yet that they spent they bestowed so well, that amongst others they had slaine foure of the Christian canoniers, and one Wallon E captaine. About the midst of Iuly the Countie with continual batterie had made the Water-towne (as he thought) faultable: and therefore sent certain companies to begin the assault: who hauing passed the counterscarfe, found the ditch full of deepe mud, and but newly cut broader certain paces by the Turks, so that it was thought scarce possible to be passed without a bridge; behind which ditch was an high wal with strong bulwarks, and within all this was another new cast ditch, and vpon the very brinke thereof a thicke and high parapet: all which for all that, certaine companies of Wallons with great labor and danger aduentured to passe: but such was the valour of the defendants, and the small number of them that came on to the assault, with the disaduantage of the place wherein they stood, that at length they were glad to retire with the losse of many of their fellowes. The Christians in the beginning of this siege had taken a little F Island in the riuer before the city, which was kept with some few companies of the Lord Pals his Heidons, whereof the Turks hauing intelligence at Buda, with three gallies and certaine other vessels, landed in the Island 3000 soldiers, which slew the Heidons, vnto whom no succor could be suddenly sent, and so recouered againe the Island: wherein they left a sufficient garrison for the keeping thereof, furnished with all things necessarie, and so departed.

Countie Mansfeld remoueth with the armie from Dotis to Strigonium.

The Christians repulsed.

About

About three dayes after the former assault, the Christians in hope of better successe, the G second time assaulted the Water-towne, in which assault the chief leaders were the lord Grein and Anthonie Zinne a famous captaine, had he not stained his honour with Countie Hardeck at Rab; but being pardoned by the Emperour, did now together with the rest appointed to that seruice, most courageously assault the breach, but were againe by the Turks notably repulsed, and enforced at last to giue ouer the assault, and so to retyre with the losse of 150 men: among whom Zinne himselfe was slaine, with one Captaine Ruger, and some of the Counties owne Guard: the Lord Grein was wounded in the head, and the younger Lord Schuendi with diuers other Captaines grieuously hurt. The next day after, 600 of the mountaine people came into the campe vnto the Countie, with supplications to request him, Not to giue ouer the siege vntill he had woon the Citie; promising him in the name of those Townes and Villages from H whence they were sent, Of their own charges to repaire for him what harme soeuer he should do in the Citie for the taking thereof, yea though he should lay it euen with the ground: for why, the harmes they dayly receiued from the garrison of that Citie were wonderfull.

Strigonium very full of Strigonians.

At the same time also he was aduertised by his espials (of whom he maintained many for the discouerie of the enemies doings) that Mahomet the Turkish Sultan had writ vnto the Bassa of Buda, carefully to prouide that his beloued citie of Strigonium tooke no harme, and not to spare either for men or money in time to relieue it: and therein to do nothing without the ad-uice and good liking of his old and faithfull seruant Alis Beg, who of long time had gouerned and also defended that citie: and to the intent that nothing should be wanting for the performance hereof, that he had sent Alexander Aga of the Ianizaries from the Court (whose seruice he might euill haue spared) whose approued counsel and helpe he might also vse in all things: I for that he had rather lose some other whole kingdome, than that one citie: And that therefore he should beware that it were not by the enemie woon, or by any composition yeelded: wherein if he failed, he threatened vnto him his heauie displeasure, not to be appeased without the price of his head. Which so seuere a commandement of the great Sultans the Bassa sent to them of Strigonium; with most grieuous threats from himselfe, if they, terrified with any batterie, vndermining, or assault, should yeeld the citie, & not hold it out as became valiant soldiers vnto the last man; swearing to impale them alliue on stakes that should consent to the yeelding vp thereof. The old gouernor Alis Beg hauing receiued this so straite a command from him that was both able and like ynough to performe what he had threatened; vtterly to deter the K souldiers from once thinking of yeelding, caused diligent enquirie to be made throughout the garison, if any of them had at any time made any motion of yeelding vp the citie, or otherwise murmured against their captaines or commanders appointing them to any seruice: and such as he found to haue so done, he to the terror of others caused to be presently executed: and after that went downe himselfe into the lower towne, to see that nothing were there wanting or amisse, where most danger was. But when he would haue again returned into the vpper town, he was stayed by the Ianizaries, who told him, That seeing he was of so valiant and couragi-ous a mind, and their gouernor, he should there stay with them, and take such part as they did, were it better or worse: and so would he, or would he not, there needs stay he must.

Now the Bassa's of Buda and Temeswar, with diuers Sanzackes as well of those parts of L Hungary which the Turks possessed, as other places, were assembling their forces for the relief of the besieged in Strigonium: wherof the Transyluanian prince hearing, made shew as if he would forthwith haue besieged Temeswar, so that the Bassa thereof leauing the intended expedition for Strigonium, was glad to returne for the defence of his owne charge. They also of Stiria, Carinthia, and Croatia, with the troupes of Countie Serinus had so stopped all the passages, that twelue thousand Turks which were comming from Zigeth and the places there-about, could by no meanes come to ioine themselues with their fellowes for the relieue of the distressed citie.

The higher city of Strigonium battered by the Christians.

The Countie leauing nothing vnattempted or vndone that might help for the gaining of Stri-gonium, had made a notable fort vpon S. Thomas hill, and therein placed fiue great culuerins: M wherewith he furiously battered the higher city, and did therein great harme: and thereby also brought to passe that no man could go vp or downe the hill betwixt the vpper towne and the lower; but he was in danger to be fet off with those pieces, or the musketiers, who defended by those great pieces, lay vpon the side of the hill in caues and bushes, awaiting for such as should

A should go vp or downe betwixt the two townes. Thus the Christians at one time battered the vpper towne, the lower towne, and the strong towne and fort of Gokara, standing on the farther side of Danubius ouer against Strigonium, besieged by the lord Palfi. But of all these places, Gokara was with the furie of the great ordnance most shaken: which the County per-ceiuing, caused the batterie to be encreased, and so continued, vntill he had beaten downe the counterscarfe, and made certaine faire breaches in the wall. Whereunto the Moraians (vnto whose lot it fell) the one and twentieth of Iuly gaue an assault in fiue diuers places, whom the Lord Palfi seconded with his Hungarians, of whom certaine were of purpose appointed, beside their armes, to bring things with them for the firing of the towne; which they in the time of the assault found means so well to bestow, that in a while the towne was all on a light fire. Gokara taken by the Christians.
B The Turks at first made notable resistance, but finding themselues ouerpressed, and seeing the towne now on a fire about their eares, which with the wind so encreased, that it caught hold of the lower towne on the other side of the riuer; they retired to the riuer side, where some of them by boats got ouer to Strigonium, other some perished in the riuer, the rest falling into the hands of the Christians, were by them all put to the sword. Gokara thus taken, and the fire quenched, the Christians repairing the breaches, and storing it with all warlike prouision, left in it a strong garison. Within a night or two after, were two hundred of the Turks horsemen descried in a field fast by, which caused an alarme to be raised in the campe, as if the whole armie of the Turks had been at hand: howbeit those horsemen retiring, and no other appearing, it was afterwards knowne, that they were only scouts sent out by the Turks to take C view of the armie of the Christians, in what sort they lay incamped.

The latter end of this moneth it fortuned, that a young country fellow secretly sent out of the citie by the gouernor, and falling into the hands of Palfi, was by him sent to the Countie; by whom he was in friendly manner demanded, from whence he came, whither he was going, and whereabouts? Whereunto the youth frankly answered, That he was sent from the gouernor with letters to the Bassa of Buda; which he presently drew out of his bosome, and deliue-red them vnto the Countie: who after he had read them, caused them to be closed vp againe, and so deliuered to the yong man, with some few crownes, commanding him to carrie them to the Bassa, as he was about, and in his returne to bring him the Bassa's answer, promising for his D so doing to reward him bountifully: which the yong man vndertooke to do, and so departed.
Now the purport of the gouernours letters was, That if the Bassa did not within six or seuen days send him aid and relieue him, he should for want of victuals & other things necessary for the holding out of the siege, be inforced either to abandon the city, or to yeeld it vp into the enemies hands. Wherunto the Bassa returned answer by the aforesaid messenger, that he would within the appointed time be with him, willing him in the meane time to be mindefull of his wonted valor, and not to be with any thing discouraged: appointing him the day, the houre, the way, the meane, with all the other circumstances how he would relieue him. Which letters the yong man according to his promise deliuered vnto the Countie: who thereupon prouided accordingly for the welcomming of the Bassa. Within a day after also, one of the Turks cano-niers considering the danger the city lay in, and fearing that it would be lost, fled out of it into the campe: who besides that he aptly declared the state of the city, and the wants the besieged E were in, did also afterwards good seruice during the time of the siege. The Turks had in this while many times sallied out to their great losse: yet now vpon hope of better successe, they aduentured the nine and twentieth of this moneth to sally out againe, but with like fortune as before, leauing fourscore of their men behinde them, hauing slaine but fiue of the Christians.

Now had the Turks in great wants by the space of a moneth right worthily defended Stri-gonium, expecting still for relefe. At length newes was brought into the campe, That the Bassa of Buda with 20000 men was comming to raise the siege: who the second of August came accordingly, and with his armie encamped within foure miles of the Christians: lying so nigh, that certaine of the Turks horsemen seeking after bootie, came very neere vnto the campe of the Christians, and out of the pastures, euen vnder their noses, carried away some few horses: against these desperat aduenturers, certaine troups of the Hungarian and German horsemen is-F suing out, had with them an hot skirmish: but the Turkes of purpose retiring as men ouercharged, and the Christians still following on, had at length drawne them vnto the place where diuers other troupes of the Turks lay in ambush for them, who now starting forth, on euery

euery side hardly charged them. The Hungarian light horsemen well acquainted with such skirmishes, seeing the danger, presently fled and left the Germanes to themselues: who for a while valiantly encountered their enemies, but oppressed with multitude, were glad at last to flie also. In this skirmish of the Christians were lost and grieuously wounded about 100. The Turks encouraged with this so prosperous a beginning, came on the next day with all their armie, being b[illegible] resolued, by plaine force to open themselues a way into the citie, and so to relieue the besieged. Of all these things was not the Countie ignorant, as thereof forewarned by the Bassa's letters before deliuered vnto him; and had therefore with his armie strongly belted all the wayes vnto the citie. Neuertheless the enemie came still on between the hils S. Thomas and S. George, and neere vnto the suburbs called the Rascian citie, put themselues in order of battell, as did also the Christians, giuing the enemie leaue to come euen to their trenches. In the mean time the Lord Palfi with his Hungarian horsemen fetching a compasse about the hill on the one side, and the lord Swartzenburg with his horsemen on the other, had so inclosed the Turks behind, as that they could not without great danger retire. Both armies orderly ranged, and the signal of battell giuen, the Turks hauing before without any great harme done discharged 17 field pieces, came on after their wonted manner with a most hideous cry, and at the first onset, with their Turkish arrowes, as with a thick shoure darkned the skie: when on the other side the German and Wallon horsmen with their petronels sent their deadly shot as thicke as haile amongst them againe; and the men at armes after them taught the Turks to their cost, how vnfit their light and halfe naked horsemen were in a set battell to meet with them so wel appointed: in a trice, but not without great slaughter, the battel was brought to the sword, and to be tried by true valour: There was to be heard a cry heauens high, the thundering of artillerie both great and smal, the clattering armor, the glistering weapons, the neighing of the horses, the crying of the wounded, the heauie groanings of the dying, with the noise of the trumpets, drums, and other warlike instruments, made deaf the eares of the hearers, presenting vnto them nothing but horror and euen present death. It was a most miserable sight to see so many men in so short time slaine: for the b[illegible] scarce endured halfe an houre, when many thousands of the Turks lay dead vpon the ground, and the rest seeing the victory incline to the Christians, betooke themselues to flight, leauing behind them their great ordnance and whatsoeuer els they brought for the reliefe of the besieged: whom so flying, the lords Palfi & Swartzenburg (who had before taken the straits where by they were to passe between the mountains) so receiued with their fresh horsmen, that of them that came that way few escaped. The Bassa himselfe, who stood vpon the hil, seeing the discomfiture of his men, fled also himselfe: the Bassa of Natolia with about 200 of the Turks moe by good fortune got into Strigonium. The number of the Turks slain in this battel was great, and is of diuers diuersly reported, some saying that there were slain 14000, and some fewer. Besides them that were slaine, many were also taken, and some of them men of great name and place. There was also taken 27 ensignes, with a multitude of camels, asses, and mules, laded with mony, shot, pouder, and other necessarie prouision: all which, brought thither for the relief of the besieged, became a prey vnto the Christians. In the heat of this battel they of the city sallying out, had entred a fort of the Christians vpon the riuer side, but were againe presently driuen out, and with losse enforced to retire. After this victorie the Countie sent certaine companies of the Hungarian and Germane horsemen with 500 waggons to the enemies campe not far off in the mountaines: who comming thither found it vtterly forsaken by the enemie, but wel stored with all manner of necessarie prouision, which they carried all away, together with 600 tents, many whereof were lined with damaske, satin, and other silke, richly embroidered or layed with gold lace or gold twist. The Bassa's rich Tent taken by the Colonell of the horsemen, was afterwards by him giuen vnto the Countie, as was also the plate and money there found, all which he diuided among the souldiers according to their deserts. In the Turks campe were also found certaine heads of the Christians, with the dead bodie of the Lord Brandenstein, slaine in the conflict but the day before, which the Christians carried away with them into the camp, and there honorably buried them. Those that remained of the Turks army hid themselues in the mountains and woods, and so holpen by the darkenesse of the ni[illegible] made best shift for themselues that they could. The Bassa himselfe accompanied but with twentie horse came to Buda about midnight, and by his comming filled the Citie with great heauinesse, euerie man lamenting his his lost friends. The Hungarian Heidons best acquainted with the countrie, pricking vp and down the mountains and by-waies, for certain dayes after the battell, brought in daily into the camp such prisoners as they tooke, or els the heads of such Turks as they slew. Of this so notable a victory, the Countie by a speedy messenger certified the Archduke at Vienna, who rewarded him for his good news with a chaine worth fiue hundred duckats: and presently caused the song of thankesgiuing to be sung in the church of the Augustine Friers, and afterward in all the churches of the citie. The Countie also to gratifie the Emperor, sent him by the lord Chalon his nephew, vnto Prague, two of the chiefe prisoners taken in the late battel, with foure horsemens Guidons cunningly made of horse haires, such as are commonly carried before the greatest commanders of the Turks armies, and foureteene other ensignes of the Turkes, with foureteene most goodly horses of the Turks, for a Present.

The next day after this battell, the Countie sent the Lord Palfi with an interpretor vnto the citie, to demand it to be yeelded: who hauing audience, declared vnto the Turks in what danger they were, that the helpe they looked for was now quite ouerthrowne, new reliefe could not but in long time be sent vnto them; and that therefore it should be good for them, whilest yet they might, to be well aduised, and betime to bethinke themselues of yeelding vp the citie, lest haply when they would, it then would not be accepted: promising to intreat with the Generall, that they might in safetie depart, and with sure conuoy be brought vnto such place of safetie as were conuenient. Whereunto the besieged Turks answered, That the Christians had now fiue weekes lien at the siege, and must yet lie three weeks longer: and that whereas of late some few of their friends came to haue relieued them, & had failed therein; there was yet an hundred thousand moe to come after them, who if they should not be able to perform that they came for, yet that they would not for that deliuer or forsake the citie, before they were readie to be drawne out of it by the heeles, and that yet they would then take three daies to resolue thereupon.

Now had the Christians with long and continuall batterie sore beaten both the vpper and the lower towne, which batterie they now maintained with greater fury than at any time from the beginning of the siege, and within the city their wants encreased daily, hauing nothing left to liue vpon but a little wheat and barly, with some horse flesh: vnto whom thus distressed, the lord Palfi by the commandement of the Countie (to trie what confidence they yet had in themselues) the ninth of August, sent two Gentlemen to the citie, to do a message from him to the Gouernour. Who aduertised thereof, being a very aged and courteous man, accompanied with the Aga of the Ianizaries, came to the wals to heare what they had to say; where one of the said gentlemen in few words deliuered him this short message.

The message sent by the lord Palfi to the Gouernor of Strigonium.

My most gracious Lord the Lord Palfi, most worthie Gouernour greeteth thee well, and knowing thee to bee a Captaine both valiant and wise, and one that hath alwayes courteously vsed such as haue fallen into thine hands, hath compassion of thy desperate obstinacie: and therefore, whereas thou art to looke or hope for nothing else but present death and destruction, hee as thy neighbour and a louer of thy vertues, aduiseth and exhorteth thee, if thou wilt saue thy selfe and thine from most vndoubted and imminent death and vtter confusion, without delay to deliuer vp this citie, which thou canst not longer hold.

The resolute answer of the old Gouernour, to the message sent him by Palfi.

Vnto whom the old Gouernour thus without stay courteously answered:

Thy speech my friend, and thy masters aduice are vnto me both vain. Tell the Lord Palfi in my name, that I cannot pleasure him with the least stone in this citie. One foot I haue already in the grave, and wil with honour carrie these my gray haires into the same: and am yet comforted with a most certaine and vndoubted hope, that my most dread and mightie Soueraigne, and my Lord Sinan Bassa will not forsake mee: yea and that if they should write vnto mee, that they could finde no meanes or way to relieue me (which I am sure they can) yet would I well and at leisure consider, whither it were fit for me to deliuer vp this Citie or not; seeing that of the defence thereof, dependeth all mine honour and credit. Besides that what reward they haue on both sides, that so easily deliuer ouer the cities they haue in charge, all the world doth see.

With this answer he sent them away. All this while the Aga of the Ianizaries standing by, spoke not one word, but sighing in silence and grinding his teeth, declared by his countenance his indignation and inward griefe.

In the mid way betweene Buda and Strigonium, in the middest of the riuer of Danubius lieth lieth a little Iſland called Vizze, wherein many rich clothiers dwelt: this Iſland the Hungarian Heidons ſpoiled, and in returning thence, met with 24 wagons laded with corne, going to Buda, which they tooke, with eight and twentie priſoners which they brought into the camp. G

The lower towne taken by the Chriſtians.

The lower towne being with long and continuall batterie made faultable, was by the Chriſtians the thirteenth of Auguſt, in three diuers places at once aſſaulted. The Bauarians were by lot to giue the firſt charge, who in the performing thereof, beginning to faint (for that they were notably repulſed by the Turkes) but ſeconded by them of Reitnaw and Sueuia, pluckt downe a great paliſado, filled the ditches, remoued whatſoeuer ſtood in their way, and ſo long fought with the Turks in the breaches, that by the comming in of the Marqueſſe of Burgawe with ſix enſignes of freſh men, they preuailed vpon the enemie, and ſo altogether brake in the towne. In the midſt of this dangerous fight was the Marqueſſe himſelfe, who both with his H preſence and cheerefull ſpeech ſo encouraged his ſouldiers, that they as men fearing no perill, ran headlong into all danger vntill they had entred the towne: there might a man haue heard a moſt miſerable crie, eſpecially of women and children throughout the citie; when as the Chriſtians breaking in on euery ſide, ſlew whoſoeuer came in their way, without reſpect of age or ſex, ſparing neither woman great with child, neither the little children hanging at their mothers breaſts. Yet did not all that were entred, ſo much attend the preſent execution, as ſome of them did the ſpoile and prey; and eſpecially the Hungarians, vnto whom all was good booty, euen the very hinges of the doores and windowes: whereby many eſcaped into the caſtle and vpper towne with the Baſſa and Alis-Beg the old Gouernour. The Chriſtians had not many houres poſſeſſed the towne, but that diuers fires began to breake out in diuers places, but I by what meanes was not at the firſt knowne. At laſt it was found out, that the Turks doubting the loſſe of the Towne, had before where they thought beſt left gunpouder, which taking fire by matches left burning for that purpoſe, ſhould at a certaine time ſet all on fire: by which meanes many moſt horrible fires were raiſed in the town, which conſumed many goodly buildings, and other things which might haue ſtood the Chriſtians in great ſtead, and could hardly be in a day or two quenched.

Earle Mansfild died at Komara.

This ſo ioyfull a victorie ſaw not he, by whoſe good direction next vnder God it was gained, the worthie Countie: for hee a few daies before being fallen ſicke of a feauer, taken by drinking too much could drinke in his heat, with immoderat pains taking in the late battell, & ſo afterwards falling into a great flix with a feauer, was by the counſel of his phyſitians (for the K better recouering of his health) remoued to Komara, as a place of more quietneſſe: hauing before his departure ſent for the Archduke Matthie into the camp, and for Blankemier into Bauaria to ſupplie his owne roome. But his diſeaſe ſtill increaſing, became at laſt deſperat, ſo that the phyſitians themſelues now diſpaired of his health. Yet lying thus drawing towards his end, he almoſt euery houre inquired how the armie did, and whither the citie were yet taken, or what hope there was of the taking therof. But when it was told him a little before his death that the lower towne was woon, he thereat greatly reioiced, and the next day being the fourteenth of Auguſt, towards night quietly departed this world, to the great loſſe of the Chriſtian commonweale, and the exceeding griefe of the whole armie. A man euen from his childehood brought vp in armes, of ſtature great, but of courage greater, and painful aboue meaſure, L not the leaſt cauſe of his vntimely death. All the time of this ſiege he took little reſt either by day or night, ſcarce ſo much as to lie downe vpon his bed in two or three nights together. The little meat he did eat, he moſt part eat it ſtanding or walking, yea & ſomtimes on horſbacke: he was a moſt ſeuere obſeruer of martiall diſcipline, which cauſed him to be of his ſoldiers both beloued and feared. His bowels were with due ſolemnitie buried at Komara where he died, but his bodie was brought backe againe to Luxenburg, there to be honourably enterred with his anceſtors.

About which time Theodore the great Duke of Muſcouia, hearing of the wars betwixt the Emperor & the Turke, ſent two Embaſſadors with letters and Preſents to the Emperor: which Embaſſadors comming to Prague the ſixteenth of Auguſt, accompanied with two hundred M and fiftie horſe, were by the Emperours appointment, honourably receiued and entertained. And afterward hauing audience, firſt deliuered the letters of credence from the great Duke, reported to haue beene of this purport.

The copy of the great dukes letters vnto the Emperour.

A Your Maieſtie hath ſent vnto vs your Embaſſadour Nicholas Warkouſie, requeſting our brotherly aid againſt the hereditarie enemie of all Chriſtianitie, the Turkiſh Sultan. Wherefore we alſo deſiring to liue with you our deere and welbeloued brother in all perpetuall amitie and friendſhip, ſend vnto you by our faithfull counſellor and ſeruant Michael Iwanowitze, and Iohn Sohnie, aid out of our treaſurie againſt the ſaid enemie: vnto whome we haue alſo giuen other things in charge to be propounded to your Maieſtie, requeſting you to giue vnto them in all things full credit. Giuen in the great Court of our power at Muſco, in the yeare of the world 7103, and from the nativitie of Chriſt 1595, in the moneth of April.

What things in particular theſe Embaſſadors were ſent for, was not commonly knowne, but among others it is ſaid, That the Muſcouite requeſted the Emperor to ſend an embaſſador vnto the Perſian king, to draw him alſo into the league with them againſt the Turke: which Embaſſadour ſhould firſt come into Muſcouia, and that way to paſſe into Perſia. The Preſents which the great Duke ſent vnto the Emperor, were, an hundred and fiftie thouſand Florens of gold, great ſtore of moſt rich furs, and precious perfumes, deemed to be of exceeding value, two white Faulcons, and three Leopards aliue. And Iwanowitze the Embaſſador himſelfe, preſented vnto the Emperour of himſelfe, certaine rich Turkie, Perſian, and Babylonian hangings and carpets, certain timbers of Sables, with other rich furs no leſſe precious than Sables, ſo many as eight porters could hardly carrie. Theſe Embaſſadors tarried at Prague vntill the ſeuen and twentieth day of December, and then taking their leaue, returned with the Emperours anſwer to the Duke.

C But to returne againe vnto Strigonium. The Chriſtians now poſſeſſed of the lower towne, bent their whole batterie vpon the higher towne, where it fortuned the fourteenth of Auguſt that the old Gouernour Alis-Beg, whileſt he was carefully walking from place to place to ſee where moſt danger was, had his arm ſtruck off with a great ſhot, of which hurthe preſently died. He was a man of great grauitie, about the age of fourteſcore yeres, & had of long time notably both gouerned and defended that famous citie, the loſſe whereof was like enough to haue been vnto him greater griefe than was the loſſe of his life there. Much about the ſame time alſo died the Aga of the Ianizaries, being before mortally wounded. Both the chiefe commanders thus ſlaine, the Ianizaries with the other ſouldiers and citiſens made choice of the Baſſa D of Natolia (who as is aforeſaid eſcaped out of the late battell into the citie) for their Gouernor) who with heauie cheere tooke vpon him that forlorne charge. The Chriſtians not ignorant of the death of theſe two worthy men, in whoſe great and approued valor they ſuppoſed the chiefe defence of the citie to haue reſted, were in good hope that now the reſt would the more readily hearken to ſome good compoſition, and therefore ſent a meſſenger to demand if they would yet whileſt there were ſome mercie left, yeeld the citie. Who though they had loſt their chiefe Commanders with the greateſt part of the garriſon, and were in great wants both of victuals and all things elſe neceſſarie for their defence; yet their anſwere was in few words, That they would hold it out euen to the laſt man. The greateſt cauſe of which their obſtinat reſolution, was the ſtrait charge the Baſſa of Buda had giuen them for the defence thereof: beſides that, they accounted their city holy, as won by their magnificent Emperor Solyman, whom the Turks generally yet haue in a deuout remembrance, and therfore thought it a great E impietie to deliuer it vp vnto the Chriſtians. The next day after came Matthias the Archduke into the campe; who after he had well viewed the whole armie and the manner of the ſiege, he called together into his tent the chiefe commanders, namely the Marqueſſe of Burgaw his couſin, Iohn de Medices the Florentine, and the Lord Palfi the Hungarian; to conſult with them, what were further to be done for the winning of the citie. Shortly after, he commanded the citie to be at once in two places aſſaulted, which was by the Wallons and Germanes couragiouſly performed: but ſuch was the valour of the defendants, that when the Chriſtians had done what they could, they were glad at laſt to giue ouer the aſſault, and with loſſe to retire.

F About this time came the Duke of Mantua, with the three Counties his brethren to the ſiege, and now the Turks began againe to draw together neere vnto Buda, there to make head for the reliefe of Strigonium, and to be reuenged of the loſſe they had there before receiued. Whereof the Archduke hauing intelligence, ſent out againſt them eight thouſand choſen ſouldiers out of the campe, who ſuddenly ſetting vpon the Turks in their campe, before the riſing of the Sunne made a great ſlaughter amongſt them, and tooke certaine priſoners, of whome the

Sanzacke of Copan was one: and so with victorie returned to the siege.

The beliegued Turks in Strigonium vnderstanding of this ouerthrow of their friends, from whom they expected most speedie reliefe; and beside the terror of the continuall batterie and still feared assaults, pinched also with extreme wants of all things; began now to faint. Wherefore the Bassa with the other captains, ouercome with the aforesaid difficulties, and the generall outerie of the fearful people, resolued with one consent to come now to parley, and vpon reasonable conditions to yeeld vp the citie: whereupon a flag of truce was set vp, and parley craued. Which granted, the Archduke after the going downe of the Sun came into the lower town, where nine of the Turks attended his comming: who entring into parley, required that they might vnder safe conuoy with bag and baggage depart, & so leaue him the citie: which the Archduke would not by any means agree vnto. At length with much intreatie, they obtained that they might vpon the same conditions depart, that the Christians did at Rab; with their scimitars by their sides, & so much of their goods as they could carrie vpon their backs, vnto such ships as were to be appointed for the cariage of them to Buda. For the performance whereof, hostages were on both sides giuen: and so the next day (being the 2 of September) they began to come out of the citie, moe in number than either the prisones taken in the time of the siege had confessed, or the Christians had thought. Thirty ships were appointed for the conueying of them down the riuer to Buda, which not sufficing, many of them tarried in the city vntill the next day, at which time the Bassa with the sicke and wounded sailed to Buda, the prisoners and pledges on both sides being before faithfully deliuered. Thus by the goodnesse of God and the good conduct of a few valiant Christians, was Strigonium the Metropolitical citie of Hungarie, after it had 52 yeares groaned vnder the miserable yoke of the Turkish seruitude, againe restored vnto the Christian commonweale: which the Christians forthwith repaired and new fortified, as was thought best for the defence thereof against the enemie. All which being done, about the midst of this month the Archduke sent eighteen thousand to besiege Vicegrade, otherwise called Plindenburg, a strong castle of the Turks vpon the riuer betweene Strigonium and Buda; which castle they tooke. Which when they of Buda vnderstood, they were strucken with such a feare, that many of the better sort were readie to forsake the citie; insomuch, that the Bassa to stay their flight, was glad to command the gates of the citie to be shut vpon them, and no man suffered to passe out. This good successe of the Christians in these warres, caused great reioicing to be made in most parts of Christendome.

Strigonium yeelded vnto the Christians.

The castle of Vicegrade taken by the Christians.

All this while the Christians were thus busied at the siege of Strigonium, the Transyluanian Prince was not idle, but in diuers places did the Turks exceeding much harm; so that now his name began to be dreadful vnto the. It is reported that the same day that the county Mansfelt departed at Komara, that the Prince at Alba-Iulia with great solemnitie married Maria Christina, the daughter of the late Archduke Charles the sonne of the Emperor Ferdinand; her other sister Anna being before married vnto Sigismund, now King of Polonia: for so it was agreed for the more assurance of the league betweene the Emperor and him, that he should take his wife out of the house of Austria, which he now did. Of this solemnitie the Turks (his euill neighbours) hauing intelligence, assembling to the number of 30000 or more, thought as vnwelcome guests to haue come vnbidden or vnlooked for thereunto: but the vigilant Prince vnderstanding of their comming, prouided for their entertainment accordingly, and setting his pleasures for a while apart, and comming vpon them when they least looked for him, in a great battell ouerthrew them, and slew most part of them, carrying away with him as a triumphant victor, the whole spoile of his enemies.

About the same time the Transyluanians also besieged Fagiat a town holden by the Turks not far from Temeswar, where after they had lien twelue daies, they of the towne dispairing to be able long to hold out, came to parley, and couenanting to depart with bag and baggage, began to goe out of the towne. But in their departure, vnderstanding that the Bassa of Temeswar with the Sanzacks of Lippa and Ienne were comming to their reliefe, they that were yet in the towne began to finde delaies, and they that were alreadie gone out began to returne. Wherewith the Transyluanians much moued, by plaine force entered the towne, & put them all to the sword: and afterward turning vpon the Bassa, who with ten thousand Turks and certaine field pieces was comming to haue relieued the towne, had with them a cruell battell; wherin most part of the Turks fell with smal losse of the Transyluanians: who so eagerly pursued

A sued the victorie; that the Bassa himselfe had much adoe with fiue hundred others to escape. The two Sanzackes, with diuers others of good place, were taken and sent prisoners to the Prince. Not long after, about the latter end of August, the Transyluanians also besieged Lippa, a famous citie of Hungarie, standing vpon the riuer Maracz, not far from Temeswar, which the Turkes being not able longer to hold, fled into the castle: where finding themselues in no great safetie, after three daies siege they came to parle, and so yeelded, vpon condition that they might in safety depart with so much of their goods as they could themselues carrie. About which time also the Bassa of Bosna with ten thousand Turkes and Tartars went forth to haue againe recouered Babotsca, a frontier towne, before taken by the Christians; which the Stirians and the rest of the Christians dwelling thereabouts, betweene the two riuers of Sauus and Drauus, vnderstanding, conducted by the Lords Herbenstein, Leucowitz, and Eckenberg; that had the charge of those frontiers, ouertooke the said Turks and Tartars neere vnto Babotsca, fought with them, and in the plaine field ouerthrew them.

Mahomet not a little grieued with the good successe of the Christians in euery part of Hungarie, and aboue measure offended with Ferat Bassa his General, through whose negligence all or at least wise most part of this had hapned (as he was by the enuie of Sinan Bassa persuaded) sent for Ferat home, and in his place sent out Sinan. Of which the great Sultrans displeasure Ferat was not ignorant, as forewarned thereof by her that best knew, euen the Sultrans mother, and aduised not to come in sight vntill his peace were made. Who neuertheless trusting to his owne innocencie (the comfortable, but most dangerous and weake stay of the great) and

C doubting not to answere whatsoeuer Sinan should bee able to charge him with, came to the court: where he was by the commandement of Mahomet shortly after strangled, and his goods to the value of fiue hundred thousand duckats confiscated.

Among all the dangerous enemies of the Christian common-weale, was none at this time more cruell than was Sinan, an Epyrot borne, a fishers sonne, of a rough and vnciuile disposition, now about fourescore and three yeares old, euen from his youth brought vp in the wars: and yet (as his Motto was) breathing nothing but Bloud and Warre. He had many times fortunatly led the huge armies of the Turkish Emperours, Solyman, Selymus, and Amurath, and is now sent by the great Sultan Mahomet, as the fittest man to reduce the late reuolted countries

D of Transyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, to their former thraldome: which hee before promised vnto Mahomet, vpon perill of his head to doe. Hee hauing raised a right puissant army, by a bridge made of boats (after a moneths labour spent therein) passed ouer the great riuer of Danubius into Valachia: of whose comming the Transyluanians, with the Valachians and Moldauians hauing knowledge, had before so shut vp the passages of the countrie, as that he could not without much danger haue farre entered; and were also readie with their vnited forces euen at his first entrance to giue him battell. Which hee not refusing, there began a most mortall and cruell fight, with much bloudshed on both sides. Thrice were the Transyluanians enforced to retire, but still relieued with new supplies, and knowing that they then carried in their armes the welfare of their whole Countrey, came on fresh againe, and as hardly charged the Turkes, as they had beene by them charged. Thus with doubtfull for-

A mortall battell betwixt Sinan and the Transyluanian Prince.

E tune and great slaughter was the battell maintained from the morning vntill night, victorie with doubtfull wings houering now ouer the one side, now ouer the other: vntill that at length, the Turkes ouercome by true valour, their battells beeing quite disordered and broken, were now glad to seeke to saue themselues by flight. In this battell, being fought the eleuenth of September, besides many thousands of the common souldiers, were slaine also diuers of great account amongst the Turks: and amongst the rest Haider Bassa, a man of them much regarded, was found dead euen in the same place where the battell was fought. Sinan himselfe, in making too much haste to get ouer the bridge, fell into the deep mud, and in that generall confusion of his armie, was like enough there to haue perished: but as the common Prouerbe goeth, Seldome lyeth the Deuill dead in a dike, the old Veiliarde was with much adoe

F drawne out by them of his guard, and so saued to further mischiefe. Neuertheless, the danger was so great, that for certaine dayes it was commonly reported, that hee was there drowned, most of his owne people not as yet certainly knowing what was become of him. All the spoile of the Turks became a prey vnto the Christians, as did also their great ordnance, & many of their ensignes; amongst which was one greene one, which they accounted religious, as sacred to their Prophet Mahomet, whereunto they in time of their greatest distresse flie, as vnto their last refuge: there was taken also all their tents, with great aboundance of victuals and other warlike prouision. G

The old Bassa thus ouerthrowne, full of griefe, and euen mad for despight, posted himselfe in all hast to the Court, thinking it better himselfe to make the best of that which was indeed nought, than [illegible] it made worse than nought by the enuious report of others: and withall to fill the mi[illegible] the great Sultan with desire of reuenge, which no man so much longed at ter, as himselfe: wherein he so discreetly vsed the matter, as that the late losse was easily passed ouer, as receiued by the common chance of war, or any other occasion els whatsoeuer rather than by any default of his; and new commission giuen him for the raising of another armie for the subduing of the late reuolted countries. In the meane time, to shew his hatred vnto the Christians, and to please the eyes of them of the court with the nouelti e of the sight, he caused an hundred and twelue Christian captiues whom he had in prison at Belgrade, to bee brought in chains like beasts to Constantinople, and so being led through the principal streets of the city, to the vain contentment of the citizens, to be brought to the court gate for the Sultan to looke vpon, and the courtiers to deride: from whence they were after many vnspeakable indignities conueyed to most miserable and loathsome prisons, there to be fed with the bread of tribulation. H

The Turkes enter Croatia.

About this time the Turks vnder the command of the Bassa of Bosna, to the number of almost twentie thousand, made a rode into Croatia, where they were by the Christians vnder the leading of the Lord Eckenberg and Leuewitz ouerthrowne and almost all slaine: the Christians following the chase euen into the Turks frontiers, burnt fifteen of their villages, & took the castle of Varuiuar: immediatly after, their forces encreasing by the comming in of the Lord Herbenstein, Gouernor of Valeria and Windismarche, and certaine other troups of horsemen out of Carinthia and the countries thereabouts, they returned the thirteenth of September to besiege Petrinia, otherwise called Petrowina; which because they were in hope to take by assault, they euen at their first comming couragiously assailed. But after two houres hard fight, finding both greater resistance, and more diff[illegible] than they had before supposed to haue found, and that without great ordnance (which could not in short time be got ouer the mountains) there was no good to be done, they were glad to giue ouer the assault, & with such losse as they had receiued, to returne to Siseg, there to consult further of the matter. But the same night a fugitiue horseman fled from the enemie [illegible] e to the camp and told the Christians, That Rustan Beg, Gouernor of Petrinia was in the i[illegible] assault wounded in the breast with a small shot, and dead: and that the Turks in the towne discouraged with his death and the late ouerthrow of their friends in Croatia, would vpon the first sight of them abandon the town, if they would but againe returne to besiege it. Vpon which good hope the Christians presently rise, and set forward again towards Petrinia: which the Turks (hearing of their comming) had before, as the souldier reported, for feare abandoned. So the Christians without resistance entering the towne, found therein some pillage, but better store of shot and pouder: and presently sending for certain troups of horsemen to pursue the flying Turks, took diuers of them, and among the rest the late Gouernors Lieutenant, whom they brought backe againe into the towne. Thus was Petrinia againe recouered from the Turks, to the great quiet and safetie of all that side of the countrie. I

Sigismund the Transyluanian Prince not ignorant with what an enemie he had to do, either of the malice of old Sinan, who he knew would not be long before he returned, or yet of the secret practise of the Polonians, for the withdrawing of the countrie of Moldauia from him, sought now by all means (as it stood him vpon) to make himselfe so strong as he could against so many stormes arising. It fortuned that euen at the same time the Zaculians (better known by the name of Siculi) in former time a free people, but as then tributary vnto the Turks, bordring vpon the Northeast part of Transyluania; now weary of the Turkish thraldome, and seeing the good successe of the Prince, and the late reuolted countries their neighbors, offered vnto the Prince their seruice; promising of their owne charge to maintaine forty thousand men in the field during his wars with the Turke, and yearely to pay him of euerie house a dollar, with a certaine measure of wheat, oats, and barly, after the manner of [illegible]ir owne countrey: and further, That if God should blesse him with a son to succeed [illegible]is gouernment, euerie housholder M

A shold[illegible] should giue vnto him a good fat oxe. For all which seruice they craued no more, but that they might as his subiects liue vnder his protection; yet so, as to be gouerned by their owne ancient lawes and customes. Of which their offer the Prince accepting, it was forthwith by them proclaimed in their campe, and all the people sworne to the performance of the aforesaid agreement. And hauing at that present but fiue and twentie thousand in the field, they without delay sent out their officers to presse out fifteene thousand moe, for the filling vp of the promised number of fortie thousand; wherewith they came vnto the Prince, who taking a view of his armie, found himselfe to be now fourescore thousand men strong to welcome the Bassa withall when he should come againe into his countrey. The prince taketh a view of his armie.

B Now had Sinan with great speed raised an armie of 70000 choice soldiers, amongst whom were many whole bands of the Ianizaries, the strength of the Turkish empire. With which power ioined vnto the reliques of his other broken forces, he thought himselfe strong enough for the subduing of the Prince: vnto whom came also afterward Hassan Bassa the son of the great Bassa Muhamet, one of the Turks most renowned men of warre, and Bogdanus the late expulsed Vayuod of Valachia, with many others of great name. With this armie the old Bassa by a bridge which he with exceeding charge had made of boats, passed ouer the great riuer of Danubius at a towne called Zorza or Giorgo (with vs S. George) in Valachia, a great way beneath that place where sometime the Emperor Trajan built his famous bridge of stone, worthily accounted amongst the rare and wonderfull buildings of the world. From Zorza hee marched with his armie to Tergouista, (sometime the Vayuod his chiefe citie, but then in the power C of the Turks) where is a notable monastery, which he conuerted into a castle, fortifying it with deepe trenches and strong bulwarks, and good store of great ordnance, purposing to make that the seat of his war, vntil he had againe restored those late reuolted Countries vnto the Turkish Empire, which he vpon paine of his head had vndertaken to performe. The Prince both by messengers and letters vnderstanding of the Bassa's arriual there, and hauing his armie in good readinesse, set forward to meet him and to giue him battell. But being come into Valachia, and there incamped, it is reported, That [illegible] Eagle descending from an high rocke there by, called, The Kings rocke, and houering [illegible] the Christian armie, flew about the Princes Tent, and there lighting, was taken and presented to the Prince, who commanded her to be kept as the presage of his good fortune, holding on still his way; and the fifteenth of October beeing D come within halfe a dayes march of Tergouista, he vnderstood by two Christians lately escaped from the Turks, That two dayes before, the Turks hearing of his comming were strucken with such a generall and sudden feare, that Sinan had much ado either by faire meanes or by foule to stay the Ianizaries from flight; and that [illegible] he had done what he could, yet that certain companies of them were quite fled and gon. But the truth was, That Sinan seeing the generall feare of his armie, and he himselfe no lesse fearefull than the rest; vpon the Princes approch fled with all his armie, leauing behind him for hast his tents, his great ordnance, with much victuals & other warlike prouision, carrying with him only such things as were of most value. As for the city of Tergouista, with the castle which he had made of the monasterie, he committed to the keeping of Hassan Bassa and Bogdanus the late Vayuod, now become a renegate E Turke, with a garrison of 4000 chosen soldiers, promising within a few dayes if need should be, to relieue them, but fled himselfe in all haste with his armie to Bucharesta, a dayes journey from Tergouista. From whence he presently writ backe againe to Hassan Bassa, willing him if he could to defend the castle; but if he should thinke it not possible to be kept against the power of the Prince, then betime to forsake it and to shift for himselfe. But these letters being intercepted by the Christians, neuer came to the Bassa's hands. Not long after the departing of Sinan, the Prince comming to Tergouista, entred the forsaken campe, where he found many tents with some ordnance, and great store of victuals, and without further delay summoned both the citie and the castle, which for all that were both denied him. But the next day after, Hassan considering the flight of Sinan, the power of the Prince, and withall doubting if need F should be, to be relieued by Sinan, whom he not without cause suspected not to loue him, was about vpon some reasonable composition to haue yeelded vp both the city & the castle: whereunto the garrison soldiers (being most part of them Ianizaries) would not in any case giue their consent, but stood vpon the defence of the place. Wherupon the prince began furiously to batter both the city and the castle, and after some few houres battery, by assault tooke both, & put to Siman Bassa by a bridge made of boats passeth ouer Danubius into Valachia.

Hassan Bassa taken.

to sword the whole garison; only Hassan Bassa, as taken with his owne hand, he spared, and two other Sanzacks. Bogdanus the renegate was there slaine among the rest. The Christians had there a rich prey, besides 42 great pieces of ordnance, and good store of all manner of warlike prouision. Hassan thus taken, grieuously complained, That Sinan had of a malicious purpose exposed him to manifest peril, for the grudge he bare vnto his dead father the Visier Mahomet; vpon which cause he could neuer be reuenged, he now by sinister means had cunningly performed it vpon his son: yet he craued of the Prince to be wel vsed, offering for his ransome 100000 Hungarian duckets. Whilst the prince yet thus lay at Tergouista, came thither 4000 Turks, whom Sinan had before his departure thence, sent forth to spoile the countrey, and to seeke after prey, thinking to haue there found him still: who now falling into the hands of the Christians, were there all slain, and 60000 head of cattel recouered, which these Turks had taken out of Valachia and Moldauia, & should by Sinans appointment haue bin sent to Constantinople. For Valachia and Moldauia do so abound with corne and cattell, that they plentifully serue the Imperial city of Constantinople not only with corne and flesh, but also yerely send at the least 150 ships thither by the blacke sea, laded with other kinde of victuals. Of which so great commodities the Turks were now depriued, by the reuolt of the aforesaid countries.

The fritfulnes of Valachia & Moldauia.

The Prince leauing a strong garrison in Tergouista, set forward with his armie towards Bucaresta, hoping there to haue found Sinan. But he hearing of the losse of Tergouista, and thinking himselfe in no good safetie at Bucaresta, fled thence also to Zorza. The Prince comming to Bucaresta, found it abandoned by the Turks, and so took it without resistance, yet had there in certaine field pieces, with good store of shot and pouder left there by Sinan. Hauing there stayed a while for the manning of the place, hee set forwards againe towards Zorza; and that with such speed, that he ouertooke great numbers of the Turks, whom he put all to the sword: so that the fields betwixt Bucaresta and Zorza were in many places couered with the dead bodies of the Turks. Neuertheless he could not make so great haste, marching still in good order, but that the fearefull Bassa disorderly hasting, was about some six houres or more before come to the bridge he had with great charge made ouer the riuer of Danubius; the forme whereof you may here see:

Bucaresta taken by the Prince.

The picture of the Bridge made ouer Da[nubius] by Sinan Bassa, Anno 1595.

Sinan flyeth ouer Danubius.

Ouer the hithermost part of which bridge (being in length about a mile) was Sinan with the greatest part of his armie (before the comming of the Prince) got ouer into an Iland in the midst of the riuer, wherin he had at his comming ouer incamped: but doubting now there to stay, with all the speed he could got him ouer the other part of the bridge also vnto the farther side of the riuer, with so many of his men as in so short time possibly could. Where to stay the farther pursuit of the Prince, hee brake the bridge on that side, and set fire vpon it: and thereby cut off also many of his owne men that were not as yet come ouer. Whom the prince inclosing, forced many of them into the riuer, where they perished; the rest flying into the Iland, were by the Christians fiercely pursuing them, either there slaine, or seeking by the other part of the bridge to haue got ouer, (whereof the farther end was before broken downe by Sinan, and the hither end toward the Iland now cut off by the Christians) were together with the bridge carried away by the violence of the riuer, and so altogether perished. Other some of the Christians in the meane time tooke the bridge that leadeth vnto the castle of Zorza, which standeth compassed about with an arme of Danubius, and being not very great, was kept by a garrison of seuen hundred select souldiers. Vnto which castle the prince presently laied siege, (the resolute souldiers being not by any meanes to be persuaded to yeeld it vp, but to hold it out euen vnto the last man) and after he had sore battered it, by plain force tooke it, and put to the sword all the garrison soldiers he could lay hands vpon. About an hundred of these Turks seeing they must needs fall into the power of their enemies, desperatly leapt from the top of the castle into the riuer, where not one of them escaped, being all either drowned or slaine with small shot. In the winning of this castle, two hundred and fiftie of the Christians were lost, and many wounded: but of the Turks and Tartars, betwixt the eighteenth and the last of October, perished aboue six and twentie thousand. In this castle were taken thirtie nine great pieces, with such store of armour and other warlike prouision, as might haue serued for an whole kingdome, and foure thousand Christians beside women and children, whom Sinan had taken out of Valachia, restored to their former libertie. With whom the Prince after he had set all things in order, returned in great triumph to Tergouista, and so afterwards to his palace at Alba-Iulia, where, as also at Claudiopolis and other cities through his dominions, he caused publike prayers with thankesgiuing to almightie God, to be deuoutly made for so great a victorie: ■ did also Michael the Vayuod in Valachia; who in all these great wars against the Turks was nothing inferior vnto the Transyluanian himselfe. A greater losse than this, the Turkish Emperor receiued not at land in many yeares before, being by this so happie & victorious a Prince, and the reuolt of these three countries, depriued of so much territory as they had not from the Christians of long time gained. It was by some of them of the better sort of the Turks that were taken, reported, That Sinan Bassa should oftentimes say, That this yong Transyluanian Prince had bereft him of all the honor & renown he had with great trauel got in the course of his long life; and that although he had escaped his hands, yet that he feared he would be the cause for him in these his great yeares, euen in the winding vp of all, to lose his life together with his goods and honor. Now was the Transyluanian Princes name (after the ouerthrow of this great Bassa) become dreadful vnto the Turks, and also famous through all Christendome. Which as it hath filled the eares of many with admiration, so haply may the liuely representation of his feature by cunning hand set forth, feed the longing eyes of some with delight, and serue in better stead than the rude description of his person.

The Prince returneth with victorie to Alba-Iulia.

SIGISMVND Prince of Transyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia.

Miles eras Christi, nulli pietate secundus Et solus patriæ gloria magna tuæ Inclita. Si virtus, qua te super æthera vexit, Tam stabili cursu continuata foret.

R. KNOLLES.

Of Christ thou wast a souldier true inferiour vnto none;
Thy countries joy and glorie great, vnto the world wel knowne.
If worthie vertue that thee rais'd aboue the starrie skie, With stedfast pace had run the race so well begun by thee.

Ienna yeelded to the Transyluanians.

Whilest this worthie Prince was thus busied in this expedition against Sinan, he caused the castle of Ienna (standing vpon the highway betweene Temeswar and Giula) to be besieged by certaine of his captaines appointed to that seruice; in which castle lay one of the Turks Sanzackes with a garrison of 700 Turks, who much troubled such as passed that way. They now brought to some extremitie, and terrified with the successe of the Prince, offered to giue vp the castle, so that as souldiers with their scimiters by their sides they might in safetie be brought to Panoda. Which their offer being accepted of, and they now vpon their way, the Hungarian light horsemen that should haue conducted them, e[illegible]med that these Turkes now vnder their charge had secret intelligence with the Turks in [illegible]rison at Giula and Temeswar, That they should lie in ambush for them neere Panoda, and so cut them off by the way; set

A set vpon these Turks whom they should haue conducted, and cut the throats of foure hundred of them: and yet still holding on their way, met with these Turks that lay in ambush for them, whom they after a sharpe skirmish ouerthrew, and hauing slaine a great many of them, put the rest to flight. By the taking of Ienna the wayes thereabout were quieted, especially for them of Waraden. The Sanzacke of Ienna reported, That Mahomet had a little before sent word vnto his Bassa's and Sanzackes in Hungarie, That such castles and townes as they thought were not to be defended against the Christians, they should betimes as occasion serued, yeeld them vp, or forsake them, so to spare the needlesse losse of his good soldiers: of whom he had with so many townes and strong holds lost no smal number this yere in Hungarie. Ienna thus taken, B diuers of the richer sort in Temeswar fearing to be euen presently besieged, sent their wiues and children with their treasure and such other things as they made most reckoning of, out of the citie in waggons to be conueyed vnto places of more safetie: of which waggons, seuentie were by the Christians (lying thereabout in garrison) intercepted, and in them an exceeding rich bootie.

Mahomet hauing this yere fully purposed the vtter ruine of the Transyluanian prince, & the reducing of the countries of Transyluania, Moldauia, and Valachia, vnto his obeisance by the great Bassa Sinan: had for the better effecting thereof, before prouided that the Crim Tartar (readie still at his call) should with his owne people (whereof he hath great store) and certaine bands of the Turks, at the same time inuade Moldauia; and possessing himselfe of this country, to place one Sidriake Vayuod, in stead of Stephen placed by the Prince, and to people the coun-C try with his Tartars, in reward of his good seruice, as he said; but indeed to haue them always neere at hand to do his commandements in Hungary, Polonia, Transiluania, or the other countries of the Christians thereunto adioyning. The Tartar according to his appointment, came with 70000 Tartars, accompanied with their wiues and children, to haue planted themselues in the countrey, at the very same time that Sinan came to Tergouista. But being come vpon the frontiers of Moldauia, to haue put in execution what he was by Mahomet commanded, he found there Zamoschie the great Chancellour of Polonia readie with a strong armie to oppose himselfe against him, and to stay his farther passage. Whereupon some light skirmishes passed betweene the Tartars and the Polonians: where the Tartars were still put to the worse with the losse of three thousand of their men. The Tartar Cham with Sidriake the Vayuod ap-D pointed by the Turke, finding themselues, though in number moe, yet in strength inferior vnto the Polonian, and that without his good leaue he could not passe; sent vnto the Chancellor to excuse that was alreadie past, as done without their consent by the insolencie of their soldiers; and to tell him, That their comming was not to fight with him, as hauing expresse commandement from the great Sultan Mahomet, in no case to disturbe the league betwixt him and the Polonians, but quietly to passe by their frontiers into Moldauia, and there to place Sidriake Vayuod his tributary, in stead of Stephen that now vsurped the place by the appointment of the Transyluanian; which that they might do, they craued his leaue as friends to passe. Whereun-E to the Chancellor answered, That he was come thither by the commandement of the King, to defend those countries from the inuasion of such as had in them no right: and that there had of long time bin an antient league betwixt the Polonian Kings and Turkish Emperours, vpon certaine conditions, which he would for his part keepe inuiolate, with the fauor of the Turkish Emperor, yet so, as that the kingdom of Polonia tooke no harme thereby, and that they might quietly liue by him as their good neighbor; which league he protested not to haue beene by him, but by them infringed: as for to giue them passage, he said he could not. Messengers passing thus to and fro, and some parley had, at last certaine articles were agreed vpon, to the reasonable contentment both of the Tartar and of the Chancellor (though not of Sidriake, disappointed thereby of his Vayuodship) as also of the Turkish Sultan, whose pleasure they both seemed to haue in speciall regard. Hereupon the Tartar with his multitude presently returned, F leauing the Chancellor to his owne designes. Now was it commonly thought, that the Chancellor had done the Transyluanian prince great seruice by keeping out of the Tartars, & much honor was by many that saw least spoken of him therefore. But far was it from his thought to do the Transyluanian therin any such good, at whose glory he enuied, and had with the cardinal and his brother, the Princes vnkles (but most deadly enemies) secretly conspired, so much as in them was, his vtter ruine and ouerthrow: wishing those Countries rather in the subie-

tion of the Turke, than to see them so honorably at libertie, gouerned by the Prince: such is the force of malicious enuie, the inseperable companion of worthie vertue. Which the Chancellor (otherwise a man of great fame and honor) began now openly to poure forth: for presently after the departure of the Tartars, hee with all his power passing ouer the riuer Nijester or Tyros, in[illegible]ldauia, euen at such time as the prince was going against Sinan at Tergouista, first seised vpon the castle of Chotijm, which he furnished with his owne souldiers: and from thence marching to Zorona, the metropolitica l citie of that prouince, and seat of the Vayuod, had it yeelded vnto him; and so proceeding on, had in short time almost the whole countrey deliuered vnto him; Stephen the Vayuod placed by the Prince, flying from place to place before him, from whom he lest feared any such thing, hauing made account of no other enemies but of the Turks and Tartars. Stephen the Vayuod thus driuen out, and the Chancellour possessed of the country, he presently placed one Hieremias Vayuod in stead of Stephen, to hold that honor of the Polonian king as his soueraigne. Yet neuertheless to satisfie the Turke, hee sent a messenger to Sinan Bassa, then but newly come to Tergouista, requesting him not to take it in euill part, that he had entered into Moldauia, and there placed a new Vayuod, but in the name of the great Sultan Mahomet to confirme this his doing, and the Vayuod by him placed; promising the country of Moldauia to remaine tributarie still vnto the Sultan, and that this new Vayuod should forthwith pay vnto him what tribute was behinde, and from thenceforth a far greater tribute yerely than had the country of Moldauia before. Whereunto the hautie Bassa (then fearing nothing lesse than that which immediatly after hapned, to be driuen out of those countries by the Prince) proudly answered, That it was not the great Sultans minde, that the Polonians should at all inuade Moldauia, for that beside he could without their helpe reduce those countries to his obedience, he had giuen that countrey vnto the Tartar, in reward of his good seruice already done in Hungarie and other places; whose subiects the Tartars would ere long be readie with their wiues & children to take possession of. Neuertheless the Chancellor proceeded to defend the new Vayuod by him placed: which was no great matter for him to do, Sinan the Turks champion (as is before declared) being presently after ouerthrown, and driuen quite out of those countries by the Prince. Who if he had not then gained the victory, the Chancelor had not now holden Moldauia, but the Turke, whose quarrel he seemed rather to fauor than the princes. The Chancellor to colour this his inuasion, pretended that the countrey of Moldauia did of antient right belong vnto the kingdome of Polonia: which the Transyluanians tooke to be no other but meere and open wrong. This supposed title, such as it was, the Chancellor had so fashioned out vnto the king and the States of that kingdom, that they referred it to his discretion to inuade the country, and remouing the Vayuod placed by the Prince, to place another in his stead: & the rather to perswade them, labored by many forced reasons to shew the power of the Transiluanian prince to be so far inferior vnto the Turks, that it was to be feared he should at length be thrust out of all his dominions, and so they together with Moldauia become subiect to the Turks: which if it should so come to passe, then should the Polonians haue an vntrusty and troublesome neighbour. And that therefore it were better that Moldauia were possessed by them that were better able to defend it than was hee, that so the Turke might be kept farther off from Polonia. Which occasion he said was not longer to be delaid, but now betime to be laied hold vpon: perswading himselfe to find such grace and fauor with the Turkish Emperour, as that he should be therewith right well contented: which was like enough for a time to be, for that the Transiluanian should thereby be much weakened. By these and such like reasons, framed to serue his owne turne, the Chancellour so preuailed with the King and the States of the kingdome, that he receiued (as I said) full authoritie to proceed in the matter as he did, and as is before declared, to the great trouble of the Prince, and benefit of the Turk: the late chosen Vayuod not long after opening a way in three places for the Tartars into Transyluania, one by the country of Siculi, another by the way that leadeth to Alba-Iulia, and the third by Valachia.

The reasons pretended by the Chancellor for the inuasion of Moldauia.

The late chosen Vayuod opens three ways vnto the Turks & Tartars into Transyluania.

The Transyluanian Prince seeing the country of Moldauia by the practise of the Chancellor thus taken from him and disseuered from the other vnited prouinces, to the great weakning of his estate; after the flight of Sinan, sent certain companies both of horse and foot, to Stephen the late Vayuod, but now driuen out by the Polonians, to proue if happily he could by that meanes driue out the Polonians againe, and recouer his former dignitie. With this ayd sent from from the Prince and others that fauored his quarrell, he ioyned a bloudie battel with the Polonians: but being therein by them ouercome and taken, and for a space kept (as the Prince feared, to haue been deliuered vnto the Turke) he was by them (as is reported) cruelly afterwards put to death.

This foule dealing of the Polonian in Moldauia much grieued many good Christians, as tending to the generall hurt of the Christian commonweale. For which cause the Emperor by his Embassadors sent for that purpose vnto the Polonian king, sought to perswade him to desist from such inuasion of the Transyluanian Prince by his Chancellour, as nothing standing with his honour; and that some good reconciliation might be made betweene the Prince and the Cardinall Bator & his brother, the Princes vncles, authors of all these troubles. To which purpose also the Pope sent a messenger with like instructions and letters vnto the king, perswading him, not so to prosecute his wars against the Prince, but to turn his thoughts vnto a more peaceable and Christianlike course, especially with him with whom he was so neere linked in marriage. To the like effect he writ also vnto the Cardinall Bator, and after many graue admonitions peremptorily cited him to Rome. But forasmuch as the proceedings of the Polonian against the Prince are more plainly to be gathered by the Popes letters vnto the King, it shall not I hope be mistaken, if I here set them downe thus as I finde them by others reported.

The Popes letters vnto the king of Polonia to dissuade him from inuading the Prince.

Pope Clement the eighth, to our best beloued sonne in Christ, Sigismund, by the grace of God King of Polonia, with the benediction Apostolicall sendeth greeting. By how much greater affection of fatherly loue wee embrace your Maiestie in the Lord, so much the more feruently wee wish all your actions te bee adorned with the greatest commendation of true godlinesse and wisedome, both before God and men: Whereof it proceedeth, that wee are so much the more vehemently and grieuously moued, if we heare any such thing of you, as may seeme not agreeable to your vertue and approoued zeale toward the Catholicke Religion, or tending to the obscuring of the glorie of your name, as is now brought vnto vs concerning the affaires of Moldauia; whereof not without great griefe wee write vnto you. And to rehearse things a little before past: With what earnestnesse and feruencie dealt I with you, that for Gods cause, and the defence of the health and libertie of the Christian commonweale against the tyrannie of the Turks, you would combine your selfe with our most dearely beloued sonne Rodolph the Emperour, and diuers other Christian Princes? and that you should not let slip so notable an occasion, so worthily to deserue of God, of the Catholicke faith, and of the Christian commonweale in generall? And albeit wee then thought, as well for many your owne priuat respects, as also of your Kingdomes, That you were to be borne withall and excused if you did not now openly descend into this confederation of the Christian Princes against the most mortall and common enemie, neither apertly ioyne your forces or giue aid for the repressing of his insolencie; yet wee alwayes assured our selues, that no let should in any case proceed from you, whereby either the Emperour or the other Christian Princes should be the rather hindered, iustly to prosecute their iniuries, or to cast off from their necks the heauie yoke of the most cruell tyrant: whose desire of soueraigntie is not comprised within the compasse of any bounds. But that you should in fauour of the Turkes impugne the Catholicke Princes and defendours of the Christian faith, and so ioyne hands with the enemies of the Crosse of Christ, as that by your helpe their force and furie should be encreased, and ours not onely weakened, but in the very course of victorie hindered, and cast into most grieuous perils; this we haue not only not thought of you, but not so much as once suspected: yea and can now scarce be perswaded to beleeue those things to bee done by you, which are reported vnto vs as most true and vndoubted. For the report goeth, That you hauing intelligence with the Turkes and Tartars, haue with them conspired, and namely against our welbeloued sonne Sigismund, Prince of Transyluania, who with inuincible courage fighteth the battels of the Lord: and lest hee should bee able to abate the force and attempts of the most proud Enemie (which by the singular mercie of God he hath hitherto aboue his owne power performed) but rather bee enforced much to feare his owne estate, a new Vayuod and Prince as it were by a triumuirate authoritie and compact to bee placed in Moldauia, and him by the Turkes, you, and the Tartars together, to be made Gouernour of that Countrey. Which vnto vs seemed so new and so strange, and contrary to the good opinion wee had alwayes conceiued of you, yea and so vnbeseeming your zeale and wisedome, that for griefe and admiration I had almost cryed out with the Prophet, You heauens be amazed at this, and you gates thereof be you exceedingly heauie. For what could be suspected or imagined farther from the expectation of vs and all good men, or more incredible, than that Sigismund the

the most religious King of Polonia and Sweden, who had alwayes professed himselfe a most earnest de- C fendor of the Catholicke religion, who was ready euen with his owne blood to redeeme the victorie of the Christians, and glorie of the Crosse, against the most wicked enemies of the same, to be vpon the sudden become so vnlike vnto himselfe? And (so much as in him was) to cut off the hope and [illegible] of that religious warre, and to doe harme to a Christian and Catholicke Prince, nay to re[illegible]ague and friendship, euen with the most barbarous nations and the Tartars, the perpetuall enemies of himselfe, and of the Kingdome of Polonia. For which causes our minde is tormented with such bitternesse of griefe, that we could not but by speedie messengers write vnto you concerning this matter, that hereby you might the sooner see the greatnesse of our griefe: and wee also without delay might signifie vnto you, what our fatherly loue towards you requesteth in so important a matter. For happily wee will send one euen of purpose to you concerning this cause, the care whereof H grieueth vs more than can well be expressed. Wherefore most dearely beloued sonne, wee exhort you, and in the most effectuall manner wee can, aduise you and beseech you in the Lord, more attentiuely to consider what great displeasure both of God and man this your action and resolution may procure, what a losse it may bring vnto your crowne and dignitie. For beleeue vs, that are to you in stead of a father in Christ, who loue you not fainedly, but faithfully, and indeed; who wish for your glorie in this world, and your eternall felicitie in the world to come: beleeue vs (I say) this doth much blemish your fame with all Christian Kings and Princes, all men take it in euill part, and detest it as a thing monstrous, that it should by your meanes bee wrought, that the Christian affaires should not prosper, that an he-reticall Prince, who had vowed himselfe for Christ and his country, should not haue prosperous successe in this so religious and necessarie a warre against the Infidels, Turkes, and Tartars, no lesse yours, or I peradventure also more yours, and other Christian Princes enemies, than his. But what doe we say? you to hinder the proceedings of the Transyluanian Prince? this were happily but a small matter: nay verily, by this meanes not onely a Christian and Catholicke Prince, and valiant champion of the Christian faith (a vertue both admirable and amiable in the verie enemie) but your owne brother in law, bound vnto you with so many bonds of affinitie, whose children shall be as it were your childrens brethren, is by this meanes brought into great danger, and exposed vnto the furie of the most mercilesse Turkes. What doe you then my most dearely beloued sonne? Beware that all men, both now liuing, and hereafter to come, condemne you not of the greatest inhumanitie: But beware yet more, that you seeme not ingratefull not onely to your owne nigh kinsman, but to God himselfe, who hath bountifully blessed you with two great Kingdomes, and so many good things: and that you prouoke not him to wrath against your selfe, K that reuelleth and confoundeth all euill and wicked deuices: and that this mischiefe that you haue brought vpon your brother, by the iust iudgement of God redound not to the greatest destruction of you and your Kingdome, which he in mercie forbid. [illegible] you thinke, that the Transyluanian being ouer-come, you shall in safetie liue from the treacherie of the Turke? Doe you not know him to be a faithlesse man, which measureth all things by his owne profit, which keepeth faith with none, but as standeth with his owne commoditie, who with an vnsatiable desire gapeth after euery Kingdome, nay thirsteth after the destruction of all Christendome? Thinke also my sonne, what wrong you shall doe vnto the Emperour your cosin, out of whose Imperiall blood you haue begotten sonnes and heires, and by the grace of God shall moe, but also our dignitie, and the dignitie of this Apostolicall seat (which you haue alwayes so deuoutly honoured) is thereby hurt, and your most deare mother (which wee know you of all other L least would) the Romane Church is offended, which for the maintenance of this sacred Warre is at great and wonderfull charges: and our forces, which by you ought to haue beene relieued and en-creased, beeing in so vnfit a time by these stirres in Moldauia dissenered and diminished, and the enemies on the contrarie part encreased and strengthened, into what danger and distresse may both our armie of the Church and the Emperours fall? And withall, how greatly all the manner and managing of this whole warre is thereby confounded, there is no man that seeth not. Yea and this moreouer, which no little concerneth the dignitie of vs and this holy See, wee haue vndertaken and certainely promised to our most dearely beloued sonnes Rodolph and Sigismund, that your royall Maiestie should not in any thing hinder or hurt their affaires: neither did wee hereof assure them vpon a light occasion, but mooued with great reason, not onely for that we deseruedly ought so to promise of you in so iust M a cause, but also for that it was so vnto vs plainely and expressly written by the reuerend Father, the Bishop of S. Seuerus, our Apostolicall Nuntio with you, whom wee know to bee both vnto vs faith-full, and to you dutifull: neither can we by any meanes [illegible] of, because he hath writ vnto vs concerning so weightie a matter, that he receiued it euen from your owne mouth. Which things so standing seeing

A seeing you of your selfe see the manifold absurdities of this fact on euery side, not to speake of the haynousnesse thereof: we request you againe, yea and oftentimes, forthwith to applie the necessarie remedies to these hurts. The Transyluanian Prince your brother in law, denoted to your selfe, and desirous of your fauor, either protect with your defence, or at least wise hurt him not: yea hurt not the whole State of the Christian common-weale, and relieue not by any meanes the quarrell of the enemies of Christ. If you haue any controuersie with the Prince Sigismund, or desire of him any thing, referre it vnto vs, that is to say, vnto your most louing father: you know your affaires to be of vs fauoured, and wee hope by the power of God that it may easily come to passe that some conuenient means may be found whereby peace and quietnesse may be confirmed betwixt you, and good vnity grow betwixt you two brethren our sonnes, and so all the root of bitternesse and displeasure to be vtterly pluckt out of your minds. This haue

B I writ vnto you my sonne, frankly and from a sincere heart, though truly much grieued, because we loue you, and are much carefull of your honor and good: Shew you again in deed that you take it so, as written from your father, and that you altogether preferre our fatherly and wholesome exhortations before the sinister persuasions of others. Farther concerning these matters, you shall vnderstand by the same Bishop our Nuntio now with you, to whom you may (as you haue done) giue credit in all things, as to our selfe.

These letters dated from Rome the eighth day of Nouember, were deliuered to the king in December, with others to the Cardinall and Chancellor, whom the Pope sharply reproued as the authors and contriuers of all these mischiefes.

C The Tartar Cham before stirred vp by the Turkish Emperour Mahomet, for the inuasion of Moldauia (as is already before declared) about this time sent his Embassador also vnto the Polonian king, for the confirmation of such articles as he had before agreed vpon with the Chancellor: which because they manifestly declare the ground and purpose of his entended expedition into Moldauia, with the foule collusion of the Chancellor with the Turks and Tartars against the Transyluanian Prince, I thought it not amisse, or from our purpose (for the more manifestation of that which is already said) here to set them downe, as they are translated out of the Tartar language.

The copy of the Letters of the Tartar vnto the king of Polonia.

D Cham Kazikiery vnto the King of Polonia and Sweden our brother, one of the great Lords among the Christians, humbly boweth his head. First wee signifie vnto you, that Aaron Palantine of Moldauia was a forsworne traitour; who hauing gathered a power of the Valachians, and ioyning vnto him the Polonian Cossackes spoiled the territories of the great Sultan. But afterward dissention arising among them, the Hungarian Cossackes liuing in Valachia, sent Aaron in bonds vnto the King of Vienna: after him followed another traitour called Rozwan, who also hauing raised certaine companies of souldiers, began in like manner to forrage the countries of the Turkish Emperour thereabout: which as soone as he had knowledge of, he writ vnto mee his brother, That I should with all possible speed goe into Valachia to chastise these rebells, to burne their houses and townes; and hauing with the edge of the sword slaine their men, to carrie away with me their wiues and children into captiuitie. Hauing this in charge, I the great Cham of the great territorie of the great Lord Karykterey, with my brother

E Letikerry Galga, and other my brethren and Counsellors, warlike and valiant Captaines and Marzii, mounting my horse, came with mine armie into Valachia vnto the riuer Prut where it meeteth in another riuer called Cocora: here we chanced vpon a faithfull seruitor of yours, our brother the Chancellor, who was also come a little before vs into Valachia; with whom after some light contention when we began to be more tractable, he declared vnto vs, that he was of purpose come into Valachia to place there a new Vayuod, which (as he said) of antient right belonged vnto the Polonians; without any wrong or preiudice therein to be done to the couenants and league they had with the Emperor of the Turks; and farther that his desire was, that one Ieremias whom he had appointed Vayuod, might haue the command of that Prouince; and that the antient amitie, such as was in the time of Sultan Solyman and Cham Dawlethgerd, might be faithfully kept. Which when I had for my part faithfully sworne to doe, and he

F likewise had caused the same to be done by such of his as he had therefore sent vnto me, we decreed together, that the Cossackes on the farther side of Nijester (disordered and rebellious men) should be vtterly rooted out, that they should not hereafter doe any harme in the territories of the great Sultan and that the Presents vsually sent vnto vs of long, euen since the time of Sultan Solyman, should no more be detained, nor any harmes be hereafter done in any part of our dominions. And therefore when the Chan- celler had promised vnto vs; that he would take order that these Cossackes should be vtterly destroyed, and also consented, that according to the pleasure of the royall maiestie of you my brother, Hieremias should hold the Vayuodship of Valachia: which I forthwith by letters signified vnto the Turkish Emperour. Now if it be so, that your Maiestie shall giue your consent vnto those things which we haue here agreed vpon with your ... cellour, you shall then for euer finde brotherly friendship with me, my brother, and all other our captains and Murzis: but if you shall not destroy these Cossackes, you shall not then perform the oath and couenants made. These things we haue commanded to be declared vnto you by our Embassador our brother Gianach Metagra, whom we request your Maiestie courteously to entertaine, and by him to send the Presents vnto vs: for wee will not now this yeare send any other. Giuen at the riuer Prut in the yeare of Mahomet 1004.

The Presents offered by the Tartar embassador to the king of Polonia

After the Tartar Embassador had deliuered those letters vnto the king, with a speech in effect to the same purpose, he in the name of the Cham gaue vnto him an horse and an arrow for a Present: & afterward being brought to a lodging appointed for him, was commanded there to expect his answer. At length his dispatch was giuen him in letters sealed vp, which he tooke much against his will, requesting the king to send an Embassador vnto the Cham: and farther by word of mouth, to tell him what to answer vnto his Lord. But other answer could hee get none, than was alreadie deliuered him in writing: and so rewarded with a gowne furred with Sables, was dismissed without the Present requested by the Cham, or any Embassador to accompanie him.

Thus the Transyluanian Prince, on the one side mightily impugned by the Turke, and on the other by the setting on of the Turke readie to haue been no lesse endangered by the inuasion of the Tartar, receiued greater harme from the Polonians beeing Christians, than from both those great Mahometane Princes: the Polonian in some sort performing for the Turke, what hee had plotted to haue beene done by the Tartar: and so by the taking away of Moldauia from the Prince, not onely weakened his strength, but also opened a way for the barbarous enemies into his Countrie. Howbeit ... is that the Polonians alledge for the excuse of themselues, and the defence of that which was by the great Chancellor then done in Moldauia: which for that it cannot be better told than by the great Chancellour himselfe, let vs heare how he by his letters answereth the matter, euen vnto Clement the Pope himselfe.

Iohn Zamoschie vnto Cl... eighth the great ... p.

Za moschie the great Chancellor his Letters vnto Clement the Pope.

Most holy and blessed father in Christ, and most gracious Lord, after the kissing of your most blessed foot, and my most humble commendations, I haue by your Holinesse Letters directed both vnto the Kings Maiestie and my selfe, vnderstood as well his royall Maiestie and my most gracious Lord and Master, as also my selfe as his seruant to be both accused vnto your Holinesse: as if by those things by vs done in Moldauia, the endeauours of the Christians had beene hindered, and the power of the enemie confirmed. Whereof I am not with many words to purge my selfe vnto your Holinesse, forasmuch as I assure my selfe your holinesse to haue alreadie fully vnderstood both what the things were that were done in Moldauia, and how they were done: partly by the Kings Maiesties Letters, and partly by his principall Secretarie, for that cause especially sent vnto your Holinesse. Yet doubt I not to request this one thing of your Holinesse, that if it hath knowne me for a man, I will not say of any capacitie or wit, but euen of the least experience in the world, or of any religion at all, so to persuade it selfe of mee, nothing to haue beene done, especially in this matter, either rashly, or to the hinderance of the Christian common-weale. I will not now repeate what mine opinion was concerning the league and confederation to bee made with the rest of the Christian Princes, for the combining of their forces against the common enemie, especially his sacred Maiestie: as also what mine owne labour and endeauour was in the last assembly of the States in the high Court of Parliament. Which thing after it was euen by them whomesoeuer most concerned, either delayed or neglected, or vtterly cast aside, and yet his Maiestie had still a great desire to doe the Christian common-weale some great good, I also to the vttermost of my power laboured to that end; that by the common decree of the Kingdome, an expedition might be made into Tartaria, not so much in reuenge of the iniuries done by that enemie in these late late yeares past, as so in the meane time to tame him from the neckes of the Christians, as that he should not ioyne his forces with the Turkes: or if it so pleased God to blesse those our endeauours, vtterly at length to root out that so great a mischiefe. But how it came to passe that this expedition, so much by the King desired (yet scarcely begun or taken in hand) tooke not effect; it is not me ... full for me ... declare, for that I suppose your Holinesse hath by others, especially your Nuntio, vnderstood the same. In the meane time, by others and often messengers newes was brought, That Sinan Bassa with a great armie was alreadie come ouer Danubius; and I by letters from the Vayuod of the farther Valachia was aduertised, how that he, not able to encounter him, had forsaken that Prouince which at the first impression taken and almost vtterly wasted by Sinan, he was now come fast vpon Transyluania, and in Moldauia the Tartar was still expected, insomuch that Rosman (who hauing taken prisoner Aaron the Palatine whom hee serued, in his house, and so himselfe inuaded the Palatine) began now also to quake for feare, and to craue helpe of mee, or rather to seeke how hee might flie away (as not long after he did) neither hauing any great strength about him, or expecting any greater from the people of that country: for why, that Prouince was brought so low by the miseries of the former yeares, but especially by such as had euill gouerned the same, that at such time as I entered into Moldauia, I assure your Holinesse there were not in it of housholders aboue 15000, and those also for the most part poore country people of the basest sort, in whom there could neither be any great helpe, neither if they had been able to haue done any thing, durst Rosman haue trusted himselfe with them, vpon whom he had with all kind of crueltie tyranized. Chotim a castle in the very confines of this kingdome, was kept with no greater garrison than 200 Hungarians who perceiuing themselues neither of sufficient strength to hold the place, nor to withstand the enemie, they also by and by followed after Rosman. All the rest of the Prouince was not onely vnarmed, but altogether poore and naked, without any certaine gouernment, without counsell, without strength, and without any defence at all, two castles onely excepted: which standing vpon the confines of Polonia, might haue serued better for the enemie, out of them to haue infested vs, than for the defence of Moldauia against them: so that had the enemie once set foot into that Prouince, neither could it without a great power haue beene recouered, neither being recouered, could easily haue beene defended against so puissant an enemie: and that which worse was, was not it selfe alone to haue bin consumed with that fire, but like enough to haue carried away with it Podolia also, bordering vpon it, with a great part of Russia. Wherefore in this state of things, when as both that Prouince was in greatest danger to haue beene lost, and so many enemies houered not more ouer the heads of al Christendome, than ouer this Kingdome, what was of vs to be done? I know to whom I speake these things, euen vnto him, not onely whose diuine wisedome, but singular loue also towards my natiue country is to mee most knowne. Verily I entered into Moldauia with no great armie, yet such an one as haply (as in like case it often chanceth) Fame had made among st the enemies a very great one: so that Sinan fearing if he should thrust himselfe with his armie into the straits whereby hee was to breake into Transyluania, to bee shut in by our armie, stayed his iourney: and the Tartar the more earnestly he was called vpon by Sinan (by reason of the fame of this our armie resolued to make himselfe so much the stronger. So that whilest hee assembleth the Nogaian Tartars and others farther off, and so from all parts raiseth the greatest power he could, the matter was delaied almost vnto the end of November: at which time he with a most huge armie, accompanied with Sendziak Iehiuense, and a great power of the Turkes raised out of their Prouinces thereby, came directly vpon mee in the fields of Coroce. Sendziak the Tartar Cham his sisters sonne, now called himselfe the Bassa of Moldauia, as did the Tartars eldest sonne name himselfe Prince of another part of that Prouince also: for so that country was to haue bin diuided betwixt them, that that part which was next vnto the Tartars dominions, should bee allotted vnto the Tartar, and the other part confining vpon this Kingdome, to be gouerned by Sendziak, as Bassa thereof, and so to make it the seat of a perpetuall warre; from whence Podolia, Russia, and the lesser Polonia might bee with continuall incursions wasted euen before our faces: concerning which matter they now dispersed their Letters, wherein they published the power and authoritie giuen them from the grand Seignior, exhorting the people of that country to receiue the same. A whole day wee fought with this multitude, our men alwaies by the goodnesse of God hauing not onely the vpper hand, but without any notable losse almost, yet not without great slaughter of theirs: and would to God I had had such strength, as that not onely the conditions of peace, but euen the enemies themselues might haue beene in my power. But when wee were oftentimes come to parle (they still requiring the same) and so at length vnto conditions of peace, if such were giuen them, as whereby this onely Kingdome had without the wrong of any other beene deliuered from so great and sudden a danger, what reasonable man could finde fault there- therewith, if wee should haue preferred the health and welfare of our countrey (whereunto all good men owe all they haue) before other weens profits? But now these things were so done, as that it was no lesse prouided for the good of the neighbour Christians, yea and happily not the least for theirs, who for the same slander this Kingdome vnto your Holinesse: the furie of Sinan Bassa was by this meanes repressed, whe[illegible] he feared to be shut vp in the straits by our armie now come into Moldauia, and expected t[illegible]ars comming, spent almost all the rest of the Summer idely and without any thing doing. Th[illegible]r himselfe was not onely turned from the bowels of Christendome, whereinto hee had purposed (as the yeare before) to haue entered, wee hauing with our owne breasts receiued his force and furie: but beeing brought vnto conditions, was expressely enioyned in a most short prefined time, and without any more harme doing to returne againe into his countrey by the selfesame way hee came, and by no other: whereby it is come to passe, that vntill this day Christendome hath not this yeare yet felt the Tartars weapons. But vnto Transyluania and Hungarie, what a space and power was giuen for them to gather their strength and forces together, and out of the same places to oppose them against the enemie, when as our armie kept them safe at their backes, and eased not onely Moldauia, but Valachia and Transyluania also of that care? Whereas if this cause of delay had not beene obiected vnto the Turkes first, and after vnto the Tartars; not to say any thing of the Turkes; the Tartars at the verie selfesame time that the Transyluanian armie was gone into Valachia against Sinan, might haue broken into Transyluania before it could haue returned home, or else marching directly towards that armie, might haue met with it out of Transyluania. As for Moldauia, which together with the memorie of the Christian name, yet left in it, had vtterly perished, it was most manifestly preserued by the comming of our armie. Which what end it would haue had, if the enemie might at his pleasure haue raged as hee did in the farther Valachia, those most bitter remembrances in it yet at this day smoking, doe well declare: out of which it is well knowne moe thousands of Christian captiues to haue beene carried away into most woefull captiuitie, than almost out of any other Prouince in all the time of these miserable warres. Which although it bee thus, yet boast wee not thereof, neither send wee any triumphant Letters vnto your Holinesse, nor brag wee of our good seruice done for the Christian commonweale; contenting o[illegible]ues with the conscience of the thing it selfe. In the meane time wee are accused vnto your Holines[illegible]t for what cause? If any man complaine for the taking of Moldauia, I will not say it was by them before willingly forsaken, whilest I was yet in the frontiers thereof; but that this Kingdome hath a most antient right vnto it, and such a right as that when our Kings beeing busied in their warres against the Muscouite, the Cruciat Teutonie brethren, or others; some others also troubling the state thereof, it for a time became a prey vnto the Turkish Tyrants, yet in all the Leagues made or re[illegible]twixt this Kingdome and them, was still excepted, That all such things as the Palatine [illegible]ute was of dutie to performe vnto the King, should by him still bee performed. Which K[illegible] of Polonia, and namely Augustus himselfe, the last of the Iagellonian race, appointed diuers of those Palatines themselues. Which although they be things most manifest, yet hauing more regard vnto the welfare of that Prouince, as a Christian countrey, than of our right, wee restored the same into the same state wherein it hath beene for many yeares before these * warres. Wherefore if any man thinke any thing done, whereby the enemies of the crosse of Christ might bee eased or strengthened, or the defendours of the Faith hindered, it is so farre from any such thing to bee done, that rather (as is before declared) the enemies force is repressed and auerted, and greater meanes giuen vnto the Christians afront to impugne them, the enemie being at their backes by vs shut from them. But I feare that they haue not fully enformed your Holinesse, how these things were done, who haue reported vnto your said Holinesse not onely the name of the Turkes to haue beene proclaimed together with the Polonians in Moldauia, but also the name of the Tartars the proper enemies of the Polonians, and by the power and Decrees of them three, as it were confederat together, things to haue beene ordered in Moldauia. Which their complaint if it tend to that end, as if a confederation were made with them, I frankely confesse certaine conditions to haue beene giuen them, but such as whereby is prouided not onely for the quiet and securitie of this kingdome, but no lesse also for the whole Christian commonweale, as is before declared. All which things for al that, although they were done for the good of this Kingdome, and all Christendome in generall, yet were they so done, that they were all by mee referred vnto the Kings Maiestie and the States of the Kingdome: so that at this present the kingdome is at free liberty either to [illegible] in confederation with the rest of the Christian Princes; or if that cannot vpon certaine and ind[illegible] conditions be agreed vpon, yet with no mans iniurie or hurt to ratifie this, ioyned with the hea[illegible]nd good of a great part of the Christian commonweale:

* Viz. to become tributary vnto the Turks commonweale: only God grant that the Christian Princes may seriously think both of this so Christian a confederation against the common enemie, and strine also all together against the enemie with their weapons, and not with misreports and slanders one against another. They are not to assaile the enemies feet, but his throat: neither is the seat of the war to be placed in the borders of Polonia, where it concerneth themselues much to haue all things rather peaceable behinde them; but let the war be vndertaken with no lesse charge and preparation, than if the enemies royal seat were to be assailed; which standing in an open and plaine Countrey, shall alwaies without much ado be his that being strongest can take it. This haue I written at large, as my purpose was, all which I most humbly beseech your Holinesse with your diuine wisedome to consider of, and with your woonted clemencie to accept the same. And so prostrate at your Holinesse feet, I most humbly commend me to your clemencie. From Zamoschie the tenth of Ianuarie, 1596.

Thus much the great Chancellor in defence of himselfe and of that he had done in Moldauia: which howsoeuer it contented the Pope, well I wot it nothing pleased the Emperor, and much lesse the Transyluanian Prince, now not a little weakened by the taking away of the countrey of Moldauia from him.

To end this troublesome yeare withall, many sharpe and bloudie skirmishes yet daily passed in diuers places of those frontier countries, the Turks almost in euery place still going to the worse. In the beginning of Nouember, Leuewitz gouernour of Carolstat the second time surprised Wihitz in the frontiers of Croatia, where these wars first begun: but being not able to take the castle, contented himselfe as before with the spoile of the city, and afterward setting it on fire, departed. Maximilian also attempted Zolnoc: and the Christians in garison at Strigonium and Plindenburg, now become neere neighbors vnto the Turks at Buda, did with continual inrodes not a little molest them both all the latter end of this yeare, and the beginning of the next. And the Turkes in Braila in Valachia vpon the side of Danubius, fearing after the flight of Sinan to be besieged by the Vayuod, forsooke the citie, and in such hast passed the riuer, that in that tumultuous passage three hundred of them perished. Sinan Bassa by the Transyluanian Prince of late driuen out of Valachia, was not long after sent for to Constantinople: but the craftie old fox not ignorant of the fierce nature of the great Sultan, and warned by the late misery of Ferat, found occasions to delay the time so long, vntil that he was sent for again, and after that, the third time also. In the mean while he had so wrought by his mighty friends in court, & by rich rewards, mightier than they, that at his comming to the court he was there honorably receiued, as the chiefest of the Bassa's, and being afterwards offered to be discharged of the wars, as a man of aboue fourescore yeares old; he refused so to be; saying, That hee was borne and brought vp amongst soldiers and martial men, and so wished among them to dy: as not long after he did; dying as was thought of conceit of the euil successe he had in his wars against the Transyluanian.

Sinan Bassa sent for to Constantinople.

His death.

Mahomet the Turkish Emperor exceedingly grieued with the losse of so many his cities and strong places this yere lost, as namely Strigonium, Vicegrade, Siseg, Petrinia, Lippa, Ienna, Tergouista, Bucharesta, Zorza, and many others of lesse name: and both by letters and messengers vnderstanding daily of the slaughter of his people, and wasting of his frontiers, commanded great preparation to be made against the next Spring; giuing it out, that he would then in person himselfe come downe into Hungarie with such a power as neuer had any his predecessors the Othoman Kings and Emperors, and there take most sharp reuenge of all his former wrongs. Neuertheless these his so hastie designes were by the plague and famine (which then both raged extremely in most part of his Empire) and by other great occurrents of the same time, so crossed, that by that time the Spring came, he scarcely wel knew which way to turne himselfe first. For beside these troubles of the West, of themselues ynough to haue filled his hands, the Georgians in the East, a warlike people, moued with the good successe of the Christians in Valachia and Hungary, had taken vp armes against him; and the old Persian King but a little before dead, had left that great kingdome to his sonne, a man of greater spirit than was like to endure the manifold iniuries before done vnto his father by the Turks, to the great dishonour of that kingdome, and preiudice of himselfe. Of which things the Bassa of Tauris gaue him ample intelligence, wishing him betimes to prouide for such stormes: which ioyned to the rest, filled his head with many troubled thoughts, whereunto we leaue him vntil the next Spring.

Mahomet perplexed.

The

The Transyluanian Prince carefull of his estate, and not a little troubled with the disseuering of Moldauia, thought it not vnfit for his affaires, now after the flight of Sinan and discomfiture of the Turks, to go in person himselfe vnto the Emperor, to declare vnto him the wrong done him by the Polonian; and further to confer with him concerning the mannaging of the wars against r[illegible]nmon Enemie. So hauing put all things in readinesse for his journey, hee 1596 set forward in Ianuarie 1596, and by the way of Cassouia the fourth of Februarie arriued at Prague in Bohemia, where he was by the Emperors appointment most honourably entertained. But immediatly after his comming thither he fell sicke of an Ague, which grieuously vexed him by the space of three weekes. In the latter end of Februarie hauing somewhat recouered his health, he went to the Church: where after his deuotions done, he was by the Deane of the Cathedral Church welcommed with a most eloquent Oration, setting forth his worthie praises, and further animating him vnto the like exploits against the common Enemy of all Christianitie. Whereunto he forthwith answered in Latine so eloquently and so readily, that all men maruelled that heard him: protesting in his speech, That as he and his subiects had not hitherto spared their liues or goods in defence of the common cause; so would they not afterwards spare the same, but aduenture all for the benefit of the Christian Commonweale: well hoping, that the Emperor and the other Christian Princes would not as occasion should require be wanting vnto him with their forces, or the Clergie with their prayers: which done, he doubted not (as he said) by the power of God, but to obtaine more notable victories than he had yet against the Turks the enemies of God.

The Siculi rebel against the Prince.

Whilest he yet thus lay at the Emperors Court, it fortuned that the people called Siculi, offended to haue their liberties in some part infringed in the late assembly of the States holden in Transyluania in December last, rise vp now in armes in diuers places, refusing to yeeld their former obedience to the Prince. A matter like enough to haue wrought him much trouble, and supposed not to haue bin done without the priuitie of the Cardinal his vncle: but by the wisedome and courage of such as he had in his absence put in trust with the gouernment of his Country, diuers of the ringleaders of this rebellion [illegible] apprehended, and in diuers sorts executed: and three hundred of their complices to the terror of their fellows had their noses and eares cut off. By which wholsome seueritie all those troubles were appeased, and the country againe quieted.

At the same time also the Transyluanians obtained [illegible] the Turks a notable victorie, with an exceeding rich booty. Mahomet the Turkish Sulta[illegible] about this time sent a new Bassa for the gouernment of Temeswar: against whose com[illegible]e old Bassa before Gouernor had in seuentie fiue waggons trussed vp a wonderfull [illegible] of wealth, which he had there gotten in the time of his former gouernment, to haue [illegible]e together with himselfe with a strong conuoy conducted to Belgrade. Of this his purpose the Hungarian Heidons lying at Lippa and Ienna hauing intelligence, lay in wait for him vpon the way, and in his passing by set vpon him: where in a sharpe conflict they ouerthrew the conuoy, and slew the Bassa, whose head they sent for a present to the Princesse at Alba Iulia, and tooke the spoile of the Bassa's carriages, wherein was taken a wonderfull wealth, for in one of those waggons is reported to haue been found twentie thousand of Hungarian duckets.

The Bassa of Temeswar slain and a great booty taken.

In this absence also of the Prince, 10000 of the Rascians reuolting from the Turk, came and offered their seruice vnto the Princesse: whereof she by letters with great speed certified the Prince her husband; who thereupon hasted to dispatch with the Emperor, and hauing procured both from him and the Pope the promise of some aid to be afterwards sent him, tooke of him his leaue, and being honorably accompanied, departed from Prague to Vienna, where he arriued the 11 of March, sitting in a princely chariot drawne with six most beautifull horses, the gift of the Emperor. At his comming thither he was met by the nobilitie of the countrey, and by Aldobrandinus the Popes nephew, who presented him with three goodly horses for seruice, richly furnished. Him the prince tooke into his charet, and so accompanied entred the city, where he was with all due honor receiued and ioyfully entertained, and so brought vnto the Emperors palace, where by the learned students of [illegible]t Vniuersitie, was for his pleasure acted before him the notable historie of Iosua. Hauing [illegible] there three dayes, and purposing to haue in his returne visited his mother in law at Gre[illegible] in Croatia; newes was brought him, That the Turkes and Tartars by the setting on of Stephen Bathor his Vncle, were about to to breake into Transyluania. Wherefore changing his purpose, he departed thence to Presburg, and so with all speed kept on his way towards Transyluania; where he to the great ioy and comfort of his subiects in general, arriued in safetie in the beginning of April.

In this while many hot skirmishes passed betwixt the Christians and the Turks in the frontiers of their territories; and now the plague and famine which had of long raged in Constantinople and other places of the Turks dominions, began to assuage. Of which so great calamities as had deuoured many thousands of his people, the Turkish Emperour finding himselfe somewhat eased, forthwith caused the continuation of his wars against the Emperour and the Transyluanian Prince, to be three dayes together proclaimed in Constantinople, and a great armie to be raised to be sent into Transyluania and Hungarie: giuing it out, that he would with that so puissant an armie in person himselfe come into Hungarie. At which time it was also reported, That he had alreadie sent his tents and other his necessary prouision before to Hadrianople: for now was nothing more odious in the Turks Court, than the name of the Transyluanian Prince.

Of all these things was not the Emperor ignorant, as fully thereof certified both by letters and espials, as also by the vniforme confession of such Turks as were daily taken prisoners. For which cause he also with as much speed and care as he could prouided for the raising of his armie, as he had the yere before; as also for the leuying of mony, and prouision of all things necessary, that the enemy at his comming might not find him vnprouided. Neither spared he to pray aid of the other Christian Princes his neighbors, especially of the Polonian, whome hee had diuers times sought after to haue drawn him into the confederation with the other Christian Princes against the Turke. To which purpose he now also sent vnto him the Bishop of Preslaw and the Lord Poppelius his Embassadors: as did the Pope also send vnto him the Cardinal Cajetane his Legat; and the Princes Electors also their Embassadors: vnto whome the Polonian gaue good hearing and good words, but would not by any meanes be perswaded to breake his league with the Turke, or to afford any aid vnto the Christians; although the cardinall with many pregnant reasons shewed him what small assurance there was in the Turkes leagues, and how dangerous it might be to his state, if the Turke making peace with the Emperor, should turne his force vpon him, which it was like enough he would, as knowing no man longer for friend, than stood with his profit, beside the immortal blemish of his honor, by diseuering himselfe from the vnion of the Christian Princes, to hold friendship with the Turks and Infidels. But all this and much more to no purpose, so resolutely was the Polonian set downe for the keeping of the Turks fauour. So that of all the Christian Princes so neere vnto the deuouring Enemy, none stood the Christian commonweale in lesse stead than he. Which for all that, most men imputed not so much vnto the King, as to others about him, especially to Zamoschie the great Chancellor, by whome that state was most swayed, who was not onely supposed but openly reported to haue secret intelligence both with the Turke and the Tartar.

All this while the lord Palfi gouernor of Strigonium ceased not with continual inroades to vex the Turks euen to the gates of Buda, as did also the other Christian captaines in other places of the Turks frontiers in Hungarie. Neere vnto Buda were two great country villages for most part inhabited by Christians, who hauing giuen their oath of obedience vnto the Turke, liued a miserable life for the paiment of an excessiue tribute yearely. These poore Christians wearie of the Turkish thraldome, and the continual spoile of their labours by them of Strigonium; by secret messengers requested the lord Palfi, of mercie to carrie them with their goods and cattel away into some other place of the Christian territorie, that so they might yet liue amongst Christians, as he had but a little before done for them of old Buda. Vnto which their so reasonable a request the Christian gouernour charitably hearkened; willing them against a certaine appointed time to put themselues with all their things in readinesse. There was of these Christians about 755 families, who with their wiues and children, and such trash as they had packt vp into 80 waggons, drawne with fourteene or sixteene oxen a piece, at the appointed time about midnight committed themselues with all that they had vnto the conduct of them of Strigonium, sent out of purpose for them; by whom they were in safetie brought to Strigonium. Amongst them were many rich men, who brought with them good store of coyne, with an exceeding great number of cattell. Vnto these new come guests Palfi assigned certaine fields betwixt Strigonium and Vinaria, on the North side of Danubius; where they they so commodiously liued, as was possible in so troubled an estate of a countrey.

Six hundred of the garison soldiours of Lippa slaine by the Turks.

Shortly after, 600 garison soldiers of Lippa seeking after bootie, and aduenturing too farin. G to the enemies territorie, were discouered by the Turks scouts, and so beset by the Turks and Tartars billited in the country about Temeswar, that there was no way left for them to escape. Which they well perceiuing, resolued among themselues (as became valiant men) to fight it out euen vnto the last man: and with no lesse resolution performed what they had before determined; for being on euery side beset and hardly charged by their enemies, they as men before resolued to die, although scarce one to twentie, fought most desperatly, seeking for nothing els but to sell their liues as deere as they could vnto their enemies: and so fighting were all slaine, except some few which by great fortune escaped, leauing vnto the enemie a right bloudie victorie. Yet by this losse of so great a partie was the garrison of Lippa greatly weakned, which H the enemy knew right well, and thereupon began forthwith to prepare to besiege the Towne. Which Barbelus the gouernor (a most valiant man) wisely foreseeing, sent in post vnto the Transyluanian Prince, to request him with all speed to send him foure or fiue thousand good souldiers, with which power he doubted not by the helpe of God, to be able to defend the towne against all the forces the enemy was at that time able to bring against it. Vnto whom the prince without delay sent 8000, who all in safetie in good time arriued at Lippa: for shortly after their arriual, 40000 of the Turks and Tartars came and sat downe before the towne, enclosing it on euery side, and so lay for certaine dayes without any thing doing worth the speaking of; they of the towne in the meane time doing them all the harme they could with their great shot, which they sent amongst them not sparingly. But they had not so long lien, but that news I was brought into the camp, That the Transyluanian Prince was with a great power comming thither to relieue the towne: whereupon they presently rise, and retyred to the place where they had before encamped, about two miles from Lippa; where certainly vnderstanding that the Prince neither was, neither could in short time be in such readinesse as was before reported, they forthwith returned, and more straitly besieged the town than before. They had now brought with them seuenteene pieces of battery waggons laded with shot and pouder, and fortie six others laded with scaling ladders and other warlike prouision: thus appointed they began to batter the towne, and afterwards gaue thereunto diuers desperat assaults; which the Christians valiantly receiued, and stil with great slaughter repulsed their enemies. For that strong town was with towers and bulwarks flanking one another, so fortified, that out of them K the Christians with their murthering pieces made great spoile of their enemies, and stil enforced them with losse to retyre, no bullet almost falling in vaine. In the heat of one of these assaults the gouernor caused one of the gates of the towne to be set open, hauing before within the towne placed sixteene great pieces at the very entrance of the same gate, charged with all kind of murthering shot. Vnto which gate as of meere desperation set open by the defendants, the Turks and Tartars desirous of reuenge, came thronging as thicke as might be, thinking to haue thereby entered: when suddenly, and as it were in the turning of an hand, they were with the aforesaid murthering pieces cut downe as with a sithe, and so againe, and the third and fourth time, before they could cleere themselues of the danger thereof, their heads, armes, and legs, and other rent limbs, flying in the aire most miserably to behold. Neuertheless the siege L was by them continued, & the often assaults so resolutely maintained, as if they had therupon purposed to haue gaged all their liues. But this so obstinat a resolution was by an vnexpected accident when they least thought, conuerted into such a desperate feare and astonishment, that they vpon the sudden (no man forcing them) forsook their trenches wherin they lay incamped, and leauing behinde them their tents, their great ordnance, and what soeuer els they had, they betooke themselues to a most disordered flight. The Transiluanians, who by chance were euen then comming thither, pursuing them, slew diuers of them, and tooke some others of them prisoners. At this siege the Bassa of Temeswar himselfe was mortally wounded, and Hamat Sanzacke of Giula with diuers others of good place slaine, and 4000 of the common soldiers. The cause of the Turks so great and sudden feare was this, Whilest the Bassa of Temeswar lay M at the siege of Lippa, as is afore said, they that were left in the citie fearing no harme, liued in great securitie; in the meane time the gouernour of [illegible] sent out six thousand souldiers towards Temeswar, now in the absence of the Bassa to [illegible] after bootie: who comming to Temeswar with great speed, rifled the suburbs of the [illegible] slew all the Turks they could light vpon

A vpon, and set at libertie a thousand captiues: and so hauing trussed vp their bootie, set on fire all the suburbs, and departed. Which fire grew so great and so terrible, that it was plainely seene into the campe at Lippa, making a shew as if the whole citie had beene on a light fire. Which so daunted the hearts of the Turkes at the siege, that they presently fled (as is before said) leauing all that they had behinde them.

Plenia a towne of the Turkes sacked by the Christians.

The Transyluanian all this while busied in raising of his army, and prouiding of things necessarie for the maintenance of his warres, was come into the confines of Hungarie, towards Temeswar, euen as the Turkes fled from Lippa. At which time certaine Hungarian Heidons that serued him, getting ouer Danubius not far from Nicopolis, tooke Plenia a little towne of the Turks, which they ransacked and burnt, and hauing slaine in the country thereabout aboue B three thousand of the Turks, returned with a rich prey vnto the Prince.

Clissa lately surprised by the Christians, lost againe to the Turks.

Not long before, the Christians had surprised Clissa a strong frontier towne of the Turks in Dalmatia not far from Spalato: which towne the Bassa of Bosna sought now again to recouer, and thereto laied hard siege. For the reliefe whereof, Leucowitz gouernor of Stiria and the other prouinces thereabouts belonging to the house of Austria, and the gouernour of Zeng with a fleet of two and fortie ships, wherein they had embarked 4000 souldiers well appointed with all things necessarie, set forward toward Clissa: and by the way lighting vpon a galley of the Venetians bound with certaine warlike prouision towards the Turkes campe, tooke her as good prize, and rifled her. This fleet with a faire wind arriued at Siret, neere vnto Trau, where the gouernor landing his men, marched that night part of his way toward Clissa, and C all the next day lay close. The night following they set forward againe, and hauing marched fifteene miles, came vnto the enemies campe before day: where setting vpon the Turkes in their trenches, fearing no such peril, they brought such a general feare vpon the whole campe, that the Turks as men amased, fled some one way, some another, euery man (as in such sudden feare it commonly happeneth) making shift for himselfe, leauing whatsoeuer they had in their trenches behind them. The Christians contented so to haue put their enemies to flight, fell presently to the spoile, as more desirous thereof, than by the hastie pursuit of their enemies to put themselues in possession of an assured victorie. Which the Turks quickly perceiuing, and from the hils with the dawning of the day discouering the smal number of the Christians, and D how they were disordered, they gathered themselues againe together, and comming downe, inclosed on euery side the disordered Christians (greedily hunting after the spoile) and slew them downeright. Leucowitz himselfe with the gouernor of Zeng and some others got into Clissa, where hauing stayed two days, and doubting to be able to keep the town, they secretly by night issued out with 600 men, in hope to haue recouered their fleet: but the Turks suspecting such a matter, had so beset the passages, that of all that companie, Leucowitz had much ado himselfe with three others to escape. The enemie now againe possessed of his trenches, layd straiter siege to the towne than before: which they of the garrison perceiuing, and now out of hope of reliefe, agreed with the Bassa, that they might with bag & baggage depart, and so yeelded vp the towne. Thus Clissa one of the strongest townes of Dalmatia, through the greedy couetousnesse of the disordered soldiers, fel againe into the hands of the Turks.

Sombock taken by the lord Palfi.

About the same time, Palfi gouernor of Strigonium vnderstanding of the meeting together E of certaine notable aduenturers of the Turkes at Sombock a Castle almost in the mid way betwixt Alba-Regalis and Buda, raised the greatest strength he could, and so with certaine pieces of artillerie, and other things necessarie for an assault, set forward from Strigonium the two and twentieth of May, before the rising of the Sun, and about three a clocke in the afternoone came to the aforesaid castle; whereunto he presently gaue a most terrible assault, which he neuer gaue ouer vntill he had taken it: for after that he had by the space of three houres together with great danger maintained a most desperat assault, at length he with much difficultie preuailed, and put to the sword all the Turks he found therein, man, woman, and child; and with the rest, fiftie Ianizaries but that day come thither. This castle was of great beautie, and F most pleasantly scituated, whereunto the Bassa of Buda oftentimes for his pleasure repaired: for which cause Palfi was very desirous to haue taken it without spoiling: but the fire he had therein alreadie raised so preuailed, that it burnt downe all the goodly buildings thereof, with great store of victuals and other prouision, nothing remaining but what the Christians had saued for themselues.

The

Temeſware beſieged by the Tranſyluanian prince.

The Tranſyluanian Prince hauing raiſed a great armie for the reliefe of Lippa, being by great chance a little before his comming relieued, came & laid ſiege to the citty of Temeſwar: where he had not long lien, but that the Turks and Tartars fearing to loſe that ſo famous a citie, aſſembled together from all places thereabouts to the number of 40000, and ſo came to raiſe the ſie[illegible] whole comming the Prince hearing, roſe with his armie, and went to meet them, and had w[illegible]nem a great and terrible battell, the victorie for a great while ſtanding verie doubtful, yet ſeeming to incline rather to the Turks and Tartars, than to the Chriſtians: but at length the Turks diſordered with the great artillerie, and the Tranſyluanians charging them afreſh, began to giue ground, and ſo at laſt to betake themſelues to plaine flight. In this battell were ſlaine of the Turkes and Tartars 5000, and of the Chriſtians 1500. It was for a time reported, That the Prince himſelfe was in this battell ſlaine: which was not ſo, being reſerued to the further plague of the Turks, and comfort of his afflicted Countrey. After this victorie he returned againe to the ſiege, which he more ſtraitly continued than before, leauing nothing vnattempted that he could poſſibly deuiſe for the winning of the citie. Where whileſt he yet thus lay battering the citie both night and day, newes was brought him, That Giaffer Baſſa and the Tartars were comming with a great armie to the reliefe of the beſieged. Whereupon he conſidering his owne ſtrength and the power of his enemies, and that the aid promiſed him both from the Emperour and out of Hungarie was not yet readie, with great griefe of minde raiſed his ſiege, and retired with his armie to Lippa, there expecting new ſupplies as well of his owne as from his friends. Whileſt he yet there lay, he was certainly aduertiſed, That the Baſſa of Natolia (the forerunner of the great Sultan Mahomet) was come to Belgrade with fourteene thouſand horſe and foure thouſand Ianizaries to joine with the Baſſa of Buda for the relieuing of Temeſwar; whoſe forces joined together were in number about threeſcore thouſand: and that Mahomet himſelfe (of whoſe comming had been rife report all this yeare) was now comming after with a far greater power. Whereupon he departed from Lippa, leauing therein a ſtrong garriſon, and ſo returning to Alba-Iulia, called there an aſſemblie of all his States, for the repreſſing of ſo puiſſant an enemie.

The Prince raiſeth his ſiege.

Mahomet for the better ſucceſſe of his wars in Hungarie had drawne forth the Tartar with a mightie power: who although he was at the firſt ſo vnwilling to that ſeruice (conſidering the great loſſes he had therein before receiued) that he would not, as he ſaid, ſend ſo much as one Aſſe thereunto: yet ouercome with great gifts, and the reſpect he had of the Turkiſh Sultan, was now ready with a ſtrong army vpon the front[illegible] of Moldauia, to meet him in Hungarie: vnto whom the late choſen Vaiuod ſent certain [illegible]nts, with ſuch ſtore of victuals as he could poſſibly prouide for him. Yet foraſmuch [illegible] was not that way to paſſe without the leaue of the Polonian, Mahomet had both by lette[illegible]nd diuers his Embaſſadors entreated with the Polonian king for his paſſage: as alſo for the confirmation of the antient league he and the Polonian kings his predeceſſours had to their good of long time had with the Othoman Emperours; from which he well knew the Chriſtian Emperor, with diuers other the Chriſtian Princes to ſeeke by all meanes to withdraw him. Mahomet alſo not ignorant, how hurtfull and dangerous the confederation betwixt Michael the Vayuod of Valachia & the Tranſyluanian was vnto him and his deſignes, ſent vnto him an Embaſſador, by the ſhew of great dangers to deter him from the Tranſyluanian, and by many glorious promiſes to allure him to ſubmit himſelfe again vnto his protection, and in token of his fielitie to deliuer vnto the Sultan two of his frontier townes, ſuch as he ſhould require; in regard whereof he ſhould together with the Sultans fauour receiue golden mountaines. Whereunto the Vayuod anſwered, That as yet he was not wearie of the friendſhip he held with the Prince: and for the townes he required, that they were not in his power to giue, as belonging to the Prince, vnto whom he ſaid he would write, and ſtay the Embaſſador in the meane time vntill he had from him anſwer.

The Emperor on the other ſide had with all carefulneſſe ſo far as in him was, prouided that his army might be ready to take the field with the beginning of the Spring: but as it commonly chanceth, the ſpeedie proceedings of great actions (wherein the hands of many mighty is required) to be much hindered by delaies, ſometimes of one, and ſometimes of another; ſo fel it out with him now: for albeit that his owne forces were [illegible]ome good time readie, yet was the Spring, yea and a good part of Sommer alſo far paſt, be[illegible] the aid promiſed from other Princes met together. At length after long expectance, when ſome conuenient number for an armie armie was from diuers places come together at Vienna: they were by the lord Swartzenburg and their other commanders brought forth into the field, and not far from Altenburg encamped, within the ſelfeſame trenches that were the laſt yeare caſt vp by countie Mansfield for the ſafetie of his armie; there to expect the comming downe of the great ordnance and other prouiſion by the riuer from Vienna, as alſo the reſt of the Chriſtian forces dayly looked for. From Altenburg the Chriſtian armie remooued to Komara, and not ſtaying there long, the foure and twentieth of Iuly marched towards Vacia, otherwiſe called Woczen: but before it came thither, the Turks hearing of the approch of the Chriſtians, for ſooke the town, and with their cartell and beſt part of their ſubſtance fled to Peſth, carrying alſo away with them the great ordnance; the greateſt whereof they buried by the way, which was neuertheleſſe afterwards found out by the Chriſtians. And although the Turks at their departure had ſet fire both vpon the towne and the caſtle, yet the Chriſtians left therein did what they might to quench the ſame: by whoſe diligence and the helpe of two thouſand footmen, and certaine troupes of horſemen ſent thither by Swartzenburg, a great part both of the towne and the caſtle was preſerued: the whole Armie of the Chriſtians following after, encamped in the open field, and with their horſemen braued the Turks euen to the gates of Peſth. This ſo ſudden a comming of the Chriſtians, brought a great feare both vpon them of Peſth & Buda; inſomuch, that they ſent their wiues and children, with the chiefeſt of their ſubſtance downe the riuer vnto places of more ſafetie, and farther off from danger: which was done ſo diſorderedly (as it happeneth in ſuch common feares) that many of them for haſt thruſt one another into the riuer, and ſo periſhed.

Vacia abandoned of the Turks, is taken by the Chriſtians.

Hitherto in the former wars againſt the Turke, had Matthias been Generall of the Chriſtian armies: but now of late, Ferdinand the Emperors vncle Countie of Tirol being dead, Matthias was by the Emperor his brother preferred to the gouernment of that rich countrie and the prouinces thereabouts, not inferior to ſome kingdomes; and Maximilian his younger brother appointed General in his ſtead: who departing from Vienna in the latter end of Iuly, came into the camp the fourth of Auguſt, where he was by the Lord Swartzenburg his Lieutenant, and the Lord Palfi, honourably and with great triumph receiued.

Now were the Chriſtians threeſcore thouſand ſtrong, and hauing fortified Vacia, and therin placed a conuenient garriſon, reſolued by common conſent to beſiege Hatwan, a ſtrong towne of the Turks in the vpper Hungarie. And thereupon riſing with their armie from Vachia the thirteenth of Auguſt, came the fifteenth of the ſame month about noone & ſat down before the towne; and that with ſuch ſpeed, that they were before ſeene of the Turks in the town, than that they heard any thing of their cõming: inſomuch, that at the firſt ſhew of them, they of the towne tooke them to haue been ſome come out to ſeeke after bootie; and therfore ſallying out vpon them, skirmiſhed with them a while, vntill they perceiued the whole battell comming. The Chriſtians approching the towne, encamped themſelues, as they thought moſt conuenient, and began in three places to batter the counterſcarfe. This frontier towne of the Turks, beſides that it was kept with a ſtrong garriſon, was alſo ſtrengthned with a broad ditch, and fortified with a broad counterſcarſe and ſtrong paliſadoes. Whileſt the Chriſtians thus lay at the ſiege, the Turks ſallying out of the towne, brake into their trenches, and there did great harme; and like enough they were to haue done more, had not the horſemen in good time come in vpon them and enforced them to retire. In this ſally, amongſt others was one Greis a notable captaine ſlaine, being ſhamefully forſaken of his owne men; who for that their cowardiſe, were all in the ſight of the whole armie diſarmed, and ſo turned out of the camp as men vnworthie any longer to beare armes. One morning alſo as the Chriſtians were at their deuotions in their trenches, a Turkiſh prieſt from out of an high tower not far off, railed moſt bitterly vpon them, curſing and deriding them: wherewith one of the Chriſtian canoniers much moued, made a ſhot at the tower, which he ſo well beſtowed, that therewith he ſtruck downe the tower, together with the Idolatrous prieſt, as he was yet railing & blaſpheming. At length the Chriſtians had with exceeding labor & continual batterie made the town faultable: wherwith the Turks diſcouraged, offered (but al too late) to yeeld vp the towne vpon the ſame conditions that they of Strigonium had: whereunto they receiued no anſwer; yea commandement was giuen throughout the campe, That no man vpon paine of death, ſhould haue any parley with them. Shortly after, all things being now in readineſſe for the aſſault, the Chriſti-ans one day about fiue a clocke in the afternoone, assaulted the towne in foure places; and after three houres hard fight, by strong hand tooke it, with the schriching and lamenting of the women and children, and other fearefull people, who now gaue themselues all lost and forlorne.

Extreme cruelties.

Foure houres execution was done vpon all that came to hand, without respect of age, sex, or condition: women were slain great with childe, and yong children hanging at their mothers breasts; it boo[ted] not to crie for mercy, the bloudy sword deuouring all. The fury of the Wallons here exceeded, who ript the children out of their mothers wombs, and made thongs and points of the skins of men and women, whom they had slain quicke. Which their cruelty they afterwards excused when they were therefore reproued, by pretending that thereby they did teach the Turkes hereafter not so wickedly to blaspheme against Christ, or with such their wonted and barbarous cruelty to torment the Christians that fell into their hands, for feare of like themselues. In this assault and furie perished of the Turks about foure thousand, & of the Christians not past three hundred. In this towne beside that which the fire deuoured, was found a very rich prey. The first that entred the towne was one Terskie a notable captain, with his companie: after whom followed Ruswurme, who each of them were thought in their entrance at the breach, to haue slaine with their owne hand eight or ten Turks.

Mahomet the great Sultan commeth to Buda with an army of two hundred thousand.

Now in the meane time Mahomet the great Sultan being come to Belgrade, remoued thence to come downe into the heart of Hungarie, sending Cicala Bassa before him: and at length after long looking for, the second of September arriued at Buda, hauing in his armie about two hundred thousand men, and three hundred field pieces. From thence he presently sent fortie thousand to Temeswar; but staied there himselfe with the rest of his armie.

The Christians yet lying at Hatwan, and doubting lest the Sultan suddenly passing the riuer should come vpon them not yet readie for battell; departing thence, and retiring backe againe, came and encamped not far from Vachia. And albeit that the Archduke before his departure from Hatwan, had left a conuenient garrison for the keping of the towne; yet such was the terrour of the Turkes approch, that the next day after, they that were there left in garrison forsooke the towne, and setting it on fire, followed themselues after the campe. This comming of the Turkish Sultan to Buda, brought also a great feare vpon them [in] Vienna, as much doubting lest he should that way haue turned his forces, which caused them both day and night to labor for the better fortification of the citie, and for the prouision of all things, [as] if [it] had bin for a present siege.

But Mahomet not prouided for the vndertakin[g] so strong a place, and not ignorant of the disgrace his great grandfather the victori[ous] had sometime receiued vnder the wals thereof; had no purpose thereto, as haun[ting] his thoughts quite another way. In the vpper part of Hungarie is an antient famous city, well fortified and honoured with a Bishops See called Agria, not far from Hatwan: vpon this city, as the chiefe fortresse of the Christians in those quarters, had Mahomet at his comming into Hungarie cast his eies, and began now that way to make head, with purpose by taking of that citie, and placing there of a strong garrison, to hinder the vniting of the Emperors forces with the Transyluanians, for the mutuall strengthning of the one the other by the way of the vpper Hungarie. Which the Archduke perceiuing, sent thither forthwith the valiant Colonell Terskie with a notable companie of Italians and Germanes, and a thousand other harquebusiers, who all arriued there in safetie. At which time also the lord Teuffenbach sent into the citie three thousand footmen, vnder the conduct of countie Turne, with good store of warlike prouision needfull for the defence thereof. The one and twentieth of September, Mahomet attended vpon by the great Bassaes, Ibrahim, Giaffer, Hassan and Cicala, for old Sinan was now dead, with his armie of an hundred and fiftie thousand men came and encamped betweene the two riuers of Danubius and Tibiscus, couering [the] great [part] of the countrie with his tents. Approching the citie, he with wonderfull celeritie cast [vp] great mounts, and from them with such furie battered the wals, that the Christians [were] night and day to stand in armes for the defence thereof. And although that the wals [were] great, & in many places so weakly fortified as that they were not but by a [few] to be defended against so puissant an enemie; and that therefore the defenders [might] lawfully might euen the first day haue set the citie on [fire] and retired themselues [into] which was both faire and strong, and the only place to [be] trusted vnto: yet for [the] daies they valiantly defended the whole citie against the fury of the them great harme. But seeing the danger greatly encreasing, and that the citie was not longer to be holden, they set it on fire; hauing before conueied all the best of their substance with themselues into the castle: which the Turks quickly perceiuing, brake so suddenly into the city, as if they would together with the Christians haue entred the castle also; but in the attempt therof they were notably repulsed & many of them slain. Adioyning to the castle was a great and strong bulwarke, against which the Turks for certain daies furiously thundred with their great ordnance, & that without intermission: and hauing in diuers places sore shaken it, in the space of two daies assaulted it 12 times, but not without the wonderfull losse of their men: & yet gaue it not so ouer; but as men with their losse more enraged, came on againe with greater fury than before, & so at last by plaine force tooke it: and there put to the sword all them they found therin, except such as by good hap got betimes into the castle. This bulwarke thus lost, the Christians the next day sallying out, again recouered; wherein they slew a great number of the Turks, with the losse of some thirtie men, and as many moe wounded. The besieged now diuers times both by letters and messengers craued aid of Maximilian the General, giuing him to vnderstand, that they could not long hold out for want of shot and pouder, if they were not betimes relieued (whereof the enemie also was not ignorant) yet were they resolued to hold it out euen to the last man; although the great Sultan had oftentimes by messengers sent of purpose, willed them to yeeld it vp, with promise that they should in safety with life & goods depart; otherwise threatning vnto them greater extremities than was of late shewed vnto the Turks at Hatwan, if they should as obstinat men hold it out [against him]. [But] nothing auer answered him any thing; for Terskie had forbi[dden] midst of the market place had caused a paire of gallowes [to be set vp] thereon, whosoeuer he were, that should once [speake] [While] the besieged thus [were] in hope of relief, [and] the Sultan towards Roma hauing retired [with] what too long exceeding the [time] to make some [assault] [But] such was the for[tune] [of] [the] [Turkes] [in] [the] [ditches] [and] [with] [great] [ordnance] [from] [the] [bulwarke] [vpon] [the] [Turkes] [that] [were] [already] [come] [ouer] [the] [riuer] [vpon] [the] [comming] [of] [the] [enemie] [to] [begin] [with] [them] [hereunto] [appointed] [so] [fiercely] [charged] [them] [that] [they] [ouerthrew] [them] [and] [not] [them] [only] [but] [certaine] [companies] [of] [them] [that] [were] [in] [another] [place] [come] [ouer] [the] [riuer]: [and] [not] [so] [contented] [but] [following] [them] [they] [had] [in] [chase] [put] [to] [flight] [them] [also] [that] [stood] [on] [the] [farther] [side] [of] [the] [riuer] [of] [whom] [they] [slew] [a] [great] [number] [& by the comming on of the rest of the armie, tooke from them an 190 great pieces of artillerie: whereof so great a feare rise in the enemies camp, that Mahomet with Ibrahim the great Bassa seeing the discomfiture of the armie, fled in all haste towards Agria, shedding some teares by the way as he went and wiping his eyes with a piece of Mahomets garment, which hee for reuerence carried about him as a relique. It drew now towards night, and the Archduke was about to haue caused a retreat to be sounded, and that day to haue done no more. But the Transyluanian Prince, the Lord Palfi, and the rest, perswaded him in that so great feare of the enemie to prosecute the victorie; and the rather, for that the Turks began againe to make head, and to repaire their disordered battels. Wherefore the Christians still keeping their array, charged afresh the front of their enemies restored battell, consisting of fortie thousand men, and that with such violence, as that they in short time had slaine the most part of them, and put the rest to flight: and with the like good fortune charging the bodie of the maine battell, forced the discouraged Turkes with great slaughter into their owne campe. Now commandement was before giuen throughout the Christian army, that no man vpon paine of death should in seeking after spoile breake his array, or forsake his place, before the victorie were assuredly gotten. But they in this hot pursute breaking together with the Turkes into their tents, and there killing a great number the reasons they could deuise, diſſuaded them from ſuch cowardiſe, putting them in mind of G the oath they had taken: which not preuailing, they afterwards vpon their knees requeſted them as men to hold it out yet a while, in hope of ſpeedie reliefe: yea Terskie with his hands caſt vp entreated them, that if they would no longer hold it out, but needs yeeld, then they ſhould firſt kill him with their owne hands, that he might not liue to ſee ſo great a diſhonour.

But what auaile[d] perſuaſion with men poſſeſſed with ſo great feare? And in the meane time two hundred and fiftie of the common ſoldiers, among whom were many Italians, ſecretly eſ-caping out of the caſtle fled into the camp, of whom diuers became renegats & turned Turk; which added to the former feare, ſo much diſcouraged the minds of the reſt, that they forthwith required to come to parly with the enemy, and ſo agreed, That they might with bag and baggage and their ſwords by their ſides in ſafetie depart: the great Sultan giuing his faith for H the performance thereof, with hoſtages deliuered on either ſide. So the 13 of October about noone, the garriſon ſoul[diers] came out of the caſtle in number about two thouſand: but they were not gone far, but that they were in a great plaine ſet vpon by the Turks and Tartars, and there cut in pieces, ſome of them were ſlain quicke, and ſome other of them otherwiſe ſhamefully diſmembred; the Turks in the meane time vpbraiding them, and ſaying, That faith was not to be kept with them that had ſo cruelly before dealt with them of Hatwan. This perfidious dealing much offended diuers of the better ſort of the Turks, inſomuch, that ſome of them complained thereof vnto the Sultan; who (as is reported) cauſed ſome of the chiefe authors thereof to be put to death: and afterward by open proclamation commanded, that if any of the Turks or Tartars had taken any of them priſoners, they ſhould forthwith ſet them at libertie. Thus is the famous citie of Agria, of long time a Chriſtian Biſhops ſeat, now become a I ſure receptacle for the Turks and Infidels.

Agria yeelded vnto the Turks Petrinia beſieged by the Turkes.

Whileſt Mahomet thus lay at the ſiege of Agria, the Baſſa of Boſna with certain other of the Sanzackes thereabouts, hauing raiſed a great armie, came & beſieged Petrinia in the borders of Croatia: which he at his firſt comming ſo furiouſly battered by the ſpace of ſeuen daies, that it was of many thought not poſſible for it to hold [out] two daies longer. In the mean time the Lord Herbenſtein and Leukowitze, with all the po[wer] they could make out of Croatia and Windiſmarch, came towards Petrinia: but hauing no meanes in ſo great haſte to make a bridge ouer the riuer of Kulp, they retired towards Siſeg, there to paſſe ouer. The Turkes hearing of their retire, and ſuppoſing them to haue fled for feare, put ſixe thouſand horſemen ouer K the Riuer to purſue them: Vpon whome the Chriſtians turning, and charging them home, ouerthrew them; and hauing ſlaine many of them, [drou]e the reſt headlong into the Riuer, where moſt of them periſhed. The Chriſtians [nev]ertheleſſe keeping on their way to Siſeg, there the next day by a bridge paſſed ouer the Riuer, and ſo marching towards Petrinia, and beeing come neere vnto the towne, were encountered by eight thouſand Turkes, whom they alſo put to flight; and by certaine priſoners there taken, vnderſtood that the Baſſa the day before was riſen from before the towne and gone: which they at the firſt beleeued not, but comming thither found it ſo, to their owne good contentment, and the great ioy of the late be-ſieged.

Petrinia releeued.

Maximilian the Generall marching on faire and ſoftly from Strigonium, at length the ſeuen- L teenth of October came to Caſſouia, foure daies after that Agria was loſt; and there met with the Tranſyluanian Prince, who was come thither with eighteen thouſand men, and forty field pieces to aid him: of whom eight thouſand were mercinarie horſemen, fifteene hundred were of the nobilitie of his country, and the reſt footmen. The next day after, they ſetting forward from Caſſouia, ioyned themſelues with the reſt of the armie led by the Lord Teuffenbach and Palfi, and ſo of all their vnited forces made one armie, conſiſting now of two and thirtie thouſand horſemen and eight and twentie thouſand foot: who drew with them an hundred and twenty field pieces, and twenty thouſand wagons, wherewith they euery night encloſed their armie as with a moſt ſure trench. So orderly marching, they kept on their way towards Agria, with a full reſolution to giue the Turks battell, whereof the whole armie ſeemed to be very M deſirous. By the way at length they came to a faire heath two miles long and foure broad, where they were to paſſe ouer a certain riuer, the paſſage whereof Giaffer Baſſa had before taken with twentie thouſand Turks and Tartars, the reſt of the Turks armie lying ſtill not farre from Agria. Now the purpoſe of the Baſſa was, to haue enlarged the paſſage of the riuer, and ſo

A ſo to haue made way for the whole armie, to haue afterwards paſſed to the other ſide, as moſt commodious for many purpoſes, eſpecially for water; wherof they ſo might themſelues haue had plentie, & yet kept the Chriſtians from it. But of this his purpoſe, by the comming of the Chriſtians he was quite diſappointed: for the next day being the 23 of October, they skirmiſhed with him in diuers places, eſpecially at the paſſage of the riuer; where at the firſt incounter he loſt 300 of his men, and in the end ſeeing himſelfe too weake to withſtand the whole power comming on, fled to the Sultan, hauing loſt two of his enſignes & 20 field pieces, but of his men not many, both for that he fled betime, and the approch of the night hindered the purſuit of the Chriſtians, who were now become maſters both of the paſſage of the riuer, and of B the place where the Baſſa lay: which they finding not ſo commodious for them as they had at the firſt ſuppoſed (eſpecially for lacke of wood, the weather being then extreme cold, as alſo hearing of the approch of the Sultan with his whole army) they forthwith forſook the ſame, and retired again ouer the riuer to the place where they lay before, incloſing themſelues with their waggons, as if it had beene a city ſtrongly encloſed with woodden wals. The next day which was the 24 of October, towards night, Mahomet with all his armie ſhewed himſelfe vnto the view of the Chriſtians, and ſent 3000 Tartars to paſſe the riuer: of whom the Chriſtians ſlew a great number with their great ſhot, and put the reſt to flight. Both the armies were populous and ſtrong, and couered a great deale of ground, a moſt goodly ſight to behold: both drunke of the ſame riuer, as well the men as their horſes, and therefore kept continuall watch C all that night on both ſides of the riuer, eſpecially at the paſſage. In the morning betwixt ſix & ſeuen a clocke, Mahomet with his armie ranged in order of battell, came within ſight of the Chriſtians, his ſquadrons as it were couering all the country on that ſide of the riuer as far as the Chriſtians could well ſee; and now againe ſent part of his army ouer the riuer: with whom the Chriſtians ſkirmiſhed from morning till night, both the armies parted but by the riuer, all this while ſtanding faſt, and as it were facing the one the other. But being at length on both ſides well wearied, and many ſlaine, the Turks retired again ouer the riuer to the camp: in the mean time (as if it had bin by conſent) they reſolued on both ſides the next day to trie the fortune of a battell; and ſo commandement was giuen through both the armies, for euery man againſt a certaine appointed time to make himſelfe ready. So the next day, being the 26 of D October, Mahomet brought forth his armie again out of his camp, which was not far from the Chriſtians; and began now to draw downe towards the riuer. Neere vnto this place were the ruines of an old Church, where Mahomet placed certain companies of Ianizaries, and 24 field pieces, and commanded ten thouſand of his ſelect ſouldiers to paſſe the riuer, which they readily did. The Chriſtians alſo ready for battell, and now thinking it time vpon the comming ouer of the enemie to begin; with part of their armie thereunto appointed, ſo fiercely charged the Turks that were already come ouer, that they quickly ouerthrew them, and not them only, but certaine companies of Tartars alſo that were in another place come ouer the riuer: and not ſo contented, but following them they had in chaſe, put to flight them alſo that ſtood on the farther ſide of the riuer, of whom they ſlew a great number, & by the comming on of the E reſt of the armie, tooke from them an 190 great pieces of artillerie: whereof ſo great a feare riſe in the enemies camp, that Mahomet with Ibrahim the great Baſſa ſeeing the diſcomfiture of the armie, fled in all haſte towards Agria, ſhedding ſome teares by the way as he went and wiping his eyes with a piece of Mahomets garment, which hee for reuerence carried about him as a relique. It drew now towards night, and the Archduke was about to haue cauſed a retreat to be ſounded, and that day to haue done no more. But the Tranſyluanian Prince, the Lord Palfi, and the reſt, perſuaded him in that ſo great feare of the enemie to proſecute the victorie; and the rather, for that the Turks began againe to make head, and to repaire their diſordered battels. Wherefore the Chriſtians ſtill keeping their array, charged [with] the [fron]t of their enemies reſtored battell, conſiſting of fortie thouſand men, and that [with] ſuch violence, as that they in ſhort time had ſlaine the moſt part of them, and put the reſt to flight: and F with the like good fortune charging the bodie of the maine battell, [fo]ced the diſcouraged Turkes with great ſlaughter into their owne campe. Now commandement was before [gi]uen throughout the Chriſtian army, that no man vpon paine of death ſhould [in] the [hea]t breake his array, or forſake his place, before the victorie were [ab]ſolutely [gotten]. But [the] this hot purſute breaking together with the Turkes into their [tents] and there falling [to] [the] ſpoile number of them, and seeing in euery place great store of rich spoile, contrarie to the aforesaid commandement, left the pursuit of the enemy, & disorderly fell to the spoile of the tents, vntil they came to the very tent of the great Sultan. But here began all the mischiefe, with a most sudden change of fortune. For here these greedie disordred men, not now worthy the name of soldiers, light[ed] on a strong squadron of resolute men, with good store of great ordnance readie charged, w[hi]ch they discharged amongst the thickest of their enemies, and rent in sunder a number of them, and after that, came on resolutely themselues: when in the meane time Cicala Bassa with his horsemen yet vntouched, brake in vpon them also, and with the terror of his comming brought such a feare vpon them, that they began amaine to flie, especially the Hungarians & Germans, most busied in the spoile. Neither could they in that feare, by any threats or intreatie of their commanders be perswaded to make a stand, or so much as once to looke backe, or to shew any token of true valour: which their hasty flight was the ouerthrow not of themselues only, but of others also that would haue fought, for whilst they fled headlong vpon the spur, and could not be staid, they ouerran their owne footmen, & so furthered the enemies victorie. Thus for want of good order, through the greedy couetousnes of a sort of disordered men the most notable victory that euer the Christians were like to haue had ouer the Turks, was let slip out of their hands. Many noble gentlemen & commanders, in seeking to stay the flight of their own men, were here slain: & although the enemy followed the chase scarce halfe a mile, yet were the Christians possessed with such a feare, that they fled amaine all ouer the country with greater shame than losse, no man pursuing them. The Archduke himselfe seeing all desperat, fled to Cassouia. The Transyluanian of all others most orderly retired himselfe towards Tocaij, hauing not lost in this battell aboue 200 men, and of them neuer a man of name. All this losse he imputed to the couetousnesse of the Hungarians, and cowardise of the German horsemen. The Lord Bernstein hauing charge of the great artillerie, fled also, and made shift for himselfe, as did Palfi, and in fine all the rest. Neither was the feare lesse amongst the Turks (a wonderful thing to be spoken) than it was among the Christians: for the night following they for feare of the return of the Christi[ans] leaving vp the best of their things, fled also towards Agria. And it was afterwards known, ti[hat] the Turks great ordnance, tents, & baggage stood three daies in their trenches, either altogether vngarded, or so slenderly guarded, as that they might haue bin easily taken by the Christians, if they would but haue made head againe. Yea Mahomet himselfe is reported oftentimes to haue confessed the danger and feare he was then in to haue been taken, & all his army des[troyed] if the Christians had (as they should) pursued the victory, and not so basely turned [to] the spoile: by which danger he then warned, afterwards euer shunned to aduenture his [pe]rson to the like perill in the field. In this battel of Karesta (for so it is of a place therby call[ed] & at the siege of Agria, were lost of the Christians about 20000, and of the Turks 60000. Mahomet after this victory fortified Agria, and for the keeping thereof left in it 10000 souldiers, and so returned to Belgrade.

The Christians in seeking too greedily after the spoile, ouerthrowne and discomfited.

Twentie thousand Christians slain, & threescore thousand Turks.

The Bassa of Buda perswading himselfe that the Christians after so great an ouerthrow could not this yeare to any purpose recouer their strength, came with all the power he was able to make, and the fourth of Nouember besieged Vacia, in hope to haue easily carried it: but finding there greater resistance than hee had before imagined, and hearing that the dispersed Christians in the vpper part of Hungarie were making head for to come to the reliefe of the towne, he more afraid than hurt, brake vp his siege, and so returned to Buda: for indeed the dispersed reliques of the late army of the Christians were drawing together, but vnarmed & vnseruiceable, as hauing in the late flight shamefully cast away their armes, and therefore could haue done the Bassa small harme if he had continued the siege.

Vacia besieged by the Bassa of Buda.

Mahomet thinking it honor enough for him to haue thus woon Agria, and driuen the Christians out of the field, diuided his armie into two parts at Belgrade: whereof the one he billetted in the countrey thereabout, to be ready for all euents, and with the other hee returned to Constantinople: but by the way he was set vpon by Barbelius Ianuschie the Transyluanian princes Lieutenant, and the Vayuod of Valachia, who with a great power both of horse and foot being got ouer the riuer Danubius, and secretly fauored by the country people, lay in ambush for him in places of aduantage, and still following in the [re]re of his army, cut off 7000 of his men before he could be rid of them: and so with much trouble arriued at length at Constantinople, where we will for this yeare leaue him, vntill we heare of him more.

Maximilian with a small retinue arriued at Vienna in the latter end of Nouember, where he found the Viscont of Burgaw, Swartzenburg, and some other of the commanders of his late armie; most of the rest, especially the Italians, being slaine. The small remainder of this vnfortunate yere was spent with often skirmishes and inrodes one into anothers frontiers, as the manner of war is, without any other great thing done worth the remembrance.

Rodolph the Christian Emperor, notwithstanding the late discomfiture of his armie not farre from Agria, made choice againe of his brother Maximilian the Archduke for the managing of his forces for his next yeares wars against the Turke. Whereunto the Pope by his legat Fran. Aldobrandino promised of his owne charge to send him 10000 Italians, vnder the conduct of the duke of Mantua; as did also the German Princes their woonted aid, with some others. All which slowly at length meeting together neere vnto Possonium and Altenburg, in the months of Iuly and August; departing thence, marched to Pappa, which after eight dayes hard siege they took, and so againe retired to Altenburg, where they tooke a general muster of the army, and afterwards in the beginning of September shewed themselues before the strong towne of Rab: where the lord Bernstein approching too neere the walls, was with a shot slaine. Neuertheless the rest there stayed, vntill that hearing of the comming of Mahomet Bassa the Turkes General with a great armie, they left the siege, and the 24 day of September passing ouer the riuer Danubius, into the Island Schut towards Comara, there on the North side of the riuer encamped. Where they had not lien past eight dayes, but that the castle of Dotis standing vpon the South side of Danubius, was by the Bassa before their faces, and as it were euen vnder their noses besieged and taken; the whole armie of the Christians in the meane time as idle beholders looking on, but not daring to relieue their distressed friends: but afterwards arising, marched to Vacia; where hearing of the Turks comming against them from Pesth, they set fire on the castle, and so retyred alongst the North side of the riuer, vntil they came ouer against Vicegrade a castle of their owne on the farther side of Danubius; where by the good direction of the lord George Basta a most expert captaine, and lieutenant General of the armie, they encamped so strongly, as that the Turks after many braue attempts giuen to haue forced them in their trenches, were glad with some losse to depart.

Pappa taken by the Christians.

Dotis taken by the Turks.

Neither went things this yere better forward with the Christians in other places than in this side of Hungary: for Sigismund the Transiluanian prince by his Chancelor besieging the strong city of Temeswar in October, was by the valour of the defendants, and the vnseasonablenes of the weather enforced to raise his siege, and [go] with dishonor to depart. Michael also the Vayuod of Valachia, who moued with the example [and] persuasions of the Transyluanian Prince, had reuolted from the Turks, and done them great harme (as is in part before declared) now wearied with their often inuasions and the spoile of his country, almost brought to vtter desolation, many thousands of his subjects being by the Turks and Tartars carried away captiues, and his townes and castles for most part rased; to giue his people a time of breathing, submitted himselfe againe vnto the Turkish obeisance, solemnely receiuing at the hands of one of the Turkes Chiaus (for that purpose sent from Constantinople) an ensigne in token of his submission vnto the Turkish Emperor, as also of his fauor towards him. Which the more to assure him of, he by another honorable messenger shortly after receiued from Mahomet the Turkish Emperour more kind letters than at any time before, with the confirmation of the Vayuodship of Valachia by the grand Seignior his solemne oath, vnto Michael the Vayuod and his son Peter, then about thirteene yeares old, for the terme of both their liues, without disturbance, paying but the halfe of the old yearely tribute by the Turks before demanded. So glad they were vpon any condition to haue reduced that martial man with his country vnto their obeisance: and in token of further grace, together with these letters he receiued also a goodly horse, most richly furnished, with a faire scimiter and an horsemans mace, in signe of the martial power and gouernment committed vnto him by the great Sultan Mahomet. All which goodly gifts and honors the Vayuod seemed thankfully to accept: neuertheless not daring too far to trust vnto the Turkish faith, of the smal assurance whereof he had before had sufficient experience, he still kept strong garrisons vpon the frontiers of his countrey, with such other forces also as he was woont, excusing the same to be done for feare of the Tartars; by whom he also excused himselfe, for not going with the Turkes Generall this yeare into Hungarie, as he was by speciall messengers from the grand Seignior himselfe requested; telling him that he might not in any case ease so do, for feare of the Tartars most horrible incursions, and the spoiles of his countrey: G yet knew he right well, how that they were by the great Sultan his expresse commandement charged not to do any harme either in Moldauia or Valachia, as they went into Hungarie. But this warie V[illegible]wod not greatly trusting either the Sultan or them, as also loth himselfe a Christian, to [illegible]he Christians his friends and late confederats, excused himselfe by the necessarie care he had of his subiects and country, and so requested that his reasonable excuse to be in good part of the great Sultan accepted: but of him more is to be said hereafter. Thus passed this yeare without any great thing done more than is before declared; both these great Princes, the Emperor and the Turkish Sultan, being warned by the last yeres work what it was to put al to the fortune of a battel: & therfore now contenting themselues to haue shewed their 1598 forces, as not afraid one of the other, countenanced this yeres wars more in shewes than deeds. H

What great things might by the Christian princes at vnitie amongst themselues be done against the Turke, is by the considerat right easily to be gathered: but especially by the notable victorie of the famous Transyluanian prince Sigismund, who confederated but with his poore oppressed neighbours the Valachians and Moldauians, and strengthened with some small aid from the Emperor and the Hungarians, not only deliuered those three countries from the heauie burthen of the Turkish thraldom, but vanquished also their most renowned captains, ouer-threw their mightie armies, burnt and spoiled their Countries, rased their townes and cities; which as it hath beene before in part declared, so if it should be all particularly set downe, besides that it would be tedious, so also might it haply seeme almost incredible. Beside which calamities of war (commonly more felt of the subiects than of the prince) the great Sultan him- I bles yeelding vnto him yerely a tun of gold, 2000 horses for seruice, 10000 great measures of wheat, with as much barly, and a wonderfull proportion of butter, hony, and other victuals; the other two prouinces paying the like or more, as yerely tribute: whereof he had of late, to his great discontentment, by the general reuolt of [illegible]ree countries been quite disappointed. But this so wholesome a confederation (to the gr[illegible]t hurt of the Christian commonweale, & benefit of the Turks) now broken, & Moldauia by the Polonians disseuered from the rest, & again made tributary to the Turk, as is before declared, & now Valachia also in a sortac know-ledging the Turks obeisance; the noble Transyluani[illegible]rince, who hitherto with great cheer- K fulnesse and courage had fought the most Christia[illegible]s against the Turk, now left as it were all alone, and doubting how with his ow[illegible]s to be able long to defend his country against the Turke and the Polonian, w[illegible]ured not much lesse than him: lest the same should together with himselfe, fall into the hands of the Turks or some other his enemies, by a wonderfull change voluntarily resigned this his countrey of Transyluania vnto Rodolph the lauia, he had in lieu thereof receiued of the Emperor: whereupon the possession of Transylua-nia, by the general consent of all the States of that countrey, was in the beginning of this yeare L 1598, deliuered vnto the Archbishop of Vacia, the County Nadasti, and Doctor Petzi the em-perors commissioners; and a solemne oath of obedience and loyaltie taken of them all in general: albeit the aforesaid Commissioners, as also the Emperor himselfe would haue persuaded the Prince, either not at all, or at lestwise not so suddenly to haue forsaken his country, but to haue still kept the gouernment thereof himselfe yet for a yeare or two; well foreseeing, that the same could not so conueniently be gouerned by any other, as by himselfe, a natural Prince therein borne, and exceedingly beloued of his subiects. The same commissioners also in Iune and his people: who loathing the Turkish soueraignetie, all willingly yeelded themselues vnto the Emperors protection. These commissioners also at the same time came to agreement with M the Tartars Embassadors, offering vnto the Emperour peace and aid for the yearely pension of 40000 duckets, and as many sheep-skin gownes the[illegible]al manner of apparel.

All this while continued the Diet of the empire, be[illegible] in December last past at Ratisbon, Mathias the Emperors brother being there his deputie, and in his Majesties name demanding a greater

A greater aid for the maintenance of his wars against the Turk the common-enemy, than was by the Princes and States of the Empire offered: where after great and long deliberation, a large proportion was by them all agreed vpon for the defraying of the charges of those wars & defence of the Christian commonweale, to be paied in three yeares next, and so thereupon was the assemblie dissolued. But as they were returning home, behold contrarie to all hope, Rab one of the strongest fortresses of Christendome, three yeares before betrayed vnto the Turks by Countie Hardeck, was now by the wisedome and valour of Adolphus Baron of Swartzen-burg, the Emperors lieutenant in the lower Hungarie, againe recouered, to the great griefe of the Turks, and wonderfull rejoycing of the Christians, in such sort as followeth:

This noble gentleman the lord Swartzenburg, of no lesse courage than experience, then lying B at Comara, and still in doubt lest the Turks so neere vnto him at Rab, should attempt somthing against him and his charge, prouided for his owne defence all that Winter time with a strong garrison, keeping continuall watch and ward, although it were as then no time for the enemie with any armie to keepe the field. So Winter passing, and the Spring approching, it fortuned Two Italian prisoners flying out of Rab discouer the state of the towne to the Lord Swartzenburg. that the 22 day of March, about 7 a clocke in the night, the gates being shut, were heard neere vnder the walls of the towne, two men, who by their speech seemed to be Italians: with great instance requesting, for the safegard of their liues, to be let in, for feare of the enemies pursuit.
Which by one of the sentinels was forthwith reported vnto the gouernor: who doubting it to be some subtill practise of the enemie, commanded them there to take their fortune vntill the morning: at which time they were receiued into the citie, and being brought before the Go-C uernor, prostrating themselues forthwith at his feet, pittifully requested him to haue compassion of their miserie, and to comfort them with his charitable relief, that so they might at length returne againe into their countrey. Who at the first asked them, what countrymen they were, and from whence they came at that time of the night? Whereunto they answered, That they were Italians, and that they had but euen then escaped out of the cruel hands of the Turkes at Rab. But desiring to know of them some news, they after their manner humbled themselues, shewing by their gesture not to know any. Yet would he needs vnderstand of them the particularities, when and how they were taken by the Turks, and the means they had vsed to escape out of that cruel seruitude, in all order as had befalne them. Where the yonger of them beginning, told him, that now almost two yeres ago, at such time as the Christians were ouerthrown D by the Turkes vnder Agria, and euery man in that confusion then seeking the best and neerest way to saue themselues; they hauing by flight now escaped the greatest danger of the enemy, and so trauelling ouer the country towards Vienna, were to their great misfortune (by an hundred Turks come out of Rab to scoure the country, and to seeke after prey) taken prisoners, and as slaues committed to the chaine, where they had almost two yeres, vntil now, with great patience serued. These two fugitiues by their outward appearance seemed to be men of good spirit and valor, which caused the gouernor the more desirous to know of them the meanes they had vsed for their escape. So the yonger proceeding in his tale, gaue him to vnderstand of the whole matter, telling him, That they had bin three months before still carefully deuising how to recouer their lost libertie, which now seemed to make some offer of it selfe vnto them: for E that since the time that the Emperors army rise the last yere from before the towne, they were not kept so straight or looked vnto as before, but lay as men by the Turks not much regarded: which caused them the more cheerfully to take the offer of the time, and to resolue either the sooner to dy, or to set themselues at liberty. And that so one day as they were carrying certain munition from the palace of Graffer Bassa for the soldiers, they secretly conueyed three pieces of cord of some reasonable bignesse, herewith by night to let themselues down from the wal, and so as they might to escape: which stolne cord that it should not be seene, and so their purpose suspected, they buried in the ground. But the night being come for them to effect in what they had so long desired, and they roming vp and downe in the darke, and still finding one let or other, they were enforced for that time to stay, and to defer it vntill the night following: F which being come, and choice made of a most conuenient place, they made fast the cord aboue, and so thereby slid downe, first the elder, and then the younger; who not knowing how to swimme, was yet by the good direction and helpe of his fellow conducted ouer vnto the farther side of the broad and deepe ditch: and that so, in the night (so darke as that one of them could hardly see the other) they were come by chance to Comara, thinking to haue taken

taken the way to Vienna. The gouernour thus fully instructed of their escape, demanded of them further, how the strong town of Rab was by the Turks gouerned and garded: who told him, very euill, and with small care, especially since the departure of the Emperors campe: and also that foure gates of the towne were filled vp with earth, which if they were broken open, would all fal into the town ditch, and so further them that would attempt to enter, with diuers other parties. Whereof the Gouernor hauing well considered, thought with himselfe, that if by some ingenious deuice he might by night with some good strength vpon the sudden enter the towne, it might happily be so againe recouered. Vpon which so great a designement he thought good to consult further with the lord Palfi, whom he requested, in all hast & with as much secrecie as was possible, with 1600 foot and as many horse as he could make, to come vnto him to Comara. Who vpon this aduertisement staid not, but presently giuing order vnto his men, set forward by night, and the 26 of March before day, with 1400 foot and 120 horse arriued at Comara; where they were all joyfully receiued, and the gates after they were entered, again fast shut, and so kept for feare of the enemies secret spies, of whom no man can be too warie, be he neuer so wise. Now whilest these soldiers were refreshing themselues, in the mean time the gouernour with the Lord Palfi discoursed to the full concerning the intended enterprise: which resolued vpon, they found themselues vpon the view of their men to haue 2600 foot of the garrison soldiers, and 300 horse, all good and couragious men, and well appointed for the intended seruice: who there staying two dayes after their comming, and many of them in the meane time (after the manner of their religion) confessing themselues, and receiuing the Sacrament, were become so couragious, as that they doubted not in the quarrel of the Christian religion to encounter a far greater number of the Turks than themselues. And the more to stir them vp, the Lord Palfi at the same time deliuered vnto them a notable speech; not for all that telling them whither they were to go: but, That they were his Christian soldiers & brethren, vnder his leading both of long and late time: who neuer by him deceiued of their wonted pay at such time as it was due, would not now as he hoped forsake him. And albeit that he well knew them to haue deserued at his hands a greater contentment; neuertheles being himselfe depriued of his reuenue by these late warres, and his possessions subiect euery houre vnto the incursions of the Turks, could not therefore according to his desire, and their deserts, shew vnto them the great good will he bare them: Yet now and euen presently was come the time wherein they might not onely abundantly enrich themselues, but also adorne their heads with an immortal crowne of glorie, and make themselues for euer famous, by performing the most happie and glorious exploit that euer was by valiant souldiers attempted or atchieued in that part of the world. And to the intent that they might know how dearely he accounted of the life and honor of euery one of them, he would therefore himselfe with the lord Swartzenburg (of whom proceeded all that faire deuise and new stratagem) be present with them in the action: and that therefore they were not to thinke that they were led forth to any priuat danger, farther than their commanders themselues; whose folly were to be accounted great, if rashly and vpon no good ground they should aduenture their liues and honours together: whereof they ought not now to doubt, hauing by a thousand proofes known, how much they had been of them always regarded. And that therefore it behoued them so much the more to shew their valor in this piece of seruice vndertaken for the great benefit of the Christian commonweale, and the honour of Christ Iesu, vnto whom they were with one accord to make their prayers, with his mightie hand to strengthen their hearts, and with glorious victorie to bring to happie end the intended exploit against his enemies, to the honour of his name, and the aduancement of the Christian religion and faith. At the end of which speech all the souldiers cried aloud, That they were most readie to do any their commands, and to follow them whithersoeuer. So order was taken, that within three houres they should euery man be prest and readie with their armes according to their places: and so hauing wel refreshed themselues, about eleuen of clocke the seuen and twentieth day of March they in good order began to set forwards toward Rab. But for that the multitude of souldiers oftentimes giueth the enemie warning of that is intended against him; Palfi gaue order to one Iohn Stroine his Sergeant Major, to follow faire and softly after him, with 1700 horse and foot, which hee well performed. And so vpon the breake of the day they began to draw towards Rab, and there lay close in ambush all that day vntill night, about seuen miles short of the towne: refreshing themselues in the meane time time with plentie of victuals, which they had brought with them from Comara. Night (the fauorer of deceit) being come, in two houres march they began to draw neere to Rab, & there staied about fiue houres: from whence they sent before them a French enginer, a man of great judgement, with thirteen others (before rewarded with 1500 duckets) hauing with them 4 petards, engines of force to blow vp into the aire any thing whereunto they be fastened, be it neuer so great and weightie; where by good chance they found the draw-bridge downe, and the portculleis vp: for that the Turks then casting no perill, expected euery houre for certain waggons with prouision from Alba-Regalis. By which good hap the Christians vnperceiued coming to the gate, & thereunto fastning their petards, in good order gaue fire to the same, which presently tooke not hold: yet were they not far gon, but that they were by a sentinel descried, who demanding what they were, was presently answered by the violent engines, which in a trice tore in sunder the gate, with some part of the wall and of the fortifications neere vnto it. When now the watch (but all too late) began to giue the alarme, and the Christians in the forward thrusting presently in, took the gate, none of the Turks yet cõming to the defence thereof, or to hinder them from entring. The first that appeared were 200 Turks, which with their woonted cry Alla, Alla, in such hideous manner as if they would therewith haue rent the heauens, would haue staied the Christians from farther entring, but were themselues ouercharged by 300 which were alreadie entred. At which time also the Bassa came on with more than a thousand following him, and that with such courage and furie as was neuer greater to be seene in any Turke: where after a most terrible fight maintained by the space of two houres; the Bassa himselfe being slaine, the Turks began a little to retire, whereby a thousand Christians mo had leisure to enter: when straitway after came Giaffer the great Bassa with aboue 1000 tall souldiers following him, all the inhabitants also of Rab running after him, & that with such force, that they constrained the Christians to retire vnto the gate whereby they entred. Who resolued rather honorably to die within the towne, than with dishonor to be forced out, there with incredible courage sustained the greatest impression of the furious enemie: where was to be seene the true Christian valour for the performance of so great an exploit well worthie of eternall memorie. But this Bassa also (the other being dead of a wound in his necke) encountered by the lord Swartzenburg, after he had in that sharpe conflict shewed great tokens of his valour, was there at length slaine also: both whose heads strucke off, were for a present afterwards sent to the Emperor at Prague, with all the particularities of the whole action. But now the Turks perceiuing that all their chiefe commanders were slain, retired most part of them into the citie: some 300 of them crept vndereath one of the bulwarks, where stood certain barrels of gunpouder, which they desperatly set on fire, and so together with themselues blew vp 300 Christians that were aboue vpon the bulwarke; the greatest losse the Christians had in all that victorie, who were otherwise supposed not to lose therein aboue 200 of their men. Thus the Turks discomfited, and altogether full of feare, losing both their force and courage, fled in euery place before the Christians, they in euery corner making of them a most horrible slaughter. The Turkish women all this while out of their windowes and other high places, ceased not to cast downe stones, timber, and such like things vpon the heads of the Christians, whom they thought by all meanes to annoy, and to helpe the Turks. The bloudie execution continued all that day vntill night; the Christians still finding one or other hidden in the most secret places of the city, vpon whom to exercise their wrath: who ransacking also euery corner thereof, were by the wealth therein found greatly enriched. But comming to the palace of Giaffer the great Bassa, they found such great store of rich furniture, as better beseemed some great Prince than a Turkish slaue. There they found also letters written in characters of gold from the Bassa of Buda to this Bassa, greeting him, and promising him in his behalfe to deale with the Grand Seignior against the next Spring, with the first that his armie should take the field, that he might therein haue some honorable place of command, to the end he might in the field shew his greater valour, and no longer lie idle in that strong towne. So found they there also many things written from the Great Sultan himselfe vnto this Bassa, with great store of coine, which all fell to the souldiers share; insomuch that by this so notable an exploit so well performed, the publique State, together with the souldiers priuat was not a little bettered. There amongst other things were recouered threescore and six pieces of Artillerie, which were knowne to haue been sometime the Emperors, and foure and twentie others, which the Bassa had had caused to be brought from Buda, with great store of shot and pouder and other small pie- G ces, and meale sufficient to haue serued foure thousand men for a yeare and a halfe, but of wine (little vsed of the Turks) onely foure vessels. In the Bassa's palace was also found of armour and weapons of all sorts great store, with abundance of cloath and apparell, which was all gi-uen in spoile to the souldiers. Thus Rab one of the strongest fortresses of Christendome, not full foure yeares before besieged by Sinan Bassa with a hundred and fiftie thousand men, by the space almost of three monthes, and then at length by the treason of the gouernour to him betraied; was now in one night by the valour and policie of a few resolute men, to their immortal glorie againe restored to the Christian commonwealth the nineteenth day of March in the yeare 1598. Of which so notable a victorie the Christians reioyced not a little both in Hungarie and elsewhere: the great Sultan with the Turkes no lesse grieuing and storming, as H well for the losse of the towne, before got with no small charge, as for the death of his people there slaine, to the number of about six thousand and moe, with the losse of scarce six hundred Christians.

Yet for all this, Mahomet the great Sultan ceased not to make great prouision for his wars in Hungary, and that greater than before; and so with greater furie also to prosecute his wrath-full indignation to be reuenged vpon the Christians. Whereunto order was giuen vnto Ibram Bassa his brother in law, and General of his armie, with all conuenient speed to take the field:
A great tumult betweene the Ianizaries and the Spahi. which for all that fell out far otherwise; for that now thinking to haue had all things in good forwardnesse, a great dissention rise betwixt the Ianizaries and the Spahi; the Ianizaries being the best footmen, and the Spahi the best horsemen of the Turkish Empire; both the faithfull I keepers of the person of their Prince, and the greatest strength of his state: whereby it commeth to passe, that in setting forward towards the wars, these two sorts of valiant souldiers, the one standing vpon their strength, and the other vpon their honor, and both jealous of their reputation and credit, haue no good liking of one the other, but oftentimes, and especially of late in this corruption of their martial discipline vnder their degenerate Emperours, fall at odds among themselues, as now they did, to the great hinderance of their affairs, and trouble of their General. Insomuch that to appease this tumult he was glad to put to death certaine of the insolent Ianizaries refusing to set forward as they were by their Aga commanded. But proceeding further, and thinking to haue executed some others of them also, to the further terrour of the rest, he was by them and their adherents, put in such feare of his life, that to auoid the pre- K sent danger, he was glad to excuse himselfe by his lieutenant, laying all the blame vpon him as the cause thereof: who was therefore as a sacrifice deliuered vnto the fury of the Ianizaries, by whom he was there presently slain, with some others of the Bassa's followers. So these broils with much ado ouerpast, Ibrahim hauing taken a general reuiew of his armie at Sophia, there stayed, expecting order from the great Sultan where to begin his wars, in Hungarie or in Transyluania; for as yet that was in question: which could not well be before the beginning of July, by reason of the scarcity of victuals euen then arising in the campe; for the supplying whereof Mahomet himselfe had no small care. But this long delay was the cause that a great number of the Ianizaries comming from Hadrianople, and hearing by the way, that the General would not as yet set forward, not knowing the cause of his stay, and doubting to be deceiued of their L promised entertainment, were about to haue returned backe againe; which known at the court, commandment was presently sent thence vnto the General, without longer stay to set forward toward Hungarie, which the more hastened his departure with his armie.

In this the Turks so long delay, the Christians had good leisure to prepare their new forces, being now the latter end of Sommer: for well they might thinke that the enemie slept not, knowing what prouision he had made as well in Constantinople as in other places. Wherefore reasonably doubting, that Sommer well spent, and August now at hand, he would not so late turne his forces into the lower Hungarie, they thought it best to prouide for the safetie of the vpper countrey: And to the end that the enemie approching those frontiers, might there finde forces readie to encounter him, the lord George Basta a man of great experience and valor M was appointed Lieutenant Generall for that countrey; to the great contentment of the souldiers in generall; all shewing themselues most readie at his command. The Lord Swartzen- burg in the meane time remaining in the lower Hungarie at Rab, with eight thousand good souldiers: and the Archduke Mathias at Vienna for the dispatch of George Basta, and the hasting of

A of him forward: for that the vpper Hungarie to the great hurt thereof began now to feele the incursions of the Turkes and Tartars: besides that, hee was afterwards to returne himselfe to speake with the Emperour his brother, still expecting a Chiaus of the Turks by the appointment of the grand Seignior, sent by the way of Polonia for Prague, to intreat with the Emperour concerning a peace.

They of Buda in the mean while seeing the delay of the Turks, of whom not one band yet appeared in those quarters; and on the other side perceiuing the great preparation of the Imperials, and the great garrison at Rab so neere at hand; began now to doubt some new resolution of the Christians: wherein they were no whit deceiued; for no armie of the Turks being then in field in the lower Hungarie, and the country plaine and open, the lord Palfi with a conueni- Buda besieged by the Christi-ans.
B ent power, and certaine pieces of batterie, set forward to attempt the enterprise, and the 16 of October with 16 pieces of artillerie began to batter the citie of Buda, to the great feare and discomfiture of them within: hauing first taken the fort S. Gerarde, with hope to haue gained the rest also. For which cause, the men, the women, and all that dwelt in the citie, most instantly besought the Bassa, not to indure the destruction of the same, with the inhabitants & wealth thereof altogether; but being not able long to hold out against so furious a batterie, in time to hearken vnto some reasonable composition, that so they might yet euery man at least with life depart. Whereunto the Bassa for all that would not hearken, but put them still in hope that they should be presently relieued. Howbeit the batterie still continuing, and they not able longer to indure the force of the Imperials, nor any reliefe yet comming, they were glad at C length to abandon the citie with the losse of two thousand of the Ianizaries, and but 300 of the Christians slaine, and 800 hurt: the rest of the Turks at the same time retiring themselues into the castle, where they might for a space deeme themselues safe. So the Lord Palfi possessed of the citie, with all his forces laid siege vnto the castle, which although it were in some places shaken with the continual furie of the cannon, yet were the defendats still ready to make good the same: insomuch that Palfi vpon good hope of successe giuing thereunto a general assault, was by their valor enforced to retire; they within in the meane time with great labor & industry repairing the breaches and gaules made by the artillerie. So that Palfi considering the difficultie of the assault, thought it better by vndermining to shake the rocke whereon the ca-D stle stood, than by a new assault to expose so many worthie men vnto so manifest a danger: which his purpose by the enemie discouered, was by them also by countermining disappointed: yet for all that were the Christians still in good hope by another mine not yet by the ene-mie perceiued, to sort to the full of their desire: and the more, for that they saw not so much brauerie or shew of courage in the defendants as before. Who now kept themselues silent and quiet, as if they had bin consulting about the yeelding vp of the castle, as men bereft of al hope of reliefe and succor; the Christians being now possessed of a strong abby and fortresse fast by, and hauing broken downe all the bridges ouer the riuer Danubius, in such sort, as that the besieged could not receiue any reliefe either by land or water. But forasmuch as the time of the yere began now to grow tedious, & the Winter weather sharpe, the Christians thought it not best there long to protract the time; and therefore resolued to present vnto the castle another general assault, and at the same instant to blow vp the mine: but in giuing this assault, they were E againe repulsed with the losse of 200 men. At which time also a number of the Turks sallying out of the castle, couragiously encountered the Christians, but not with successe answerable to their valor, being there almost all cut in pieces: neither did the mine take the desired effect, but being blowne vp did little or no harme at all. So that the Christians wearie of their long suffering of the extremitie of the weather, and withal considering the great courage of the defendants, were euen vpon the point to haue risen: yet willing to giue a fresh attempt by the mine, they began againe to worke in the same, and in hope to preuaile, began to parly with the defendants about the giuing vp of the castle: but all to little or no purpose; for that the mine hauing taken no effect, the souldiers could hardly be drawne on through the deep and muddie F ditches to giue a new assault. In fine, seeing no hope to preuaile, and hearing also of the com- The Christians depart from the siege of Buda. ming of a great armie of the Turks for the reliefe of the besieged, they raised their siege; & at their departure burnt their suburbs, carrying away with them a great booty: and so retiring towards Strigonium, expected further direction where to Winter. Where shortly after order was taken, that the forces disbanded should be dispersed, some into the garrisons, and some into

the countrie thereabout;to the intent they might so be in the more readinesse with the first of the next Spring to take the field,or as occasion should serue to be otherwise imploied.

But Sigismund the Transyluanian Prince in the meane time repenting himselfe of the vnequal exchan[illegible]he had made with the Emperor,in disguised apparel hasting in post out of Silesia came to C[illegible]burg in Transyluania:and there was ioyfully receiued of his subiects,& taking of them a new oath of obedience,by messengers sent of purpose certified Maximilian the Archduke(appointed by the Emperor for the gouernment of Transyluania,and now vpon his way as far as Cassouia) of the causes of his returne, persuading him rather to conuert his forces against the Turks for the recouerie of Agria,than to trouble himselfe to come any farther for Transyluania, now againe by him to the great contentment of his subiects repossessed: as did also the Princesse his wife (Maximilian his Cousin German) wishing him to consider what hurt and dishonour he should doe vnto the Emperour his Maiestie, himselfe, the Roman Empire, and the whole Christian common-weale in generall, if in so dangerous a time he should attempt any thing against the Prince her husband, and vnto him by her so neerely allied.

Veradinum besieged by the Turkes.

Now the Turks great armie being come into the vpper Hungarie, lay encamped vnder the wals of the strong citie of Veradinum,where that worthie captain George Basta was Lieutenant Generall for the Emperor;but not hauing such strength,as without further helpe to go against so mightie an enemie, or to relieue the besieged citie,not as then furnished with a sufficient garison,he gaue knowledge thereof vnto Maximilian the Archduke,who(as is aforesaid)with a conuenient power was but a little before come to Cassouia; to haue gone into Transyluania, had he not there by the way been stayed by Embassadors from the Prince Sigismund,but lately before returned out of Silesia;and hauing againe taken vpon him the gouernment,by these his Embassadours requested him no further to trouble himselfe with that iourney, offering to giue him aid against the Turks whensoeuer he s[illegible]require it.The besieged neuertheless in the meane time notably defended themselues, an[illegible]h certaine braue sallies did the enemy great harme;stil expecting that Basta the Lieutenant,or the Transyluanian Prince, or Maximilian the Archduke, or they all with their vnited forces should send them reliefe: vnto whom they gaue knowledge the nineteenth of October,how that the Turks with all the force and furie they had vsed,had as yet little preuailed,being by their valor stil repulsed,and with many sharp sallies to their great losse encountered,and [illegible]of their great ordnance cloyed, in such sort,as that they were in good hope to protra[illegible]me: until they might by them their friends be relieued : yet not doubting,but that the T[illegible]cording to their woonted manner,would doe what they might to subdue them. [illegible]ing to whose expectation, the Transyluanian Prince with a great power taking the field to haue relieued them, was letted so to do by the Tartars,to that purpose stirred vp by the Turks:so that he could by no means ioine his forces with Maximilian,for looking to the safetie of his owne people and countrey.Yet in token of forwardnesse,he sent certain companies of braue souldiers vnto the Lieutenant Basta;who vnderstanding that of 2000 good souldiers in garrison in the citie at the beginning of the siege, there were scarce 700 left aliue, all the rest beeing with continuall assaults slaine or mortally wounded, vsed a notable stratagem to delude the enemie withall : for hauing put his men in good order,and comming brauely on,as if he would euen presently haue ioyned battel(a thing which the Turkes most desired)whilest they likewise with great stir were putting themselues in order of battell;and wholly busied therein,he by another way(of the Turks least suspected) cunningly thrust into the citie eight hundred good soldiers,and that done, presently retired againe into his trenches,wherein he strongly encamped,feared not all the Turks forces: who thinking euen then to haue come to a day battel,and still in vaine expecting the same,returned deceiued by this fineneſse. And so shortly after (enforced by continuall foule weather) raised their siege,not without great difficulty & danger(relief lying so neere at hand,and the defendants strengthened with new supplies)to haue been longer maintained.So passed the troubles of this yeare, with no gaine but great losse of the Tu[illegible]s: who at their departure enforced by the vnseasonablenesse of the weather and feare tog[illegible], left behind them in their trenches many tents with some great pieces of artillerie,being [illegible]ble to conuey the same by water to Buda:and withall fearing greatly to be encountered by the forces of Basta, strengthened with new supplies euen then sent vnto him from the Emperour.

A new supplie put into Veradinum by Basta

The

The Archduke Mathias,Swartzenburg,and the other commanders of the armie in the lower Hungarie,beeing twelue thousand strong, with the garrison souldiers of Rab, Strigonium, and Komara,in the meane time because they would not stand idle,together with the Hungarian horsemen,ouerran all the country thereabout euen vnto the gates of Buda : in good hope also to haue met with eight thousand Turks(as they were by their espials aduertised)comming towards Pesth with victuals for the relieſe of the castle of Buda.

Whilest things thus passed in Hungarie,Mahomet to shew his greatnesse,as also the more to keepe the Christian Princes in suspence, sent Cicala (or as the Turkes call him Cigala) Bassa his Admirall with a great fleet to sea : wherewith being come vpon the coast of Sicilia;he requested the Viceroy of that Kingdome,to send him aboord his fleet the Ladie Lucretia his mother,which dwelt in Messina,for that he greatly desired to see her,and to do her honour;promising so quietly to depart without any harme doing. And the Viceroy againe considering how that the angry renegat for the like courtesie to him at another time before denied,had in his rage done great harme all alongst the sea coast;couenanting with him to send her in safetie backe againe,sent her honorably accompanied aboord the Admirall gallie : whom Cicala her son receiued with great ioy and triumph, and hauing kept her with him one day with all the honour that might be,according to his promise sent her backe againe to Messina; and so without any harme done for her sake to any part of Christendome,peaceably returned backe again with his fleet.

Now in the mean time Michael the Vayuod of Valachia with good forces of his own,because he would be doing something also , resolued to giue an attempt vpon Nicopolis,a city of the Turks in Bulgaria : and so giuing order to his people,caused a bridge to be made ouer Danubius to passe that great riuer by. Whereof the Bassaes of Silistria and Badoua vnderstanding,thought it good with all their power to disturbe him in that worke : and so comming,as the said bridge was by the Vayuod his souldiers laid ouer the riuer vpon boats, without farther stay attempted to haue broken the same, to the intent that the Vayuod should not that way passe. Who hasting thither with his armie,rescued his worke,and enforced his Bassaes to forsake the exploit by them begun : where betwixt them for a space was fought a most hard conflict,vntill at length the Turks were with a great slaughter ouerthrowne,and so glad some here,some there,by flight as they might to saue their liues. After which victorie,he without let passing ouer the riuer with his whole forces,came and encamped vnder the wals of Nicopolis : where they of the citie vnderstanding of the late slaughter of the Turkes,and finding themselues not able to hold it out against the force and valor of the Valachies,and now out of hope of any help or relief in time to come from the Turks,without farther resistance yeelded themselues into the power of the Vayuod: who hauing sacked the city and set it on fire,carried thence a great spoile and bootie,with a number of the Bulgarians: chusing out the best and most able bodies amongst them to serue him in his wars,and appointing the rest to inhabit and manure the wasted places of Valachia.The report of this ouerthrow giuen vnto the Turks by the Valachian,with the sacking of Nicopolis,running abroad,brought a general feare vpon the Turks euen in the imperial city of Constantinople.For the staying wherof Mahomet commanded the chiefe of his Bassaes, with a great power of tumultuarie soldiers taken vp in hast to go forthwith against the Vayuod to stay the course of his farther proceedings, to the dismaying of his people;himselfe thundring out most horrible threats against him: who encouraged with his late victory,and well acquainted with the Turks maners,little regarded the same,as knowing that he was not with words but with armes to be vanquished.

Nicopolis sacked and burnt by the Vayuod

Now Mahomet the Turkish Emperour oppressed with melancholie to see himselfe at once assailed with the Plague then raging in Constantinople,the bloudie wars in Hungarie, and the horrible mortalitie and losse of his people in both places ; and withall not ignorant of the euil successe of his armie at Veradinum, and of the great harme done at Nicopilis by the Valachian;yet for all that,ceased not in what he might to prouide for so many euils,but gaue order to Taut Bassa with all speed to set forward (as we haue said) from Constantinople toward Valachia ; as from whence hee feared the greatest danger : who without delay to make the Vayuod to vnderstand how highly the great Sultan was displeased with him, put himselfe vpon the way with six hundred Ianizaries towards Hadrianople, with purpose there to Winter vntill the Spring,and so to expect the comming of the rest of the armie, that so with the same, same, vnited vnto the forces of Mehemet Satergi (who the last yeare besieged Veradinum) hee might in the field appeare more terrible vnto his enemies. The Christian Emperor also at the same time rested much discontented, that his people in so faire a way for the winning of the castle of Buda, had yet failed thereof: the Wallons laying the fault vpon the Lords Swartzenburg, Polsi, and the rest of the commanders, that it was not woon; for that when they as valiant men offered to haue done therin the vttermost of their deuoire, their leaders had made choise by the spade and mattocke rather than by the sword to performe the same.

The Turks again spoiled by the Vayuod.

But Michael the Vayuod seeing the Turks not a little dismayed with the sacking of Nicopolis, began afresh to their greater terrour and hurt to make new inrodes vpon them, in such sort, as that he was entred an hundred miles into their territorie: against whom Mehemet Satergi (as yet the Turks General in Hungarie) comming with his forces, he againe retired, carrying away with him the spoile of the countrie by him wasted.

Buda distressed

They of Buda in the meane time fearing some sudden assault to be giuen vpon them, and suffering within great want of victuals, expected long to be relieued both with victuals and other necessaries: vnderstanding yet withall, that the grand Seignior had caused it to bee giuen out in Constantinople, That he was raising a great power of his best and most expert souldiers, and had therefore sent for vnto the court all his old men of war, such as had serued in the wars of Persia, to be now againe employed in Hungarie. Where the Turks in the meane time prouiding to relieue the distressed citie of Buda both with men and many other necessaries; certain resolute Hungarians vnderstanding by their espials, that one of the Turks Bassaes with 3000 soldiers was comming thither to encrease the garrison, laid themselues close in ambush in a place whereby the Turks were to passe: where they had not long staid, but that the Turks as men without feare disorderedly passing by, were by them with such force and fury assailed, that in a moment, when they least thought, they were ouerthrowne and put to flight, with the losse of many of their horses, much money and iewels, and many captaines there taken prisoners, the Bassa himselfe with much adoe hardly escaping into the citie. But shortly after, 400 Christians scouring the countrie about Buda, and hauing taken a good bootie of cattell and other pillage, returning loded with the prey, were by the way assaulted by the Turkes, and enforced to forsake the same, and to fight for their liues: whom for all that, they notably repulsed, with the slaughter of diuers of them, & so again recouering their bootie, returned with victorie. And about this time or not long after in the vpper Hungarie, a great power of the Turks and Tartars hauing forraged a great part of the country, and done the Christians great harm, came before Cossouia, making shew as if they would euen presently haue besieged that citie: which put the inhabitants in such feare that many of them without further deliberation fled forthwith as fast as they could into the mountains, thinking themselues more safe there than in the citie. Neuertheless, by the perswasion of George Basta, the Emperors Lieutenant in those parts, 2000 valiant and expert souldiers staid there with him, expecting what the Turks would do; who approching the wals, demanded of them in the citie a great sum of mony by way of contribution; threatning otherwise the vtter ruin and destruction thereof. Which their proud demand was by Basta stoutly reiected, and they with the losse of a great many of their liues inforced to get them farther off. Wherfore seeing themselues not able to preuaile against a city so well prouided, they for feare by night rise, and departed quite another way than that whereby they came, doing great harm still as they went. The free Haiducks of Valachia, also, a warlike kind of people, liuing for most part vpon prey, & willing to shew some token of their hatred toward the Turks, by certain bridges passing ouer the Danubius, encountered with the Bassa of Natolia with a great power, whom they ouerthrew with much slaughter of his people, and the losse of his brother there slaine also: and so afterwards ouerrunning the country, did there exceeding harme, and tooke the same Bassa his sonne prisoner. Thus passed the Winter with many light skirmishes and incursions in diuers parts of Hungarie and other the frontier countries; which had done great harme, had it not beene before hand well prouided for by the Imperials; who in most places strengthened with new supplies, stayed the furie of their barbarous enemies. Maximilian the Archduke in the meane time comming from Prague to Vienna, found himselfe there to haue in his campe but foure & twentie thousand foot and ten thousand horse, readie against the next Spring (diuers of the Germane Princes this yeare not sending thither any aid at all, by reason of their troubles neerer home, with the Spaniards the Spaniards in the lower side of Germanie) which made him the more to dread the enemies comming, whome knew after his accustomed manner would that Summer appeare in the field with a farre greater number. But to haue holpen this want, the great Duke of Muscouie about this time, by his Embassadors amongst other things requested leaue of the Polonian, for forty thousand horsemen to passe through his country, which horsemen he had determined (as hee said) to send in aid of the Emperor against the Turke. Which his request the Polonian would by no meanes grant, as dangerous to his estate. Wherefore the Mulcouite offended with the Polonian, sent other his Embassadors vnto the Emperor by sea: who embarked in an English ship in the port of S. Nicolas, and sayling about the kingdomes of Sweden, Norway and Denmarke, after long trouble at sea, at length arriued at Stoad, and so from thence by land trauelling to Hamborow, Lubecke, and Maidenborow, and in euery place honourably entertained, came at last vnto the Emperour into Bohemia, then lying at Plisena, for that the plague was then hot at Prague: where they hauing with great state deliuered their Presents and Letters of credence vnto the Emperour; had audience, and were by him most honourably vsed. Yet the Polonian hauing thus denied the Muscouite passage, suffered the Turks Embassadour, who called himselfe Gabriel, a Iew, to passe through his Countrey vnto the Emperour, to entreat with him of a peace to bee made betwixt him and the Turke. Which Gabriel comming to Prague as Embassadour from the great Turke, and hauing no letters of credence to shew for his negotiation (for that they were, as he said, vpon the way taken from him by the Polonian Cossackes, and certaine of his retinue slaine) was there taken for a spie, and so sent to Vienna: where at his first arriuall hee was well vsed in a common Inne: but the night following being taken in his chamber by the Martiall, was so clapt fast in prison, with as many yrons vpon him as he could beare, and all his followers with gyues vpon their legs compelled as slaues daily to worke in the towne ditch.

The Turks embassador taken for a spie, and imprisoned at Vienna.

About this time also Sigismund the Transyluanian Prince (whom hitherto all men admired as a man euen sent from heauen, for the benefit of his countrey and of the Christian commonweale) by a wonderfull change gaue a most manifest token of a diuers and vnconstant nature, to the great wonder of the world: for hauing broken the agreement made with the Emperor the last yeare, and being secretly in post returned out of Silesia into Transyluania, and againe (doubting of his owne abilitie for the keeping of that countrey) in the beginning of this yeare 1599, by his Embassadors the Bishop of Alba-Iulia, and Stephen Paschai his Chauncellor, sent of purpose vnto the Emperour, request him to haue the first agreements againe renewed, and the principalitie of Trebnits in Morauia, to be added vnto the two Dukedomes of Oppel and Ratibor in Silesia, with fiftie thousand duckats to be yearely paied vnto him out of the chamber of the Empire: and a generall pardon to be giuen vnto all the Transyluanians that followed him had of late reuolted from the Emperour, and their antient liberties to be againe vnto euery one of them confirmed. With all which conditions obtained at the Emperours hands (as of him that saw how need full it was for him by any meanes to keepe that strong country in his power) the same Embassadours with their dispatch returned from Prague the nineteenth of Aprill.

Sigismund yeeldeth his country of Transyluania vnto the Cardinal Bathor his cousin.

But Sigismund in the meane time at home, was entred into new conceits with certain of the Polonian nobilitie, far differing from the former agreement with the Emperour: and hauing sent for one of the Turkes Chiaus from Constantinople; and for his Cousin Andrew Bathor the proud Cardinall out of Borusia, and so meeting with them in an obscure village in the confines of Transyluania, towards Polonia, accompanied with certaine of the chiefest of the States of his countrey: there in the presence of the Polonians and of the Turkish Embassadour, resigned all the right and title he had in the countrey of Transyluania, vnto the Cardinall his cousin; commanding all the States there present to sweare vnto him their obedience and fidelitie who shortly after together with the Polonian Embassadour, sent one of his especiall fauourits to Constantinople, to desire safe conduct for his Embassadours to he sent thither to conclude of all matters with the Turke. Which messengers so sent, together with the Polo-

Polonian Embaſſador, were both courteouſly receiued in the Turks court, and as with an e- G ſpecial fauor rewarded with right ſumptuous garments, and charge giuen them, That the Cardinall within three months next ſhould ſend thither a ſolemne Embaſſador, with the old accu-ſtomed tribu[illegible] the Turke demanded. Thus through the inconſtancie of the Prince, the ambition of ti[illegible]d Cardinall, and the foule colluſion of the Polonian, the countrie of Tranſyluania (one [illegible] the ſtrongeſt forteſſes of that ſide of Chriſtendome) falling from the obedience of the Emperor, and ſo in ſort bereft from the Chriſtian common-weale, became againe tributarie vnto the Turke; moſt good men deteſting the lightnes of the one, the ambition of the other, and the ſlineſſe of the third.

Now the Turks of Buda not able longer to endure the great famine therein, had moſt ear- H neſtly requeſted reliefe from the other Turks their friends in Hungarie; who on all hands ran to haue relieued them: but comming neere thereunto, could not put therin ſuch prouiſion as they had brought for the relief of the ſame, being letted ſo to do by the Imperials; who about a league off diligently attended euery motion of the enemy: from whence the Lord Swartzen- burg in the night ſecretly approching one of the gates with his followers, thought with a Petard to haue broken it open, and ſo to haue entered. Which his deuiſe taking not effect, as did that at Rab, the gate being within ſtrongly fortified by the enemy, he was inforced to depart, being alſo diſcouered by the Turks from the wall. Now ſhortly after, the Baſſa of Buda with ſix hundred horſe iſſuing out of the city to haue met with victuals that were comming thither, fell into an ambuſh of the Haiduckes, who after their manner fiercely encountered him, and putting him to flight, tooke him priſoner, his horſe in his chaſe falling vnder him: whom his ſouldiers ſeeking to reſcue, there began a new skirmiſh, encreaſing their former ouerthrow I with the loſſe of the greateſt part of them that were left: amongſt whom the Baſſa his ſonne, with the Aga of the Ianizaries there, loſt their liues alſo. Which conflict thus ended, the Baſſa was with ſafe conduct brought to the camp, & there with great threats enforced to reueale the ſtate of his city, with other the ſecret deſignes [illegible]he Turks. Whereupon the Haiducks returned again towards Buda, ſeeking by all means t[illegible]p the comming of victuals thither, ſo in hope at length to haue gained the diſtreſſed city. But whileſt they thus lay vpon the paſſages, behold newes was brought vnto them, how that the Baſſa of Boſna, with the Sanzacks of Sigeth, Quinque Eccleſiæ, & Coppan, with 10000 Turks were comming to oppreſſe them, and to open the paſſages by them holden. But they know[illegible]ing their owne ſtrength, and nothing fea- K ring ſo ſmall a force, ſtaid not for their commi[illegible]vent to meet them; & in a place of good aduantage waiting for them, vpon thei[illegible]ce, with great aſſurance & courage charged them, brake their array, and ſlew [illegible]t part of them, together with the Baſſa him-ſelfe: yet with ſo much adoe, as that had not the Lord Palſi in good time ſent in vnto their aid certaine companies of freſh men, it was not without cauſe doubted but that the Haiducks had bin put to the worſe, about three hundred of them hauing there already loſt their liues. The Tartars yet neuertheleſſe in good number held on their way towards Buda, with purpoſe to haue ouerrun the country, and ſo haue withdrawne the Imperials from the city: but foraſmuch as that baſe nation was knowne to be good for nothing but to rob and ſpoile, the Lord Swart- zenburg his regiment only going againſt them, & encountering them, ouerthrew them in ſuch L ſort, that part of them beeing there ſlaine in fight, and part for feare driuen into Danubie, the greater number of them there moſt miſerably periſhed.

Baſta the Emperours Lieutenant in the vpper Hungarie, at the ſame time lay at Caſſouia, with eighteene thouſand men, doubting leſt the enemies army, which he heard to be at hand, ſhould come to beſiege that city. In the meane time, Ibrahim Baſſa Generall of the Turks forces came to Solnoch with an armie of fiftie thouſand ſtrong, among whom were ten thouſand Ianizaries: but for all that, vnderſtanding that Baſta nothing diſmaied awaited his comming at Caſſouia, not thinking it good to goe any farther (his ſouldiers being alreadie wearie with long trauell) neither yet ſafe there to ſtay ſo neere vnto his ſtrong enemie, retired backe again vnto Belgrade, a place of more ſtrength and ſecuritie expecting a great fleet of ſhips, which M charged vpon the Danubius, were to bring victuals fo[illegible]e armie, as alſo for the reliefe of Buda, Alba-Regalis, and other ſuch diſtreſſed places, wi[illegible]rs great pieces for battery, & other leſſe artillerie vpon carriages, with a number of ladde[illegible] other inſtruments of warre, declaring their purpoſe for the performance of ſome notable exploit, all guarded with fiue thouſand

The Baſſa of Buda taken priſoner.

The Turks ouerthrown, & the Baſſa of Boſna ſlaine.

A ſand Turkes, which conducted it vp the riuer. Of all which the Imperials vnderſtanding, the Lord Palſi diſpatched his Lieutenant with a conuenient power, and the Captain of the Huſſars with his followers, all good and valiant ſouldiers, to cut off this conuoy: who to make the matter ſhort, ſuddenly aſſailing them, and ſo comming to handie blows, cut in pieces the conuoy, and rifled the ſhips, of whom the greater part were there ſunke in the deep riuer; and ſo tooke an exceeding great bootie, deemed to be worth a million of gold: where among other things of great value, there was found aboord 100000 Dollars, which were all diuided amongſt the ſouldiers as a reward of their trauell. This great ouerthrow once knowne [illegible] Buda, Alba-Regalis, and the cities thereabouts, brought vpon them a great feare: yea the armie of Ibrahim grew thereby much diſcontented, as being at once diſappointed both of their victuals B and their pay. Beſides that, the Imperials ouerran all the countrie thereabout, ranſacking, ſacking, and deſtroying the country villages and caſtles without mercy, although the poore inhabitants offred them large contribution to haue ſtaid their fury, which would not be accepted.
Vpon this notable ouerthrow alſo the Lord Swartzenburg was determined with al his forces to come again to the ſiege of Buda, in hope in ſo great a diſcõfiture & want of victuals to haue had it deliuered vnto him; and for that purpoſe ſent for certain great pieces of artillerie to Vienna. But whileſt things went thus well in the lower Hungarie, Colonell Rodoler of S. Andrews in the vpper country, tooke occaſion alſo vpon this ouerthrow of the Turks, with 500 horſe and 600 foot, to ſhew himſelfe with this ſmall companie before Agria, hauing yet left the greateſt part of his forces a little off in ſecret ambuſh: which ſmall companie the Baſſa of C Agria beholding, preſently put himſelfe in armes, and ſo ſallying out, began an hot and braue skirmiſh: when ſuddenly the other ſouldiers left in ambuſh, ſtarting out, & couragiouſly aſſailing their enemies, brake their order, & put them to flight, purſuing them at the heeles euen to the gates of the city: and had there been a greater force of footmen, it was verily thought, that the Turks (diſmaid with the flight, and altogether confounded) had abandoned the defence of the place, and the Chriſtians euen then become maſters of the city, which had bin the cauſe of their notable ouerthrow in the yere 1596. Neuertheleſſe they with great brauerie and ſmall loſſe retired, hauing ſlaine a great number of the Turks, and carrying away with them an hundred priſoners, with a bootie of fiue hundred horſe, and much other cattell.

The Turkes receiue a notable ouerthrow vpon the riuer of Danubius.

The free Haiducks alſo ſtrengthened with new ſupplies, had done great harm in the coun-D try about Buda, ſcouring freely all ouer it, finding none to oppoſe themſelues againſt them: for which cauſe the poore Chriſtians, which yet dwelt in that countrey, riſe vp againſt the Turks, promiſing their obedience vnto the Emperor: and moreouer, to the intent they might be no more moleſted by the Imperials, offered to take vp armes themſelues againſt the enemy, & to the vttermoſt of their power to hinder his paſſage both by land and water. Theſe ſame Haiducks alſo had broken down all the bridges which the Turks had made betwixt Buda & Alba Regalis, to the end they ſhould not that way commodiouſly bring either victuals or munition from the one place to the other: and the lord Palſi and Nadaſti vnderſtanding by their eſpials, That the Tartars diuided into three companies, had ouerrun a great part of the countrey, and with a great bootie were retiring towards Buda, preſently went out againſt them, and inforced E them to fight: which barbarous people, better enured to filch than to fight, there loſt all their liues, together with that they had before ſtolne. After which victorie, theſe valiant men turning their forces againſt certain other places of the Turks there by, tooke two of their caſtles with much rich ſpoile: which caſtles they ſacked and burnt, together with the great towne of Zolna, breaking downe alſo the bridge vpon the riuer Traua.

Now at this time the Turks at Buda held themſelues malecontent within the citie, hauing The Turks for feare forſake the city at Buda, and flie vnto the caſtle.
no Gouernour, their Baſſa being before taken by the Haiduckes, and they themſelues pinched alſo with great want of victuals. Wherefore doubting ſome ſudden attempt of the Chriſtians as men diſmaied, they for their more ſafety retired themſelues into the caſtle, a place of great ſtrength, leauing the citie vnto the Imperials then ready to haue beſieged it: but doubting of F the Turks great army, which as they heard was marching thitherwards, the auantgard thereof being come to Moarcſh, where Sartes Baſſa was alſo looked for; the report being giuen out,

The christians vpon the approch of the Turkes great armie retyre.

Turks armie was to passe. The rest in the mean time retiring, for that the puissant enemy began now to approch; as also for that they knew the great desire that Ibrahim Bassa had to recouer againe Strigonium, and had therefore sent a great number of Tartars to forrage and waste the countrey, and so suddenly hauing relieued Buda and Agria, there to resolue whither to turne his forces. The imperials in the meane time incamping neere vnto Hatwan and Zolnoc, to hinder the Turks from victualling of Buda, as they desired, cut off fiue hundred of them at their first arriual, who to that purpose were going towards Buda; and tooke also one of the Turkes Chiaus prisoner; who sent from Ibrahim the General, was going to Agria to put them in hope of their speedie relefe. They also at the same time attempted to haue surprised Zolnoc: where a good number of them with certaine petards approching the gates, in hope so to haue broken them open, being discouered by the Watch, were enforced to retire, leauing fortie behinde them slaine, and carrying away with them many moe of their fellowes wounded: in reuenge whereof the rest shewed their furie vpon the countrey thereabout, destroying the villages, and intercepting a great deale of munition, which together with other victuals they met by the way as it was going to Buda and Agria.

Sommer now almost spent, Ibrahim the great Bassa in the beginning of September came to Buda with an armie of an hundred and thirtie thousand strong, and from thence in the name of his great lord and master gaue the Emperor to vnderstand at Prague, That for the sauing of further effusion of innocent bloud, and not for any feare or distrust of his owne strength and power, he could be content to hearken vnto some reasonable conditions or treaty of peace. Whereunto both these great Princes (hauing well wearied themselues with these long wars, and exhausted their treasures) seemed not now vnwilling, expecting (as was thought) nothing more than for the honor to be the first entreated: and the rather, for that the old Sultanesse, Mahomet his mother (who by the weakenesse of her sons gouernment, such as neuer was in any the Othoman kings or emperors before, did beare the greatest sway in his affaires) did what she might to further the same. Wherefore in the latter end of September a place was agreed vpon for a parley for peace, which was in an Island in the riuer Danubie beneath Strigonium: whither the lord Swartzenburg, Nadasti, Palfi, and the Bishop of Vacia, being come for the Emperour; and Amurath the Bassa of Buda, with the lieutenant General of the Tartars, and some others for the Grand Seignior: The Turks at the first, after their vnreasonable manner, demanded to haue Rab, Strigonium, Filek, Setchin, and all the rest of the townes and castles in fiue yeres before taken from them by the Christians, to be now againe surrendred vnto them, with a certaine yerely tribute by the Emperor to be paid yerely the great Sultan at Constantinople; as also there to haue his Embassadour liegier continually attending vpon the Turkes Court: for which they offered to deliuer againe vnto the Emperour the citie of Agria onely. All which their proud and vnreasonable demands being by the aforesaid Commissioners on the Emperours behalfe rejected, they were contented to come to some more reasonable talke, offering to leaue vnto the Emperour Rab and Agria (whereof Rab was his owne alreadie) onely for Strigonium, exchanging as it were Strigonium for Agria. Which when it could neither be obtained, the parley was so broken off, and nothing concluded, and so the warres againe continued, without any memorable thing more this yeare betwixt them done, either on the one side or on the other; the Christians contenting themselues to haue distressed the chiefe Cities the Turkes held in Hungarie; and the Turkes no lesse apayed to haue relieued the same.

A parley for peace.

Michael the Vayuod with a great armie entreth into Transyluania.

But whilest things thus passed betwixt the Christians and the Turks in Hungarie, Michael the Vayuod of Valachia, yet the Emperours friend and confederat, and vnder his protection, certainly enformed his life to be sought after in the Turkes Court by the ambitious Cardinal Bathor his enuious neighbour, but lately become the Prince of Transyluania (as is before declared:) by commandement from the Emperor, and to be reuenged of so great a wrong, as also betimes to prouide for his owne safetie, with an armie of threescore thousand strong suddenly entred into Transyluania, in most horrible manner burning the countrey, and killing the people before him as he went. Where whilest the Cardinal (who was thought to haue purposed to haue serued him in like sort, had hee not beene by him preuented) was making head against him, he in the meane time had the citie of Corona (commonly called Brasso) with the strong castle of Fogaras yeelded vnto him: from whence he marching toward Alba-Iulia, the

A the 26 of October, with all his armie, before diuided into three parts, but now againe vnited, came into the plains neere Temison, about three leagues from Hermenstat; where vnderstanding that his lieutenant corrupted by Ibrahim Bassa had promised to kill him; and now wel assured thereof, to rid himselfe of that danger, with his owne hands presently cut his throat, and so dispatched him. When by and by after came vnto him the Popes Nuntio, sent by a finesse from the Cardinal, accompanied with another Embassadour, the better to countenance out the matter; telling him, That the same Embassador had commission from the Emperour, to will him forthwith to desist from armes, and without further delay to depart out of Transyluania. Which thing seeming vnto the Vayuod verie strange, and almost impossible, he desi-

B red to see the said commission. Whereunto the Nuncio before instructed, answered, That hee had left it with the Cardinal. But I (said the Vayuod) haue one here present from the Emperor of another purport, which I purpose fully to put in execution: yet was he for that day entreated by the Nuncio to stay his army. And so in the mean time lying both stil and in great suspence, the Vayuod desired to know of the Nuncio, the cause why the Cardinal forgetting himselfe, so troubled that country, by intruding himselfe thereinto, to the great preiudice of them vnto whom it of better right belonged, not attending vnto the gouernment of the Church, better beseeming his calling than the mannaging of armes, to the disturbance of the Christian peace. Whereunto he receiued no answer. So the 28 of October, a day dedicated to the commemoration of the Apostles Simon and Iude, these messengers were sent backe againe vnto the Cardi-

C nal, who presently returned them backe vnto the Vayuod with new instructions (being then busie with his yong son, in setting his men in order of battell presently to go against the Cardinal) of whom they could get no other answer, but that he was resolued forthwith to come vnto the trial of a battel with him. So the two armies lying incamped not past a quarter of a league the one from the other, and the same day meeting together, joined a most terrible & cruel battel, which for the space of fiue houres was with such desperate obstinacie fought, as if they had euery man vowed to haue carried away the victorie ouer his enemie, or there to haue left themselues dead vpon the ground; vntill the Cardinals people at length ouercome in a long and bloudie fight, were there vtterly ouerthrowne: amongst whom were 30000 Turkes and Tartars, sent vnto him from Ibrahim Bassa the Turks General. The Cardinal himselfe tee-

A terrible battel betwixt the Vayuod & the Cardinall.

D ing the discomfiture of his armie, was by some reported to haue saued himselfe by flight; but by some others was said to haue bin drowned in passing a riuer, as he fled from the Valachians that had him in chace. But the truth was, That the Vayuod now master of the field, sent out certaine troups of horsemen diuers wayes stil to pursue him: and himselfe with the rest of his armie prosecuting the victorie, came to the Cardinals campe, now by the Transyluanians and Turks quite forsaken, wherein he found 45 pieces of artillerie, with great store of coine and wealth, beside a number of tents and horses, all which became vnto him a prey. From thence he marched vnto Alba Iulia, where he was with great joy receiued of his friends and confede-

E rats there: for though the greater part of the Transyluanians, especially the nobilitie, had together with the Cardinal submitted themselues vnto the Turks protection, and followed his ensignes; yet were there diuers others also who still fauoured the Emperor, and therefore rejoiced not a little of this victorie. The Vayuod after that, sent his lieutenant to Claudiopolis, to see if they would yeeld also: which they willingly did, with many other cities and castles in diuers parts of that countrey, which hauing none to rest vpon, now yeelded also: in such sort, that shortly after all Transyluania submitted it selfe againe vnto the Emperors obeisance, and swore vnto him obedience; most of the nobilitie of that country being either slain in the battel, or afterwards put to death by the Vayuod: amongst whom were fiue, which corrupted by the Cardinal, had before vndertaken to kill him. Now the fourteenth of Nouember, after diuers reports of the Cardinals escape, his vngracious head was for all that presented to the Vayuod: which to the terrour of others, being for a while set vp in Alba-Iulia (where hee but a little before had commanded as a Prince) was afterwards taken downe, and sent for a Present from the Vayuod vnto the Emperour and the Archdukes his brethren; his head-

The Cardinalls head sent for a Present vnto the Emperor.

F lesse bodie being afterward by the commaundement of the Vayuod honourably buried in a Monasterie at Alba-Iulia, in the same Tombe he had before made for his brother beheaded by his Cousine Sigismund Bathor. The Cardinals Treasure also fell into his hands, which was said to haue beene three millions of gold. Thus the Countrey of Transyluania lately

before by the Cardinal yeelded vnto the obeisance of the Turke, was againe by this worthie Vayuod recouered and restored vnto the Christian empire; the proud Cardinal cast out and brought to confusion, hauing not yet possessed these his new honors full eight moneths. His cousin Sigismund the late Transyluanian Prince, who almost all this while had stayed at Borusia, and in dis[illegible]apparell seene Danske, and diuers other the free cities thereabouts, now hearing newes of the Cardinals ouerthrow, secretly got him away from thence into Polonia, to seeke againe his new fortunes. The lord Swartzenburg at the same time vniting his forces in the lower Hungarie with them of Stiria, and now twentie thousand strong, sought by all means to reduce so many places vpon those frontiers as he could, vnto the Emperours obeisance, and so tooke in aboue 200 villages: but afterward thinking to haue surprised the strong castle of Capisuar, and by night secretly approching one of the gates with a petard, which took not the expected effect, he was discouered by the watch, and so by the garrison soldiers (now raised with the alarum) repulsed, and enforced to retyre with the losse of about a hundred men, and diuers others wounded, all men of good account: in reuenge wherof Swartzenburg afterwards sent out diuers troupes of horsemen, which scouring all ouer the country as far as Sigeth, burned it also, and so returning carried away with them a great bootie.

Ibrahim Bassa hearing of this ouerthrow of the Cardinal, with al the forces he had sent him, much troubled therewith, sent newes thereof in post to Constantinople; the brute whereof brought a general feare vpon the whole citie also, insomuch that Commission was forthwith sent vnto him from the great Sultan, giuing him power (if it might be) to come to some honorable peace with the Emperor, and to bring it with him to Constantinople: whither hee was shortly to returne; being now no longer time to keep the field with his armie, which beside the cold season of the yeare, suffered great want of bread, the plague also then raging therein, with the death of many his best souldiers both horse and foot, beside the wonderfull mortalitie of their cattell also: in such sort that the souldiers not able longer to endure the famine and wants increasing, fel to robbing of one another, and so at length into mutinie; wherein diuers of them being slain and cut in pieces by their fellows, the [illegible]e most part brake in sunder of themselues, and so by diuers wayes returned home, not well trusting one another. So that nothing more was now done with the preparation of the Turkes, their armie being discomfited with wants and the euill successe of their affaires as well in Hungarie as in Transyluania. Neither did Ibrahim the great Bassa for the reliefe of those evils, at his returne bring any conclusion of peace vnto his great lord and master, as was [illegible]ly expected.

The Turks great army of it selfe dissolued.

Cusabin Bassa of Caramania riseth vp in rebellion against the great Sultan.

Now beside these troubles of Transyl[illegible]and the other reuolted countries, Cusabin (or [illegible] some call him Cassan) the son of one of the [illegible]nesses, brought vp in the Seraglio according to the manner thereof, and hauing long serued in the wars of Persia & Hungary, and so at length made Bassa of Caramania, a man of great spirit, and not able to indure the imperfections he daily saw in the Othoman Empire, and the cowardise of the grand Seignior; vpon the report of the euill successe of the affaires of Hungary on the one side, and the desire he saw in the Persians to recouer their lost fortresses, on the other, & grieued also with more particular wrongs concerning himselfe; as a man altogether discontented, resolued to take vp armes: and calling vnto him his soldiers, and (as he was a well spoken man) laying before them the deformities of the present state, gallantly persuaded them, with the promise of honour, soueraigntie, and rich rewards, what an easie thing it were to chase the grand seignior out of Asia, and to set themselues with all that part of the Empire at libertie. And so euen at the first hauing woon vnto him 3000 harquebusiers and 5000 horsemen, tooke the field, to the great hurt of the Turks, and trouble of the State. A strange matter in that tyrannical Empire. The newes whereof comming in post to the Court, Commission was forthwith directed vnto foure of the Sanzackes of Asia neerest vnto him, for the speedie suppressing of that rebellion but euen then arising. Wherof Cusabin vnderstanding, and that they with ten thousand horse & foot were comming to oppresse him, without further stay, went couragiously to meet them, and so encountering of them, ouerthrew them with a great slaughter, and tooke from them their baggage with six pieces of ordnance. And after with his people seised vpon all the castles thereabouts, giuing whatsoeuer he found therein for a prey vnto his [illegible]diours: who also much enriched themselues with the spoile of the Iewes, as the people whome they most hated, and neuer rested vntill hee had made almost all the Countrey of Caramania his owne. After that, hee laid

A laied siege to Cogna a city in the confines of Natolia, which was forthwith yeelded vnto him. And yet not so contented, gaue it out by open proclamation, that for the reformation of the disordered state, he would ere long go to besiege the Imperial citie of Constantinople: and that therefore all such as would follow him should of him be entreated as his friends and companions, threatening vnto the rest most cruel death and destruction. Of which his proceedings Mahomet (as then disporting himselfe in his gardens of pleasure in the countrey all alongst the side of Propontis) vnderstanding, and fearing to be there surprised, or that some sudden innouation might be raised in the citie, hasted with all speed to Constantinople, and from thence in all haste dispatched Mehemet one of the Visier Bassa's the sonne of Sinan, with all the forces he

B could make to go against him. Who passing ouer into Asia with a great power, and yet fearing to come to the trial of a battel with him, whom he knew to be a man of himselfe desperately set, and not a little fauored also euen of his owne souldiers; so secretly wrought by large promises; that Cusabin his footmen were euen vpon the point to haue forsaken him. Which hee quickly perceiuing, fled forthwith through Siria into the countrey of Arabia with his horsemen and the horsemen of Simon the Georgian: purposing the next Spring by the helpe of the Arabians & Persians, to appeare in the field with greater forces than before. After whom Mehemet the great Bassa following, came with his armie to Aleppo, there to Winter, and to expect the returne of the rebell together with the Spring. This so dangerous a rebellion, with the troubles of Transyluania and Valachia, were the cause that the grand Seignior, seeing him-

C selfe in so many places forsaken of his subjects, was the readier to incline vnto peace with the Emperor: whereunto for all that, the Emperor was not hastie to hearken, but vpon honourable conditions; as knowing that the Turke required the same not for any desire hee had to liue at quiet, but for that his troubled affaires both at home and elsewhere abroad so required, his Ianizaries and other men of war in this his so weak gouernment being grown so insolent, as that they were hardly to be by him commanded; openly threatening in their discontented humors, not only the deposing of the principal officers about him, but of himselfe also, and of the banishment of the Sultaneese his mother; saying, That shee had bewitched him, to the end shee might her selfe rule, which she indeed did in all his greatest affaires. But the rebell Cusabin the next yeare growne againe very strong, was now come into the field, and euen ready to haue

D giuen the Bassa battell: who as he was a man of great wisedome and experience, well considering with what a desperat enemie he had to do, thought it best againe to proue if his rebellious followers might by faire meanes be drawne from him: and so comming neere vnto him, by open proclamation promised a free and general pardon to all such as had followed the Rebell in those wars, if forsaking him, they should forthwith returne home to their dwellings, and so to the obedience of their just and lawfull prince and soueraigne. Which general pardon so proclaimed was the ruin of Cusabin, for that the greatest part of his followers now enriched with the great booties they had gotten, and now also hauing free pardon offered them, returned home into their owne countries, there at ease to liue of their euill gotten goods, leauing their captain with some few others which stayd with him, with little hope to be saued. So that with-

E in a few days after, Cusabin thus forsaken of his followers was himselfe taken and brought to Constantinople, where shortly after he was with most exquisit torments tortured to death.

The troubles of this yeare thus past, Rodolph the Christian Emperor with the beginning of the next (whilst the ground yet couered with snow, and the vnseasonablenesse of the weather would not suffer the soldiers to keepe the field) caused a Diet of the Princes of the Empire to be called, to consider with him of such helps as were by thē to be giuen against the next spring for the maintenance of the wars which yet he had against the Turk: who all promised to send their soldiers, with their pay and such further contribution as might serue for the maintenance of that defensiue war against the common enemy: whereunto also Clement now Bishop of Rome (this yere of Iubilie) put to his helping hand, as he had diuers times before, by sending thither such aid both of men and mony as he had before promised: so that by this means great prepa-

The Emperour maketh prouision against the Turke.

F ration was made by the Christians for the taking of the field with the first of the Spring. At which time the Turks also began to stir: who although Ibrahim Bassa their General, by the appointment of his great lord was then in some speech with the Emperor about a peace, yet ceased not they in the mean time that this treaty was from day to day prolonged, with their companies scattering here and there to do what harme they could vpon the frontiers of the Emperors territories, the cause why he with more speed called vpon his friends for their promised aid. And for the better managing of this yeres wars against the Turke, he appointed duke Mercurie (who had drawne a great number of Frenchmen both horse and foot out of France) Generall of all his forces, sending Ferant Gonzaga, syrnamed the Lame (whom for his approoued valour and experience in martial affaires, he had sent for to Mantua) gouernour into the vpper Hungarie. So the soldiers now day by day by companies resorting from diuers parts into Austria, were from thence sent vnto such places as were by the Turks most molested, so to represse their often incursions, as in many places they did. For eight thousand of the Turks going out vpon the sudden to haue surprised Pappa, were by the garrison soldiers of that place encountered and ouerthrowne. And on the other side, whilst Ferdinand the Archduke was assembling his people in Croatia, for the defence of that country against the incursions of the enemie, sixe thousand Turks without resistance entring the same as far as Buccari, and burning the country villages as they went, had taken many prisoners with a great bootie of cattell; and so (merrie and out of feare) being about to haue returned, were suddenly set vpon by the Countie Serinus in certaine strait and troublesome passages where they least feared any such matter, and ouercharged also with their prey, were (I say) easily by him for the most part ouerthrowne, and the rest put to flight, and so the prisoners with all the rest of the bootie again recouered. At which time also one of the Imperial Colonels with fifteene hundred horse making an inrode into the countrey about Alba-Regalis, and meeting with the Turkes and Tartars thereabouts, slew six hundred of them, and tooke diuers of their captaines prisoners. Six thousand other Tartars also at this time returning out of Hungary home towards their owne country, were by the Cossackes neere vnto the Blacke sea set vpon with such force, that many of them being slaine, the rest for feare ran into the sea, leauing all the prey they had got in Hungary, vnto their enemies. In the heat of these broiles, the noble lord Palfi gouernor of Strigonium, a man that all his life long had done great seruice for his prince and countrey, and whom we haue so often in this historie remembred, died the three and twentieth of March in his Castle at Biberspurg, to the great griefe of many, especially the Hungarians his countreymen. And for that Strigonium (so neere vnto the Enemie) required in his stead to haue a right valiant and couragious gouernor, the Emperor appointed the Lord Swartzenburg to that charge; the fame still running, that Ibrahim Bassa would come thither with the great armie he was in prouiding, if the peace went not forward; which was now still lesse and lesse hoped for, by reason of his proud and insolent demands.

The death of the lord Palfi.

The French-men and wallons mutinie in Pappa.

But whilest these troubles with such others too long to rehearse, thus passed in diuers parts of this miserable countrey of Hungary, the French-men and Wallons in garrison at Pappa (a strong frontier town of the Emperors in the lower Hungarie) for want of pay began to mutine. For which cause it was thought good to the chiefe commanders, to haue them thence remoued, and others placed in their room; Which they perceiuing, and withall knowing themselues too strong for the rest of the garrison, all Hungarians and Almaines, not partakers of their conspiracie; they first resolued to thrust their owne captains out of the towne, as lets vnto their desires: and then laying hands vpon Michael Marotti the pay-master, and other the Hungarian and Dutch commanders, with their soldiers, tooke from them their weapons, and cast the said Marotti, with the other captaines, and some of the better sort of their soldiers into yrons, exacting of the rest as well Hungarians as Dutch, in number about a thousand persons, 1000 duckets; threatening otherwise to deliuer them into the hands of the Turks: and albeit that Marotti offered for his libertie eighteene hundred duckets; yet would they not be so contented, but spoiling both him and the rest of all they had, with their apparell and weapons furnished such Turkes as were there prisoners, and so sent them away to Alba-Regalis: and afterwards rifling euery mans house as if they had beene enemies, tooke from them whatsoeuer pleased themselues: and that which worse was, to encrease these outrages, compacted with the Turks of Alba-Regalis and Buda, for the pay which they said the Emperor owght them, to deliuer them the towne: certifying them withall, how that the Lord Swartzenburg within two dayes was comming with money to giue them contentment; promising if he came into the towne, to deliuer him with the same into their hands: or to be the more sure of him, they might if they so pleased intercept him at the passage Zesneghe, whereby he must needs come. For the more credit of which their wicked purpose, they sent an ensigne of the Emperours, as a token Pappa offered vnto the Turks by the Mutiners.

A token vnto the Turkes at Alba-Regalis; who for all that altogether beleeued them not, yet wishing further to trie them, sent them for hostages two Chiaus; from whom the rebels sent also two others of the better sort of them to Alba-Regalis, with conclusion, that the fiue and twentieth of Iune at the furthest the mony should be paid, and the town deliuered. For the receiuing whereof, and for feare of some hidden treason, the Turks and Tartars began to make themselues strong: the Imperials also doing what they might for the appeasing of so dangerous a tumult. So the tenth of Iune the Lord Swartzenburg with two thousand horse and foot came within two miles of the towne, and from thence sent 24 horsemen to dissuade the rebels

B from yeelding the town vnto the Turks, & to tell them that they should shortly receiue their pay: who shamefully deriding them, sent them backe againe in wise as they came: so that Swartzenburg perceiuing himselfe with so small forces to be able to do nothing against them, neither yet by faire means to persuade them, retired again to Rab, vntill some greater strength were come vnto him. Immediatly after, doctor Petzen Counsellor for the wars, a man of great authoritie, grauitie, and wisedome, was by Matthias the Archduke with foure hundred horse conducted to Pappa, to see if he by his discretion could haue dissuaded them from their so vngodly a purpose, for the yeelding of the towne vnto the enemie: whom they not only refused to heare, although he spake vnto them most kindly, but also bent their muskets and harquebusies vpon him, threatning to kill him if he did not forthwith depart. When shortly after,

C twentie of the Hungarians imprisoned in a cellar in the town, brake out, and comming to Rab, brought newes thither, That the Frenchmen and Wallons in Pappa were at variance amongst themselues about the yeelding vp of the towne vnto the Turks (some better minded than the rest, not willing to consent thereunto) insomuch, that they in the castle shot at them in the town, and they again at them in the castle: and that they had already receiued from the Turks twenty thousand duckats, with some prouision of victuals, & were shortly after to receiue from the

D king them by the hands, telling them, that hauing assurance of their pay, they desired no more: But hauing now receiued in so many of them as they thought good, and as they knew they were well able to deale with, shutting the rest out, they cut them all in pieces, and afterwards in derision called vpon the high Dutches to come on in like manner. Three hundred of these rebels at the same time had laied themselues in ambush by a mill fast without the towne, who by the Wallons & Haiducks without discouered, were also by them charged: vpon whom for all that, by reason of the shot out of the towne, they could do no good; but hauing lost three hundred men, and among st them Hanniball Kralez the Lord Sharpfenstein his Lieutenant Gene-

E rall, and one Della Margose the chiefe enginer, they retired: which losse the desperat rebels (if it had been in their choice) had wished rather to haue happened vnto the Dutches than to the Wallons or Hungarians. About three daies after, three of these rebels being by chance taken prisoners by the Imperials, and brought to Rab, were not only apparelled but also trimmed after the Turkish fashion, as men not desiring longer to be accounted Christians, the rest of their fellows in the towne also imitating the Turks fashions, as wel in their apparell as in their manner of seruice: yet for all that, would not these metamorphosed monsters yeeld the towne vn-

F to the Turkes, before they had the full sum by them agreed vpon, the Bassa of Bosna beeing commanded from the grand Seignior in all haste to prouide it for them, and so to receiue of them the town. Neuertheless, for their more strength and their more credit with the Turks, they receiued into the town one ensigne of the Turks, with certain wagons of victuals; brought thither with so strong a conuoy as that the Imperials durst not meddle therwith: in which wagons (being discharged) they sent in bonds 600 Hungarians and Dutch, men, women, and children, prisoners to Alba-Regalis; being all of them glad to be so sent away, in hope to find more fauor & courtesie at the hands of their enemies, than they had found with these renegat Christians. So shortly after, these rebels sent out certaine messengers vnto the Gouernor of Alba-Regalis, to know his full resolution: which messengers (conducted by certaine Turkes of great account) were vpon the way by the free Haiduckes all intercepted, and the messengers taken, with

with 100 Turkes moe. In the mean while Michael Marotti, before imprisoned by the rebels in Pappa, by letters secretly aduertised the Lord Swartzenburg of a certaine place, whereby hee might (as hee said) easily enter the towne, and the rather, for that the rebels were at variance amongst themselues. Who thereupon the 12 of July came to Pappa with nine thousand horse and foot, [illegible] disappointed of his purpose for entering the towne, hardly neuertheless belaied the same [illegible] whom the mutiners many times desperatly sallied out, & right valiantly encountered them, albeit that they were still, without any notable losse, by their enemies (too strong for them) beaten backe again into the towne. In one of which sallies it fortuned one of their captains to be taken, who to the terror of the rest was presently slaine quicke, & his head and skin vpon a pike set vp before the towne, for his fellowes to behold. But the Lord Swartzenburg still more and more preuailing vpon them, they sent secretly for aid to the Turkes: whereof he for all that getting intelligence, sent also for three regiments of souldiers moe to come vnto him to the siege: by whose comming he wel strengthened, and bringing his approches neerer the towne, tooke from the rebels the mill, a strength which they very vnwillingly lost, as in hope thereby to haue the more easily receiued aid from the Turks; who hauing made preparation to haue relieued them, were letted so to do by the rising of the water, which had spoiled all the prouision for their relieue at the bridge of Esseg, as also hindered them for marching forward. At length the Imperials were come with their trenches euen to the town ditches, out of which they had let out all the water: where some of the townsmen escaping out of the towne, declared, how that the mutinous soldiers within labored both day and night to fortifie the towne, but to be in their worke much letted by the continuall assaults of the Imperials: as also that they now had neither bread nor wine, nor other victuals left, more than a little salt, and threescore horse, of which they had already begun to eat: and that although they were not altogether so valiant, yet that they had resolued to die by the hands of the souldiers, as men expecting no other mercy. Yet shortly after, viz. the nine and twentieth of July, they desperatly fell out vpon the trenches of Marspurgisch a Dutch captaine, of whose souldiers they slew many, being drunke, & driuing the rest out of [illegible] trenches, raised a great alarme. Which the Lord Swartzenburg hearing, hasted thither to the rescue; where with an vnluckie musket shot he was struck in the head and slain. Whereof the rebels got knowledge the same euening, and Del la Mota their Generall in reward of that seruice gaue vnto them that had made that sallie a thousand dollars to be diuided among them. The dead body of that so worthy a man, as had done great seruice for the Christian common-weale, was afterwards with great solemnitie brought to Rab, and there honorably entered. The like desperat sally they made againe the next day, and slew of the Imperials an hundred and thirtie, and tooke certaine prisoners: and in retiring backe againe into the towne, cryed aloud, That when they lacked meat, rather than they would yeeld the towne, they would eate Christians, whereof Marotti should be the first.

The Lord Swartzenburg slain.

Peace abroade. Warre at home.

The Lord Swartzenburg thus slain, the gouernment of the army was by Matthias the Archduke committed to the Lord Redern, a noble man both valiant and learned; who although he were very sickly, came vnto the camp before Pappa the 8 of August; where vnderstanding that the rebels now brought vnto extremitie, had a purpose by night to flie away & so be gon, he caused a more vigilant & strong watch to be kept; when lo according to his expectation the next night after, about two houres before day they began to issue out: whereof the watch giuing knowledge to the Generall, they were indeed suffered to go out as vnperceiued, but presently after at their heels were sent out the Lord Nadasti & the Earle of Thurn, with 200 Hussars, and after them the chiefe Colonel & Countie Solms, with part of their horsmen also, who in 3 diuers places ouertaking them neere vnto a great wood called Packem, slew most part of them: Del la Mota their chiefe captain or ringleader being slaine by the chiefe Colonell, because he would not yeeld, & his head afterwards by him presented vnto the Generall in the campe: 200 Wallons the Hussars vnder the leading of the Lord Nadasti, Countie Solmes, and Counry Thurn, found out in the wood; who albeit that they for a space made great resistance, yet in the end were inforced to yeeld, and so with their two ensignes were brought into the campe. The Hussars also vpon another passage light v[illegible]ther 200 moe of these rebellious Wallons, who because they stood strongly vpon the [illegible], and were more desperately set than the rest, the Generall sent out other 200 of the Colonels horsemen vpon them, by whom

A whom and the Hussars they were almost all slaine: diuers others of them also were slaine in comming out of the towne, and in the marishes thereabouts. Their Generals Lieutenant with such other of their principall commanders as were taken, were by the Lord Redern commandement deliuered vnto the Prouost Martiall; the rest of the rebellious traitors he at the request of the souldiers diuided into diuers parts of the armie, there to the terror of others to be executed, from whom the souldiers could hardly be perswaded euen for the present to hold their hands. But afterwards hauing brought them to Rab, & leaue giuen them to do with them their pleasure, they as farre exceeded in the cruell manner of their execution, as had they before in their outragious dealings, especially the Hungarians and Wallons, notwithstanding most of B them were of the Wallon countries. Some of them they impailed, some they brake vpon the wheele; some of their skins they cut off their bodies as it were into thongs, and so poured into the wounds vinegar, salt and pepper; from some others they cut of their priuities, some they rosted, and some they put into the Tenalia; vpon some they dropped molten pitch, and then casting gunpouder vpon them, so burnt them to death; other some they hanged vpon yron hookes; and some they put in the ground vp to the chin, and for their disport with yron bullets bowled at their heads. In all which torments no signe of compassion was to be seene, the C tormētors, to make their pain the greater doing nothing but deride them: the miserable wretches in the meane time confessing the hainousnesse of their offence, and crauing for death as a fauor. A most horrible thing it was to see, how whilest some were thus tortured, others were brought to see the same miseries they themselues were by and by to endure. Amongst the rest of these exquisite torments, one Peter Orsy caused one of the mutiners to be sowed vp in the belly of a mare, with his head hanging out, and so to be rosted, in which miserable torment he liued three houres, and then died: after which, he caused the lothsome body so rosted, to be giuen to them that lay staruing vpon the wheele to eat. Thus was the dangerous mutinie at Pappa with much adoe ended, and that strong towne like to haue bin lost, preserued: the rebels themselues being become a dreadfull example to all posteritie, for all them to looke vpon that shall attempt the like villanie.

Now at this same time also, though neither the Christians nor the Turks had as then any great army in the field, yet many an hot and bloudy skirmish passed daily betwixt them in one
D place or other of Hungarie: all which to recount as it would be much tedious, so in silence to passe them all ouer, were greatly to wrong those worthy personages by whom they were not without their great aduenture done. Among the rest one Nicholas Horbath County Serinus his Lieutenant, with 150 souldiers, and Andrew Thussi another great Commander, going forth to seeke for bootie; Thussi hearing that the Turks were abroad for the surprising of certaine Haiducks then gone out, staied fast in a secret place vntill he might heare further newes, Horbath another way still going on. Now it happened that the Bassa of Sigeth hauing bin abroad, in returning home by chance met with Horbath, and encountering with him ouerthrew him, and slew most of his men, Horbath himselfe by flight hardly escaping. But Thussi hearing this skir-E mish, as lying close not far off, and now hasting thither to haue bin partaker thereof, found the Bassa yet in the field on foot, viewing the bodies of the slaine: vpon whom he came so suddenly and with such force, as that the Bassa with his disordered men had much adoe to take horse, and so without any great resistance to betake himselfe to flight: after whom the Hungarians fiercely following, slew many of the Turks, & amongst the rest the Bassa himselfe, whose head presently cut off, Horbath sent to the Countie Serinus, who shortly after by Thussi himselfe sent it to Matthias the Archduke. This Bassa was a man of great strength and courage, a most expert and aduenturous captaine, about 36 yeares old, and for his valour of a common souldier created a Bassa by the great Sultan. His head beeing brought to Vienna, and there shewed to the Bassa of Buda then their prisoner, and he demanded, whether he knew it or not, sighing answered, that he knew it well, and that it was the head of the Bassa of Sigeth, a brauer man than whom the Sultan had none in all his Empire; earnestly withall desiring to know how F he was slaine. And not long after, the aduenturers out of Comara, Strigonium, and other places thereabout hauing made a great partie, and taken a great bootie from the Turkes at a faire at Gombar, and by Tra and Esseg, thinking to haue passed Danubius in hope of a greater bootie, seuen hundred of them being passed the riuer, were by the new Bassa of Sigeth and others with fiue thousand Turkes in an hot skirmish ouerthrowne; yet not without their great losse also;

Two Bassaes of Sigeth slaine one after another.

also: the Bassa himselfe with two other Sanzackes and fiue hundred Turks being there slain, G and but fiftie of the Christian aduenturers left dead in the place, the rest disorderedly retiring to their boats, being for most part drowned in the Danubie. The free Haiduckes also surprised Iula and set fire, in which confusion the Turks flying into the castle, for haste thrust one another from the bridge into the castle ditch; wherein so many of them were drowned, that a man might haue gone drie foot ouer vpon the bodies of the dead. They tooke there also six hundred prisoners with much other bootie, & deliuered two hundred Christians which were there captiues. And albeit that these Haiducks after this exploit done were hardly pursued by the Turks from other places, yet they in safety retired with such bootie as they had alreadie gotten.

Iula surprised and burnt by the free Haiduckes.

But now to leaue these the troubles of Hungarie for a while, as the forerunners of greater ere long to ensue; let vs againe looke backe into Transyluania and Valachia, to see how Michael the Vayuod now in the meane time behaued himselfe there. The Cardinall Bathor ouer-throwne and slaine, and the countrey of Transyluania againe brought vnder the Emperors obedience; the Vayuod by his Embassadors gaue him forthwith to vnderstand of all his proceedings, with the whole successe thereof, as also of a purpose he had to inuade Moldauia: for that it was commonly reported, and also beleeued, That Sigismund the late Prince (not a little moued with the death of the Cardinall his cousin, and the reuolt of his countrie) aided by the Turks, the Tartars, the Polonians, and Moldauians, would now attempt some great matter for the recouerie of Transyluania: All which was shortly after the rather thought to be true, for I that diuers of his spies beeing taken, some at Clausenburg, some at Nessen, beside the Letters that were found about them from him vnto the Nobilitie and States of Transyluania (persua-suading them to reuolt from the Vayuod vnto him, and that his meaning was shortly to come with a great armie out of Polonia for the repulsing of him) they also of themselues confessed, How that Sigismund in disguised apparell had himselfe been in Transyluania, to conferre with diuers his secret friends concerning that matter. Which his Embassadours the Emperour honourably entertained, and by them confirmed vnto the Vayuod the gouernment of Transyluania, sending also vnto him diuers honourable Presents, forbidding him neuertheless to inuade Moldauia, for feare of raising a new and dangerous war against the Polonians also, vnder whose protection and the Turks the Palatine thereof then rested. According vnto which K command the Vayuod stayed his intended expedition; yet sending some good part of his forces vnto the Frontiers of Moldauia, for feare of Sigismund whome hee heard to bee hatching some mischiefe in Polonia, and ent[illegible]en to lie vpon the frontiers of that country. Some few moneths thus passing, Husraim Aga (a[illegible]ue reuerend old man, and much employed by the Turkish Sultan) with fiue other Turks of good account, Embassadours from the great Sultan, and a great retinue following him, came to Cronstat in Transyluania where the Vayuod then lay. Of whose comming the Vayuod hearing, with foure thousand horsemen most brauely mounted, went halfe a mile out of the citie to meet them: the footmen in the meane time on both sides of the street standing in good order, from the gate of the citie whereby they were to enter, euen vnto the Vayuods lodging, where stood also his guard all in red and white silke. L So meeting in the field, they both alighted from their horses, with great reuerence saluting the one the other: when presently the Embassador embracing the Vayuod, vngirt his scimitar, and in the name of the great Sultan put another about him, so richly garnished with gold and precious stones, as that no part of the scaberd was therefore to bee seene: besides this, he presented him with a faire plume of blacke Hearnes feathers mixed with some white (a right goodly ornament, in forme of a great bush) which the Vayuod would not in the field put vpon his head, although he were thereunto by the Embassadour most earnestly requested, but caused it to be carried before him: he also presented him with two very faire red ensignes, in token of the Turkes fauour and protection; the one for himselfe, and the other for his sonne Petrascio: moreouer, he gaue vnto him two exceeding faire horses richly furnished, with foure M others, and a most faire Faulcon. The Vayuod himselfe was most brauely mounted, and (after the manner of his countrie) had ten very faire spare horses led before him. At whose ente-rance into the town, all the great ordnance was discharged with great vollies of small shot: and so the Embassador still riding on the left hand of the Vayuod, being brought to his lodging, had six of his chiefe followers euery one of them presented with a rich robe of cloth of gold: in requitall

The gouernement of Transyluania by the Emperour confirmed vnto Michael the Vayuod.

A requitall whereof the Embassadour rewarded an hundred of the Vayuod his followers euerie one of them with a good suit of apparell: with this Embassador of the Turks was also the Po-lonian Embassador, whom the Vayuod in like manner honourably entertained. These Embas-sadors (as was thought) did what they might to haue drawne this worthy and renowned man, together with the countries of Transyluania and Valachia, from the Emperour vnto the Turks obeisance: howbeit he seldome or neuer spake with them, but that either before or after hee had conference with the Lords Vngnad and Zeckel (the Emperors Commissioners) concerning their requests; alwaies protesting vnto them, not to yeeld to any thing without the Emperors consent and good liking. Whereof Mahomet aduertised, and that he was not by any thing yet said or done, to be remoued from the Emperor, gaue him by the same Embassadors to vnder-B stand, How that he was in some speech with the Emperor concerning peace (as indeed he then was by messengers from the Bassaes at Presburg) which if it sorted to effect, that then it should be well, but if not, that then it should be good for him whilest yet he had time, wisely to consider of his owne estate, and to submit himselfe vnto his protection who was able to defend him, rather than for the vain praise of a certain foolish constancie, to aduenture himself with all that he had vnto most certaine danger and destruction: promising him in recompence of that his loyaltie, to giue vnto him for euer, the countries of Transyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, and at his need to furnish him both with men and money; offering moreouer to make him a great Commander in his armie in Hungarie, and the Bassa of Temeswar as his friend to be at all times readie with fiftie thousand horse and foot (as need should be) to assist him against the C Emperour, reseruing vnto himselfe whatsoeuer hee should more win for him: for all which bountie and kindnesse, requiring only to haue him vnto him loyall. All which his large offers the Vayuod little regarding, declared the same vnto the Emperors Commissioners: yet still protesting neuer to start, but to stand fast for the Christian Emperour. Notwithstanding as a man desirous to better his estate, he tooke hereupon occasion to request of the Emperour the countrie of Transyluania, by him so lately taken in, vnto him and his sonne in inheritiance for euer, with such frontier townes as in former time belonged vnto Transyluania: and that whatsoeuer he should win from the Turkes, might be his and his sonnes: He also requested, that all the preferments and dignities in former time granted by his Imperiall Maiesty vnto Sigismund D the late Prince, might now be bestowed vpon himselfe; & for his seruice done, to be furnished with money for the payment of his souldiers: And that the Emperor with the other Princes of the Empire should assure him, That if he were taken by the Turk, they should ransome him: but in case he were by the great power of the Turke driuen out of those countries, then by the Emperours appointment to haue some conuenient place allotted vnto him in the vpper Hungarie to liue in, with the yerely pension of an hundred thousand dollars. All which his requests if it would please him to grant, he promised this yere to do so much against the Turke, as had not in an hundred yeres bin don before: with vant, that if he had had the imploiment of the money which was spent in the time of this war, he would not haue doubted but to haue brought all the countries from the Euxine (or Blacke sea) to Buda, Alba Regalis, and Solnock, vnder the Emperors obeisance. A large promise indeed, but hardly to haue bin performed by a far greater Prince than he.

E Thus whilest things stood in discourse after the Cardinals death, Sigismund the late Prince in the meane time supported by the Polonians, with the aid of the Turks, the Tartars, and the Moldauians, was ready to haue inuaded Transyluania: yea the Tartars (as the forerunners of his greater power) were already entred the Countrie, and had out of the frontiers therof carried away some bootie. Wherefore the Vayuod vnderstanding, in great hast assembled his forces out of all places, which in short time was growne to some good head, the countrie people together with the free Haiducks (an aduenturous and resolute kind of souldiers) in great number daily resorting vnto him. So being now eight thousand strong, & most of them braue and lustie men, he with them and 20 pieces of artillerie remoued to Cronstat the foure and twen-F tieth day of Aprill, sending part of his armie (which euery day more and more encreased) before him to Nessen: where all his forces being assembled to the number of almost fifty thousand horse and foot, he with great celeritie passed the rough and high mountaines into Mol-dauia without resistance, but yet not without some trouble, his souldiers by the way beeing glad sometimes to eat the leaues of trees, the enemie hauing of purpose before carried away what-

whatsoeuer hee could that might haue yeelded him reliefe. Of whose speedie comming and great strength, Sigismund and Ieremias the Vayuod of Moldauia hearing, and vpon the reasonable estimat of their own forces finding themselues too weake to incounter him, retired themselues [illegible] Moldauia into the frontiers of Polonia, there to gather greater strength, & so to meet him. [illegible]s yet Ieremias the Vayuod had not receiued from the Turke such forces as were vnto [illegible] promised, and as he still expected. Michael the Vayuod in the meane time (his enemies thus fled) with fire and sword entering into Moldauia, tooke in the greatest part thereof, the feareful country people still yeelding vnto him as he went: and the rather, for that Ieremias their Vayuod (placed by the Polonian, but tributarie vnto the Turke) had laid vpon them a most grieuous imposition, as vpon euery man a duckat a month, for which they exceedingly hated him. But here in Moldauia, Michael the Vayuod (hauing still in his companie on of the Emperours commissioners in Transyluania, most rrustie seruants, who might faithfully report vnto them the whole manner of his proceedings) after the departure of Sigismund and Ieremias his enemies, staied not long; but hearing that they were retired towards the confines of Polonia, without longer delay made towards them, and the eighteenth of May found them by the castle Othuue neere vnto the riuer Nester, being thirtie thousand strong; Polonians, Moldauians, Turks, and Tartars: with whom he ioyned a most fierce and cruell battell, which begun about ten a clocke before noone, was with great courage but greater obstinacie on both sides maintained vntill the euening. At which time the fortune of the Valachian preuailing, his enemies at last betooke themselues to flight, of whom were there slaine eight thousand, beside many others of them drowned in the riuer Nester: where of the Valachians were lost two thousand onely. Concerning Sigismund and Ieremias, diuers reports were after this ouerthrow giuen out; some saying that they were slain, and some, that they were in flying, drowned: howbeit the truth was, that they both by flight escaped, to the greater trouble of themselues, as of their afflicted countries also. Michael after this so notable a victorie, taking in the rest of Moldauia, caused the people to sweare their obedien[illegible] vnto the Emperor, himselfe, and his son, to the great offence of the Polonians, not a little (as [illegible] tooke it) wronged therein; but especially of the great Chancellor, an old enemy vnto the house of Austria. Whereof ensued greater troubles in those frontier countries than before, to the further effusion of more Christian bloud, much better to haue been imploied against the fatall enemy, in defence of the Christian commonweale. Yet thus the three warlike and frontier countries of Transyluania, Valachia, & Moldauia, the surest bulwarkes of that side of Christendome, and most exposed vnto the furie of the common enemy, were now once again vnited vnder the obeisance of the Emperor, to the great benefit (no doubt) of the Christi[illegible]mmon-weale, and hurt of the Turks; if they might haue so continued, as God wot they di[illegible] not long.

Sigismund and the Moldauian ouerthrown by Michael the Vayuod.

Moldauia subdued by Michael.

Now the Vayuod notwithstanding this so great a victory, well considering that he of himselfe could hardly keep this new gained prouince of Moldauia against the power of the Turke, (pretending that to him it belonged as his own to giue to whom he pleased:) as also against the Polonians (not more desirous to restore Ieremias againe into Moldauia, than the Prince Sigismund into Transyluania) without the helpe of some other more mightie Prince whome hee might rest vpon; by his Embassadors (sent for that purpose) offered the soueraignetie of al those three countries vnto the Emperor, with condition, that he should appoint him perpetuall Gouernor of the same vnder him. The Emperour also vnderstood, how that Mahomet the great Turke had not long before againe sent vnto him another of his Chiaus, commanding him without delay to restore the countrie of Transyluania vnto the Prince Sigismund (vnto whom he was by the mediation of the king of Polonia now before reconciled) threatning otherwise with fire and sword to destroy Valachia, and by force of armes to depriue him both of Transyluania and his life together. Wherefore the Emperour doubting lest the Vayuod either for feare, or for the better assuring of his owne estate, should to his preiudice fall to some agreement with the Turke, yeelded to all that his Embassadors had of him requested; with condition, that he should be bound as need should require to serue with his people against the Turke, and that in Transyluania neere vnto his owne [illegible]son should be alwaies resident one of the Emperors counsellors, as Superintendent ouer the [illegible]ole countrey. Wherewith the Vayuod beeing contented, the Emperour sent thither Doctor Petzen with six thousand souldiers, and a great summe of money to pay the Vayuods souldiers, as he had before requested; and so

A so to take of them an oath, That they should from thenceforth become his Majesties faithfull seruants. Which Superintendent so by the Emperor sent, the Vayuod receiued with great honor, as vnto him of all others most welcome. Neuertheless being againe returned into Transyluania, it was not long but that (without regard of him) he began with new exactions to oppresse the people of the country, and in some sort to tyrannise ouer them; vsing great seueritie against diuers of the nobility also, especially such as he knew to haue taken part before with the Cardinal, or now of late with Sigismund his cousin, or any way to haue fauored his quarel. All which he did without the consent or good liking of Petzen, contrary to his promise made, No more to imbrue his hands in the bloud of the nobilitie of Transiluania, without the knowledge or consent of his Imperial Majestie or the Superintendent by him appointed: which for Michael tirannizeth in Transyluania.

B all that, if he had not done, he could not possibly haue kept them (disdaining to be gouerned by him) vnder his obeisance. Neuertheles the Transyluanians taking it in euill part to be so oppressed, and the nobility almost extinguished, yea and indeed to be at all ruled by him; by generall consent as if it had bin but one man, rise all vp in armes against him: insomuch that he finding himselfe with his Valachians and other his fauourits too weake for them, retired with all such as would follow him, into the mountains; and from thence sent presently for aid vnto the lord George Basta (a worthy captaine, and then the Emperors Lieutenant in the vpper Hungary) for the subduing of these rebellious people, and the reducing of them to their former obedience. Who by letters from Matthias the Archduke, at the instance of the Vayuod commanded so to do, with about 6000 horse and foot and 8 field pieces remoued from Cassouia in the vp-

The Transyluanians rebell.

C per Hungarie the 4 of September. Where by the way came vnto him Embassadors also from the people of Transyluania now vp in armes, and confederat also against the Vayuod: who in like manner also requested his aid, pretending themselues to be the Emperors most loyal subiects, but not vnder the gouernment of such a tyrant as was the Vayuod: alledging and exaggerating many his most cruel actions, and cleerely protesting, That for the present want of a good gouernour, they were enforced for the safegard of their liues to band themselues together: which if haply it might be in any thing preiudicial vnto the Emperours claime and interest, which he with so great toile and cost had procured in that prouince, it was against their wills, as enforced by necessitie to do that they did in defence of themselues. Which Embassa-

D dors so sent from the people, Basta with all speed dispatched away backe againe, comforting them without farther stir to expect his arriual in Transyluania: yet couenanting withall, That they should before conceiue into writing the oath of their fidelity and allegeance vnto his Imperial Majestie. Now might many and important considerations trouble the mind of Basta in so doubtfull acase. To giue aid vnto the Vayuod against the people, was the expresse order from Matthias the Archduke the Emperors lieutenant General: but to aid the people confederat against him, as they had requested, seemed now both more profitable and honest, especially hauing most certaine tokens of the small and doubtfull faith of the Vayuod; who only by dis-

E putation interessed in that prouince, was not so carefull of another mans; neither seeming to haue regard of Petzen, or of his owne word giuen for not further imbruing his hands in the bloud of the Nobility of Transyluania, without the Emperours knowledge and leaue: vpon which promise was likewise grounded the Archdukes order for giuing of him aid: so that such breach of his faith, & contempt of Petzen, had hastned the conspiracy of the people against him, despairing of all other health than that which by force of armes they could procure vnto themselues. To stand doubtfull himselfe, or to hold others in suspence, vntil that by currors in this new case he might receiue new instructions from the Emperor or the Archduke, had in it too much danger, as giuing leisure to each party to make sides, & to increase the slander of the last yeare, That he might so easily (and especially from the Valachian) haue assured that prouince to his Majestie, had he not bin an heartlesse man of no resolution, euen such an one as durst not looke vpon a cat (as some had said) all which might not a little pricke an honorable mind. To

F take part with the people confederat against the Vayuod, if it should not happily fall out at the first encounter, might betwixt the two contendants giue an entrance vnto the third, either the Turke or the Polonian in the fauour of Batbor: but if it should sort to the quite contrarie, and so himselfe to lose the day; then he saw himselfe void of all defence against the malicious, especially in that the world commonly measureth the wisedome vsed in any action, according to the successe thereof, than which nothing can be more vnreasonable, but aboue all others, in in matters of war. In this ſo troubled a tempeſt of contrarie winds, of power to haue driuen a right good mariner out of his courſe, Baſta laid hand vpon the helme of good meaning, and ſpread the ſailes of ſuch diſcretion, as taught him in matters of war to be lawful for a General to depart euen from the inſtructions of his Prince, not concerning the end, but the meanes leading to that end: eſpecially when the preſent occaſion ſo requireth, which the Prince could not with reaſon before comprehend, as depending of the moſt mightie fortune of war, which ſuffereth not ſo much delay as to expect counſell from far. So in this ambiguitie Baſta reſolued to joyn himſelfe vnto the confederats, moſt in his judgment concerning his Imperial Majeſty, as being the vttermoſt ſcope of his ſo great coſt & charge, to keep the country of Traſyluania at his deuotion, which conſiſted in the people, and not in the woods or mountaines: the matter being not great by what meanes ſoeuer it were done, ſo that it were honorable and honeſt.

Baſta taketh part with the Tranſyluanians againſt the Vayuod in whoſe aid he was ſent.

Vpon this deſire Baſta ſet forward, and the 14 day arriued at Torda, and there joined himſelfe vnto the confederats, to the great wonder of the Vayuod, in whoſe helpe he was ſent: where repoſing himſelfe one day, conſulting and conſidering of their forces, about 12000 ſtrong, with foure field pieces, beſides eight of his owne, with the ſix thouſand ſouldiers hee brought with him, in all about eighteene thouſand, he determined not to giue leiſure vnto the Vayuod to call vnto him farther helpe, hauing now with him about twentie thouſand foot and twelue thouſand horſe, with ſeuen and twenty field pieces: amongſt whom were diuers of the Siculi, in hope of their antient libertie, men of good account and ſort, with a mixture of the Coſſackes, Valachians, Raſcians, and Seruians, people of prey ſeruing only to ſpoile: whome Baſta knew to be far inferiour in courage to his twelue thouſand foot and ſix thouſand horſe, not onely for the valour of his owne men accuſtomed vnto the frontier ſeruice, but alſo for the confederates, who engaged with their goods, liues, and honour, and deſirous to be reuenged of the Vayuod, were like enough to ſtand well by it. Wherefore he ſet forward the ſixteenth day, and in two dayes march came within ſight of the Vayuod: who hauing ſent out certaine great troups of horſemen to take view of the enemie, and ſeeing them repulſed, ſet fire on Miriſlo a village faſt by, out of which they had before drawne certaine ſmall field pieces into the campe.

Miriſlo is a village two leagues on this ſide of Alba-Iulia, directly vpon the high-way ſtretching from the ſide of Maracza nauigable riuer, vnto the foot of an hil; alongſt which the riuer running, ſomtimes neerer, and ſomtimes farther off, together with the riſing of the hill, maketh an vnequal liſt of ground, in ſome places half a mile broad and more, and in ſome other ſhut vp as it were into a narrow throat, as in the ſame place where the aforeſaid village ſtandeth, & where the Vayuod lay incamped in a place of great aduantage, behind a great trench drawn from the riuer, croſſe that little ſpace of ground betwixt the mountaine and the riuer. On this ſide, which from Miriſlo the farther a man goeth the farther the plaine enlargeth, Baſta encamping cloſe vnto the village, oppoſed againſt the comming of the enemy 3 great corps du gard, two of them Hungarians, towards the hill fauored with a Church, and the third toward the riuer, of the Almaine footmen, vnder the charge of Countie Tomaſo Caurioli of Breſcia, Sergeant Major of the field, with all the artillery: who as in a place neere and very open vnto the enemy, there intrenched himſelf, ſtil approching neerer and neerer both on the one ſide and the other. Towards the euening of the ſelfeſame 17 day came to Baſta one Peter Armenio with Letters from the Vayuod, containing, That hauing vnderſtood of his arriual in the campe of the Conſpirators, he now further deſired to know whether it were by the conſent and commandment of the Emperor or not: and how it came to paſſe that he would ſo doe, conſidering the diuers chances of war, the ſword hanging as it were euen ouer his head if he ſhould chance to loſe the battell? Whereunto Baſta anſwered, That the morrow following he would ſhew him the authoritie he had from the Emperour (alluding to the Imperial Standard he carried with him:) and that as concerning the fortune and danger to enſue, he referred that wholly vnto the will and pleaſure of the Almightie, the juſt Iudge of all controuerſies. But in the meane time he exhorted him to leaue that Prouince he had ſo euill gouerned, vnto his Imperial Majeſtie, as he was in duty bound; promiſing him free paſſage into Valachia, and giuing him time to conſider thereupon vntill 8 a clocke the next morning, after which time it ſhould be free for euery man to doe for himſelfe what he could. Which anſwer the Vayuod hauing read, inflamed with diſdaine, with many proud words full of threats and diſgrace, although it was then night, preſently ſently cauſed by the ſound of the drum and trumpet the battell to be proclaimed againſt the next day.

On the other ſide, Baſta after he had aſſured his camp, hauing not onely ſent, but gone himſelfe to haue the counſel of his owne eies, for his better vnderſtanding how the enemy lay; and finding no reaſonable means for him there to attempt any exploit by, as well for the ſtrength of the trench before the front, & in part along the ſide of the enemies camp, as alſo for the danger of a riſing ground on the left hand, whereunto all the plain betwixt the enemies camp and the village was ſubiect, thought it beſt to remoue, & to make a ſhort retreat about the ſpace of an Italian mile, according to the commodiouſnes of the place; thinking it no hard matter, of ſo proud an enemy, and not altogether ſo well acquainted with martiall ſtratagems, to gain a notable victory. This his purpoſe propounded in counſel, was greatly diſliked of the captains of the confederates: vnto whome it ſeemed more ſafety to aſſault the Vayuod, yet lying in his ſtrength, than to retire before the face of an enemy ſo ſtrong & aduenturous: for that ſuch a retreat according to the manner of that country, would be deemed no other than a plain flight: and to breake his order & ariſe, was (as they ſaid) but to diſcourage his own people, and to encourage his enemies. But Baſta the better to perſuade them, promiſed therein to ſhew to them a more cunning kind of fight than was yet vnto them knowne; & declared the aſſurance that he in his owne perſon, with the Almains in the rereward would giue them in that retreat, in ſuch ſort, as that they ſhould not loſe ſo much as a man, much leſſe they needed to feare to fal into any diſorder in ſo ſhort a ſpace, his purpoſe being only to giue the plain vnto the enemy, wherin to ſhew himſelfe into the open field. So the retreat being agreed vpon, the morning following being the 28 of September, the three Corps du guard (before ſpoken of) were betimes called backe, and the baggage ſent away: after which followed the Tranſyluanians and Hungarians, the Almaines in the rereward encloſing the great ordnance.

The battell of Miriſlo betwixt Michael the Vayuod & Baſta the emperors lieutenant.

The Vayuod aware of their departure, ſent forth with a great troup of horſemen, eſpecially of the Coſſackes, to take view of them, and to skirmiſh with them; which were ſo far kept off by a company of musketiers in the rereward, as that they could not come ſo nigh as to do any harme, although that all the way they went they were by them ſtil charged, to the great contentment of Baſta, to ſee ſo good a beginning of his deſignes as might bring them all to their wiſhed effect. But when hee ſaw the great artillerie vpon the carriages to come out of the village, a certain ſigne that the enemy ſet forward with al his forces, he marched faire & ſoftly to giue him hope to ouertake him: and ſo retired as far as he thought good from the village, hauing before thought of a conuenient place wherin his people might with room enough vpon aduantage ſtay: when as about halfe a mile from him, and as far from the village, he might ſee the enemy march with his people in order of battell; then began he to march towards him alſo: & perceiuing the enemy to come on in one only thick front, by reaſon of the ſtraitnes of the place, hauing on the right hand towards the riuer placed as it were all his horſmen, & towards the mountaine his footmen alone, and 500 foot placed aloft without any artillerie, as it ſeemed he would haue done, hauing planted ſome below at the foot of the hill in the way, and he in the midſt, euen before the front of the battell, where the horſemen came after the footmen; he alſo placed his ſquadron in one front onely, to the intent not to be incloſed by the enemie on the flanke of his army. The body of his main battell conſiſted of one great ſquadron of about 3000 Almaine footmen, flanked on each ſide with 150 Rutters of Sileſia: before the ſquadron toward the right hand he had ſet a looſe wing of three hundred musketiers: in the right wing towards the hill he placed a companie of launces, with two ſquadrons of the countrey footmen: and in the left wing toward the riuer one ſquadron of Tranſyluanian footmen, & two of launces, for that the enemie was at that time very ſtrong in horſemen: the Coſſacks, archers, and harquebuſiers he placed in the rereward: of his great artillerie he would make no vſe, for that hauing not much, he would not ſtand vpon the defence thereof, but deſired rather with all ſpeed to come to the ſword with the enemy, vnacquainted with ſuch cloſe fight, foot to foot; and well the leſſe fit, by reaſon of their light armor. And therfore he thought it beſt firſt to ſet forward his ſquadron of Almaines to giue the charge, bending towards the right hand, amongſt the thickeſt of the footmen towards the artillerie at the foot of the hill, as there whereas was the ſtrength of the enemies infanterie. And doubting in the performing hereof, to be charged on the left ſide with a great ſquadron of about 3000 launces, which ſeemed to to ſtand vpon that wing to giue the firſt charge, he gaue order vnto Rodoulz his Lieutenant, and C Colonell of the Rutters, which had the leading of the left wing, that he ſhould at a certaine ſigne giuen, ſet forward towards the left hand, for the charging of that great ſquadron. So his people being [illegible] in order, and the manner of proceeding ſet downe, he putting on his helmet, with [illegible] countenance ſaid, That at that time he truſted he ſhould ſhew vnto the Vayuod, that his Tru[illegible]mon could doe more than his ſcimitar: And himſelfe ſetting forward betwixt the ſquadron of the Almaine footmen and the wing of the musketiers, about two houres after noone, marched faire and ſoftly towards the enemy: who without mooving expected the diſcharging of their artillerie; whereunto the neerer that the enemie came vnto it, the leſſe harme it did him, by ſhooting either ouer or ſhort in the field, which eaſily aſcended. The wing of musketiers went directly to giue a charge vnto the artillerie; and the ſquadron toward H the foot of the hill, where Baſta deſired forcibly to charge, that thereby they might be enforced to ſpend their firſt vollies, and with ſome diſcouragement or diſorder to retire, preſently came in, all afront, iuſt vpon the ſigne giuen; and ſo with his Almaine footmen and the Rutters on the right hand, encloſed and compaſſed in behinde the greateſt part of the enemies footmen. At which very inſtant, the Rutters on the left hand alſo ſo couragiouſly charged vpon the three thouſand launces, that better could not haue beene deſired of any band of moſt old Michael the Vayuod ouerthrowes. and expert ſouldiers. The lances retiring without any hurt, and the firſt volley diſcharged, forced the infanterie, and ſo diſordered the reſt. Whereupon the wings charging, there enſued preſently a great ſlaughter and ouerthrow, onely fortie of Baſta his men being ſlaine, and as many hurt; where of the enemies were loſt in the battell ten thouſand: and greater had the I ſlaughter been, if the village and approch of the night had not couered many of them that fled, and ſtaied the purſuit of the victors that followed them. Which putteth me in remembrance of the great victorie that Scipio Aſiaticus had againſt Antiochus, wherein were ſlaine of the Romans but three hundred (although that in the fight one of the wings ſtood for a time doubt-full) there being loſt of the enemies aboue fiftie thouſand. Howbeit there were afterwards found in all (as was by the peaſants of the country reported) twentie thouſand ſlaine in this battell. By this victorie Baſta recouered many enſignes and much armour, before ſent by the Emperour vnto the Vayuod, together with all his tents and baggage. And preſently after the ouerthrow, there were many troupes of horſemen ſent out euerie way with proclamation, to ſpare the liues of ſuch of the Siculi as ſhould lay downe their armes: of whom K many were ſent priſoners vnto diuers places, eſpecially to Fogaras, a ſtrong Towne towards Valachia. As for the Vay[illegible]himſelfe, hee with certaine Coſſackes eſcaped by flight.

The morrow following, Baſta diſpatched away the Countie Caurioli, to enforme the em-perour of all the particularities of the ſucceſſe of that expedition: who ſeemed to bee therewith pleaſed, yet neither gaue reward vnto the Countie, neither commended Baſta in that hee had done (foreſeeing perhaps what was to enſue therof) although he had in writing before ap-proued his reſolution and motion made in fauour of the Confederats. Staying that day in that The Chiaki was the chiefe man and as it were the ring-leader of the Transyluanian new rebellion. quarter, Baſta gaue order vnto the Chiaki, to ſend out a thouſand horſemen to purſue the flying Vayuod: who in ſtead of ſo doing, ioyning themſelues with other their conſorts, ſetled L themſelues to ranſacke Alba-Iulia, vnder the colour, that there was the Vayuods wealth and ſubſtance; yet (as the manner of ſuch men is) ſparing neither merchant nor citiſen: which worthily ſeemed vnto Baſta a great wrong, for to ſee the innocent puniſhed, and the guiltie to eſcape free. And albeit that he made what haſte he might thitherwards with all his camp, and ſo ſtayed one day not farre from thence, to haue giuen ſome redreſſe vnto the ſpoyle that had happened; yet was all that his labour loſt, for that ſo many of the greater ſort and chiefeſt amongſt them had their handes therein, with whome hee thought it more wiſedome as then to diſſemble, than to fall into any tearmes of ſeueritie, without hope of doing any good. So he reſolued in all haſte to march towards Fogaras (whither he heard ſay the Vay-uod was come with new forces out of Valachia and Moldauia) and in ſixe dayes march M came to Cibinium, where he receiued certaine newes, That the great Chancellour of Po-lonia, and Sigiſmund (ſometime the Tranſyluanian Prince) were with a ſtrong armie vpon the Frontiers of Moldauia; hauing ſent before them Moyſes the Siculian, with about eight thouſand of the Siculi (his ſouldiers) to what purpoſe was eaſie to bee ſeene. Which aduer-

A aduertiſement interrupted the courſe of Baſta his victorie; for that it ſeemed not reaſonable to purſue the enemie, and to leaue behinde him a doubt of ſo great importance: and eſpecially, for that he thought he could not aſſure himſelfe of the aid of the countrey people, in caſe that Sigiſmund their old Prince were once ſeene in Tranſyluania. Wherefore he thought good to ſtay where he was, to prouide for all euents as need ſhould be; and ſo reſolued to ſend the Chi-aki, and one Ladiſlaus Pithi, to parley with Moſes, who made a ſhew of no great moment of his good will towards the confederats. In the meane time came two meſſengers from the Vay-uod, offering in his name, that he ſhould do whatſoeuer were in the behalfe of the Emperor to be impoſed vpon him. Vnto whom theſe conditions were by Baſta and the reſt of the Coun-cell propounded; Firſt, That he ſhould for euer reſigne all the claime he had or might haue in- A reconciliation made betwixt Michael the Vayuod & Baſta.
B to the country of Tranſyluania: then, That he altogether with his armie, ſhould giue his oath of fidelitie vnto his Imperial Majeſtie: alſo, That hee ſhould forthwith through Valachia go with his army vnto the frontiers of Moldauia, to ſtay the Polonians from farther entrance: and moreouer, to giue his wife and little ſon in hoſtage for the performance of theſe things. With which meſſengers was ſent one Sebaſtian Techelli, to receiue the oath and promiſed hoſtages: vnto whom was appointed for the place of their ſafe keeping, the Biſhops caſtle in Alba-Iulia, the Vayuod hauing before requeſted, That they might be ſo kept in Tranſyluania: although Baſta thought it much better to haue had them kept in the vpper Hungarie. This agreement being made, Baſta kept on his way towards Fogaras, which he found alreadie poſſeſſed by the Chiaki, and ſo from thence to Corona. After which, the Vayuod diſtruſting of the articles C agreed vpon, went directly into Valachia, but not at all into Moldauia; not ſo much diſcomfi-ted with the forces of the Polonians whom he went againſt (not doubting to giue them a great ouerthrow) as for the diſtruſt he had of Moſes the Siculian, who in the battel might ſhew him-ſelfe his enemie behinde him. Now whether it were for the diſtruſt he had in his owne followers, or only for feare of treaſon by the Polonians plotted, being not likely that they with ſo ſmall forces were come to fight, without ſome greater ſecret deceit; he not knowing whom to Michael for feare of being betrayed vnto the Polonians, takes his flight into the mountaines.
truſt or to feare, of his owne accord tooke his flight into the ſtrength of the mountaines, without any great loſſe of his people, hauing left his baggage behinde him, which was aſſailed and taken by the Haiducks and ſuch other ſharkers enured to prey, and alwaies readie in like occa-D ſion, helpe to ſpoile and chaſe them that are alreadie running: although that afterwards in di-uers skirmiſhes with the Turks (who to cauſe him the rather to turne his backe vnto the Polo-lonians, had preſumptuouſly ſcoured vp and downe the country) he loſt many. In fine, giuing Moldauia loſt, he was now out of hope how to be able to hold only Valachia his old gouernment. Euen he which but a little before commanded aboue an hundred thouſand ſouldiers in field; he, which in deſpight of who ſaid nay, was able to command Valachia and Moldauia, and happily the other countries alſo neere vnto him, as hauing receiued the command of Tranſyl-uania as gouernor for the Emperour; he that made Conſtantinople to tremble, and found no Empire equall to his deſignes. But it fareth oftentimes with the Great, as with birds of prey, who greedily ſeeking to prey vpon others, become themſelues a prey vnto other greater than themſelues: for they neuer contented, and attributing onely vnto their owne valour and wiſe-dome, their owne proſperous proceedings, are the true ſhewers of the vnſtable wheele of for-E tune: or what ſay I of Fortune? being rather the verie children of Follie. So commonly falleth it out with Princes (eſpecially the new) which in the garboiles of war betwixt their mightie neighbours, not gouerned by their owne wiſedome, reſt themſelues onely vpon the aduice of their Counſellours, are by them led they wote not whither, for the greateſt intereſt they haue in them. For had the Vayuod had but the leaſt in-ſight into politicall gouernment, hee might well haue vnderſtood, that amongſt ſo many mightie Princes he could not much grow or yet well root himſelfe, without the aſſured ſtay of ſome one or other of them. He ſhould alſo haue knowne within what compaſſe a new prince ought to haue vſed ſeueritie and rigour; and that he ought to obſtaine from all offence in good or otherwiſe, which might any way F procure vnto him the diſpleaſure or hatred of his ſubjects. Whereas his Counſellours not ſo much reſpecting his profit as their owne, had not the power or not the will to perſuade him ſo by good meanes to plant himſelfe ſure in Tranſyluania; but ſo both caſt him headlong from his high eſtate, and at the ſame time furthered the loſſe of Caniſia, a matter of important conſequence.

Now

Now lay Bassa encamped in the field in Transyluania, when a messenger came vnto him G from the great Chancellour of Polonia, to declare vnto him, That it was not his purpose to trouble Transyluania, hauing no such order from the King: albeit that hee would aduise the Transyluanians, if they wished to liue in quiet, to make choice of a Prince of their owne nation, and such an one as the Turke should well like of, whereas otherwise they should but seeke their owne destruction, together with their neighbors. Which his counsell was well marked of them all, albeit it was thought by many of the wiser sort, not so much to proceed of any good meaning he had towards the Transyluanians, as of an old grudge and inueterate hatred he had alwayes borne against the house of Austria, as also, that he euen then countenanced the Prince Sigismund with his armie to no other end, but by him to raise vp new stirs in that Pro- H uince, and so to draw it from the Emperors obeisance, although thereby it became againe tributarie vnto the Turke, who in all these matters had a great hand. Yea some sticked not to say, That he couertly aimed at that Principalitie for his sonne, howsoeuer he masked the same vnder the shew of Sigismund the late Prince. But vnto him answer was giuen by the Transyluani-ans, (with thanks for his good will) That in all their consultations they would haue a principal regard of their owne welfare, together with the common. Which answer he hauing recei-The chancellor placeth a new Vayuod in Valachia in stead of Michael, by him driuen out ued, forthwith placed one Simon (the brother of Hieremias the Moldauian) Vayuod of Valachia in stead of Michael by him driuen out, and so leauing a conuenient number of souldiers with him, returned himselfe towards Polonia. Vnto which election so made by the Poloni-ans the Turks craftily gaue place, knowing well to play the foxes where they could not play the lyons; wisely for a time comporting the iniurie: and the old Chancellor as crafty as they, I hauing a secret purpose by occasion of these present troubles, to prefer his sonne at length vnto the principalitie of Transyluania, and thereunto also to joine the countries of Moldauia and Valachia, had therein of purpose placed the aforesaid Simon, a man of no valor, and of a small apprehension, whom he might againe at his pleasure displace, and joine those prouinces vnto his new purchase: which he could not so well do if he should haue there placed a man of greater reach and courage. So worke the heads of the [illegible], and so trauell the braines of the ambitious aspiring.

Bassa vnderstanding of the retyring of the Polonians, entered into consultation with the False rumours raised to haue terrified Bassa.
Chiaki and other the principal men of that Prouince (which lodged with the armie in the K countrey villages thereabout) for calling together the States and people, to make choice of some such men as they thought meetest to be sent vnto the Emperor, to know his pleasure for the gouernment of that Prouince. But neuertheless in the meane time, whilest there was no suspition of the forreine enemie, began to worke certaine malecontents, which thinking with greater libertie to liue vnder a weake Prince, than vnder one of greater power; with one voice cryed out, That Sigismund with a great power was entred into the confines of Transyluania, one whiles towards Valachia, another while by the way of Moldauia; and that the strength of the countrey and others there by still resorted vnto him: with other such like inuentions, of purpose deuised to haue made Bassa suddenly departed, or at leastwise to haue troubled the Dyet or assemblie called, & the consultation also. But he wel aduised of their purpose, moued not out of his quarter, but there lay verie priuatly, to declare thereby the great confidence he L had in the thankfulnesse of the nobilitie of that country, as by him deliuered from the oppression of the Vayuod: as also to make them to vnderstand, That the gouernment to be appointed was not to be setled in the sole power of a tyrant, but in the fidelitie of the subjects, protected vnder a most gentle, royal, and most fatherlike gouernment, not ambitiously sought after, but voluntarily of themselues offered, & for the common good, by the Emperor accepted. Beside that, he knew right wel how that Castaldo (in like case before in the yere 1551, sent into Transyluania with 8000 Almaines) left behinde him his armie, and without any precedent courtesie went priuatly to Alba-Iulia, where Queene Isabel had for her defence assembled a Dyet of all the States, and there by wel handling of the matter, got to Ferdinand the Emperor that kingdome, which he could not by the feare of his forces haue gained: for which doing, Writers M attribute vnto him the name of great wisedome, notwithstanding that the yeare following he was forced to abandon his conquest, but yet not through any default in himselfe.

But it is truly said, That men pleasured, according to the occasion change their manners, as doth the camelion his color according to the place: nothing being by nature so short, nothing of

A of lesse life than the remembrance of a benefit with the vnthankfull, which the greater it is, the more it is repaied with vngratitude; either by making it to haue been of little worth, or to haue proceeded not of courtesie, but from some other more priuat & proper considerations of the giuer. The diet aforesaid being assembled, diuers broils were there raised by the malecontents, as vsually it commeth to passe where the people haue to do with the gouernment; apt to be moued with euery rumour, alwaies ready to change their opinion as straight glutted therewith, headstrong, faithlesse, all in words to no end: some of them in that assemblie cryed out, that the Almains might be paid, discharged, and thanked for the pains they had taken for them as their neighbors, with offring to do them the like pleasure as their occasions should require: B otherwise cried to haue them put all to the sword, so much they were deuoid of reason: others cried out as fast, that they were not by any means to endure the gouernment of Maximilian the Archduke, but by some nominated vnto them would needs haue a Prince of their own countrey, and such an one as the great Turke should well like of, as the Chancellour had persuaded them. Bassa for all that not dismaid with so vnexpected an encounter (albeit that he began to suspect that he had lost all his labor, if he were not in short time with greater forces relieued) at such time as the Chiaki with other the chiefe men amongst the people, came as their maner was euery other day to visit him: with conragious speech and vnappalled countenance told them plainely, That he well perceiued their drift and purpose; and yet doubted not either of C the great benefit they had from him so lately receiued; & in case it might happen them little to esteeme of those things (greater than which could not happen amongst men) that yet they should well know, that he was not a man to be feared with words, but fully resolued not to stir one foot thence with his forces, but rather to lose his life, which hee would for all that sell as deare as he could. Whereunto answer was giuen with much courteous speech, That he should not giue eare vnto any the speeches of the light vulgar people; but to content himselfe that the nobility, in whose hands the chiefe power of that prouince was, had not don any thing not be-seeming themselues. So after much dispute, were appointed 3 persons according to the three estates (the Nobility, the Commons, & the State in general) to go vnto the Emperor, to request of him Maximilian the Archduke for their Gouernor: with speciall request also, that it would D please him not to ouercharge with forrein souldiers that Prouince already sore impouerished; especially hauing in it selfe people sufficient for the defence thereof, and more nimble to encounter with the Turks, than the heauy & slow Almains, and they also of double charge. These difficulties with much ado thus appeased by such as stood fast for the Emperor, Bassa thought it not good again to call any such assembly, hoping that time and the Emperors great wisdome, would for all these matters find conuenient remedy. Yet saw he plainly, the mind of the people was to resolue to remaine for euer free, if they should haue come to a second consultation; and in them a princely desire to command rather than to be commanded: yea in that selfesame Diet the Chiaki was declared Gouernour on the behalfe of the people, with authoritie in many things of himselfe to determine without calling together of any assembly of the rest of the E States: which they said they did only vntill they were by his Imperiall Maiesty prouided of a Gouernour. Neuertheless Bassa wel perceiued more than a Tribunitial power to be now ioyned by the people vnto the Emperours Commissioners, knowing that this Chiaki was in great hope to haue bin proclaimed Prince of the confederats, in case they had not bin presently re-lieued against the Vayuod: & hauing in him yet noted still his great ambition, for that marching from Torda toward the Vayuod, he caused to be carried before him a speare with an Hungarian cap, and a plume of feathers vpon a lance, in token of his chiefe command, albeit that afterwards at the complaint of Bassa, pretending therin a wrong to be done vnto his regiment marching vnder the Imperiall standard, he tooke it down: neither was he then a little suspected to haue suffered his souldiers to haue sacked Alba-Iulia, as also to haue surprised Fogaras, and to haue vsed diuers other means all tending vnto popularitie and ambitious aspiring: wherein he F deemed it yet better to dissemble than to proceed farther, and then to do it indeed when hee had power sufficient.

The stoutspeech of Bassa, vnto the Chiaks and the rest of the nobilitie of Transyluania.

The next day following came all the Counsel of that prouince, with the Deputies (appointed to haue gone vnto the Emperor) & the people vnto the house of Bassa, requesting him (although such their manner of comming might seeme to exceed the bounds of request) that he would send his Germanes out of the countrey, and so after so many troubles to giue it leaue a little to breath: as for himselfe, that he might stay at Alba-Iulia, vntil the men deputed to that purpose might go vnto his Maiesty with their requests. Basta not a little troubled with such an Imperious request, and now (but not before) perceiuing the occasion of this great discontentment, saw himselfe much deceiued in a most materiall point, and the ground of all this action, by trusting too much vnto his owne too small forces, too weake for the defence of his owne person, much lesse to keepe vnder so populous a Prouince, such as before in the yeare 1552 vnder the leading of Castaldo, had of it selfe sent out 70000 fighting men for the besieging of Lippa, and now vpon the sudden 12000 with a few noblemen in the face of a mighty and armed enemy, where they now held an armed consultation with him, the nobilitie meeting together with their great retinues; and so much the greater, by how much the suspition was the more by them feared, for them to be enforced to resolue vpon any thing contrary to their good liking: whereas he contenting himselfe only with their oath without any other hostages, and so giuing aid vnto the confederats, had put himselfe vpon their faith, together with all his people, into the midst of Transyluania; a matter of far greater importance than any pledge they were able to haue giuen him. Besides that, of the 6000 men which he had brought with him into that countrie, three thousand fiue hundred of Silesia now brought to 2000, could not be perswaded longer to stay without their pay before hand, the pay of their countrie beeing alreadie spent: and the rest drawne out of the garrisons of the vpper Hungarie, or els there pressed, were at a certaine time to returne. Yet neuertheless hee attempted in some sort to satisfie their request, for not grieuing of the country, by requesting of them to deliuer vnto him some strong place, whereinto he putting his men into garrison, they might so lie without any further charge or trouble to the country, liuing vpon their own wages. Which when he could not obtaine, and withall considering, that if those few of his people which yet remained could be contented to stay with him, the retaining of them might giue occasion vnto the desirous of new stirs vpon euery the least disorder of the souldiers to alter the matter at their pleasure (as had hapned vnto the eight thousand Almaines of Castaldo, driuen sometimes out of that countrey vnder the colour of some insolencie by them committed, although others had been the chiefe doers thereof, namely about some twentie Polonians) he resolued of all these things to giue notice to the Court, and so faire and softly to march with his souldiers vnto the confines of that countrie, & to saue his eight pieces of artillerie with his other munition in Samos Viuar castle, a strong fortresse a good way within the confines, which together with the strong castle of Kuiuar, Aga Leche an Albanoise and Generall of the Vayuods horsemen deliuered to Zakell Captaine of Zaccomar, one of his Maiesties Commissioners; who there prouided for the Gouernor Basta his familiar fauorit: although that the Transyluanians had with great promises sought to haue crossed such deliuerie of the aforesaid Castles, and to haue had them in their owne power.

The errour of Basta.

The discretion of the doer is not alwaies to bee deemed by the euent of the thing done.

Wherfore Basta not deceiued, but by necessitie enforced, yeelded that he could not hold, and gaue that he could not sell, making a vertue of necessitie; deceiued in the euent of the matter which he had propounded vnto himselfe from the beginning, for the assurance of that country to the Emperor; by an excusable error, if it be true that some wise men say, nothing to be more vnreasonable than by the euent of matters to iudge of their wisdome by whom they were managed; which consisteth not in diuining before of the certainty of the euent, but in the reasonable coniecture thereof, by the means leading therunto, than which nothing is more deceitful, as not depending from our own actions only, but from other mens also more grosse and vnreasonable: none knowing better how much the wisedome of man deceiueth it selfe, than those which are vnto themselues true witnesses of the euent of their owne consultations. Neuertheless the matter was afterward so well handled by Basta, Petzen, & others the Emperors great fauorites in Transyluania, that in a Diet holden by the Transyluanians, he was with a conuenient guard againe by them receiued as the Emperors Lieutenant, vntill further order were by him taken for the gouernement and assurance of that countrey: the Chiaki and his complices faintly consenting thereunto, as not greatly pleased therewith. Neither had Basta much cause to be proud of such his gouernment, hauing therof no longer assurance than pleased that fickle people to affoord him: yet sith no better could be had, he must take it as he might, deeming it better in some sort for the present to hold it for the Emperor, than not at all: with which his weake

A weake state amongst moe enemies than friends, we wil for a while leaue him.

But whilest things thus passed (as we haue said) in Transyluania and Hungarie (the treatie for peace betwixt the Emperor and the Turke being vanished into smoke;) Ibrahim Bassa the Turks Generall in Hungarie, hauing all the last Winter made great preparation for the inuasion of the Emperors territories, and the doing of some notable enterprise for the recouerie of his reputation somewhat impaired by the euill successe of the last yeres wars; & euen in these his greatest preparations of this yere, not a little troubled by the mutinie of the Ianizaries and Spahi for want of their pay at Constantinople, as also with the rebellion in Caramania: now at length in the latter end of August (by order from the Grand Seignior his great Lord and master) began to set forward with his armie from Belgrade, supposed to be aboue two hundred thousand men strong. And comming to Babotsca, a strong fortresse of the Christians in the nether Hungarie, sat downe before it, and hauing planted his artillerie, furiously battered it, with purpose to haue the next day assaulted it: but the captaine of the castle considering the weaknesse of his garrison to withstand so puissant an enemie, and that the wals to be alreadie sore shaken with the fury of the great ordnance, came to a reasonable composition with the Bassa, and so deliuered vnto him the place. Which exploit done, and the castle to him surrendred, he marched from thence to Canisia, a strong town in the frontiers of Stiria, of most men before supposed a place impregnable; for that it was scituat in a very deep marish, and furnished with a strong garrison of valiant souldiers, part Hungarians and part Almaines: after this strong towne Ibrahim the great Bassa especially longed, so to free those frontiers of the Turks from the often incursions that the garrison souldiers of that place made therein; as also by the taking of that so strong a fortresse from the Christians, to open a more free and safe passage for the Turks into Austria, to the indangering of other places of the empire also farther off. Wherfore encamping his great armie on the side of the marish which compassed the Isle round whereon the towne stood, he began with fagots and earth to fill vp the marish, so to passe ouer his armie; they in the town in the mean time not ceasing with their thundring shot to disturbe them, and to do them what harme they might: who for all that, proceeding in their worke, had brought it now almost close vnto the Island, where whilest they were about to haue landed, they were by the souldiers of the garrison so encountered, that hauing lost a number of their men as well Ianizaries as others, with two of their best captains also, they were by plain valor enforced to retire. But preparing themselues against the next day with a greater force to haue again returned vnto the assault of the Isle, they saw the Imperiall armie now at their backs, and come so neere them, that with their artillerie they did them great harm; which put them in no small feare, seeing themselues inclosed betwixt the towne and the camp, and both out of the one and the other to receiue no small hurt, as well with the small shot as the great: besides that out of the camp diuers whole bands sometimes sallied, discharging great vollies of shot euen into their trenches. In the Imperiall army were about two and forty thousand horse and foot, men of diuers nations, vnder the leading of duke Mercurie, now Generall of the Emperors forces in Hungarie; with whom were also the Lords Nadasti, Esdrin, Bacchian, and the Gouernour of Croatia; with diuers other famous captaines, come thither for the reliefe of Canisia, a place of so great importance for the defence of that side of the country, and to helpe that it fell not into the power of the barbarous enemie. But Ibrahim Bassa vnderstanding by his espials the small number of the Christians; and well knowing how much he was too strong for them by reason of his great multitude, went out against them, & finding them as ready as himselfe, ioyned battell with them, with great slaughter of men both on the one side and the other: which bloudy fight (the victory yet standing doubtfull, but in all mens iudgement more inclining vnto the Christians than to the Turks) was at length by the comming on of the night broken off. At which time the Christians retiring themselues into their trenches, the Turkes stood all the night in the field with their weapons in their hands; as fearing to haue been again in the night by their enemies assailed. Meane while the Christian captaines in the camp at variance among themselues, and so not now to be commanded by Duke Mercurie their Generall; at such time as the Turkes, presuming on their multitude dared them to battell the next day, could by no means be perswaded to go out against them, or once to stirre out of their trenches. Insomuch that the Generall of the Tartars thereupon taking courage, made an inrode into the Countrie thereby, and meeting with two hundred wagons laded with victuals going vnto the Chri-

Whereof [illegible] hauing no wherewithall, and ouer it was [illegible] of victuals at time to [illegible] they were glad in night-time to [illegible] very secretly to flie [illegible] by the Turkes perceiued, with [illegible] as hauing the ayde of [illegible] [illegible] grew vnknown, and [illegible] all the language [illegible] became another [illegible] [illegible] of two places of [illegible] [illegible] of Canisia, which [illegible] relieued, [illegible] to buy the Turke and [illegible] [illegible] [illegible] the late rebell, called the Scrinane, and one of his greatest fauorits, seeing how hardly not one-ly Cussabin himselfe, but the rest of his followers had bin handled by the Turks, began to make head, and to call vnto him all such as loued their liberty: vnto the sweet name whereof, so many were [illegible] ne come about him, as that out of them he formed such an armie, as made him not [illegible] all vnto the Turks his enemies. Against whom, Mehemet Bassa going with all his power to [illegible] oppressed him, found him with those his rebellious folke, worse to courageous (for the desire they all had to breake out of the Othomin slauerie, and to liue in such liberty as was promised them by their captaine and Generall) that ioyning battell with them, hee re-ceiued of them a notable ouerthrow, in so much that fearing to haue lost his whole army, he was glad to retire, and to send out commissions for the raising of greater forces. Sultan Mahomet in the mean time, whither it was for feare of this new rebellion, or for that he vnderstood of the Embassadors sent from the Persian vnto the Christian Princes, began to suspect lest that king should breake the league he had with him, & so to his further trouble take vp armes also against him. Wherefore vpon a Turkish pride he sent an Embassador into Persia, to giue the King to vnderstand, That for the more assurance of the league betwixt them, he demanded to haue one of his sons sent vnto him in hostage, as a pledge of his brothers faith. Which so proud a demand the Persian king tooke in such disdaine, that he commanded in his rage the Embassador to be forthwith slaine: but that his fury being by his graue counsellors somewhat appeased, he remitted the seuerity of that his rigorous command, and sparing his life, was contented, that in de-spight and contempt of him that had sent him, he should be put to the Bastonado only: and so grieuously threatned, sent back again vnto his master. Who hauing receiued this shamefull answer, and in doubt of some further matter from that angry king, commanded new and strong garrisons to be put in all his strong holds confining vpon the Persian kingdome.

The Turkish Embassador euill entreated by the king of Persia.

1601 This troublesome yeare of Iubile thus past, the Emperor much troubled with the losse of Canisa, and in doubt of worse to come (albeit that Ibrahim Bassa, whom for all that he trusted not, did afresh intreat with him concerning peace, seeing also the great need he had of greater aid to withstand the mightie power of the [illegible]ke, with great instancie requested aid of the Pope and of the other Princes of Italie: who considering also how much it concerned the rest of the Christian common weale, to haue the frontiers of Hungary defended, condiscended vnto the Emperours request: and to the Pope with the beginning of the Spring sent him eight thousand souldiers in pay, vnder the leading of Io. Francisco Aldobrandino his nephew their Generall, who with the like charge had now serued euer since the yeare 1599: King Philip also at the instance of the Emperor gaue [illegible]der vnto the Countie Fuentes to send into Croatia certaine bands of Dutches; who by [illegible]tion from him, were forthwith conducted to Mil-laine: The great Duke of Florence, also sent vnto him two thousand souldiers, vnder the leading of Francisco de Monte; with whom also by his appointment went the Lord Io. de Me-dicis, whom Ferdinand the archduke forthwith requested for to be master of his camp: thither came also the Duke of Mantua with an honorable companie both of horse & foot, being forthwith by the Archduke made his Lieutenant Generall. And so whilest these people assembled together into Croatia, the Emperour sent also another good armie into Hungarie, drawne for most part out of Germanie, which vnder the leading of the Archduke Matthias his brother, & the Duke Mercurie his Lieutenant General, went into those parts to withstand the Turke. A third armie hee also made of the Imperials: which strengthened with the forces of Don Ferrant Gonzaga, Gouernour of the vpper Hungarie, ioyned themselues with Bassa, for the recouerie of Transyluania, out of which hee had beene of late driuen, as shall heereafter be declared.

The aid sent out of Italy vnto the emperor.

And so whilest these armies were in preparing, many hot skirmishes passed in Hungarie betwixt the Christians and the Turks, the losse falling sometime to the one side and sometime to the other. But the time now come that souldiers might wel take the field, Ibrahim Bassa being now before dead at Belgrade, whilest he was yet entreating of a dissembled peace, and Hassan one of the Visier Bassies by Mahomet appointed Generall in Hungarie in his place: yet delaying his comming, the parley for peace laied aside (as neuer indeed by the Turks intended, but only by them entertained to dallie off the time to their [illegible]e more aduantage) Duke Mercurie Generall of the Emperors forces taking the offer of so fit an opportunitie, came with his armie from Comara (where he had lien expecting the euent of the parley) and layed siege to Alba Rega-

Ibrahim Bassa dieth at Belgrade.

Alba Regalis besieged by duke Mercurie.

A Regalis, one of the chiefest and strongest cities of Hungarie: which seated in the midst of a marish, was thought almost impregnable, being hardly to be approched but by three orbs, which strongly fortified and defended by the marish, serued the citie in stead of three most sure bulwarks; within which stood also the citie it selfe, well defended with a good wall and a ditch.
This city the Duke for certaine daies continually battered, as if he had purposed at length to haue taken it by assault: but in the mean time certainly informed by a fugitiue (but lately fled out of the city) that the broad lake on the other side of the city ouer against the place where he lay, was not so deep, but that it was to be passed (contrary to the opinion both of the Turks captiues, and of the naturall inhabitants, whom he had vpon that point examined) and that the B Turks presuming vpon the strength therof, & thinking themselues on that side safe, had turned almost al their care & forces vnto that side of the city which was now by him battered, without regard of any great perill to be from the other side feared: he appointed the Lord Russ-worm with his souldiers to make proofe if the Sigeth suburbs (for so they were called) on that aforesaid side of the city so little regarded by the Turks, were not to be surprised: for that these suburbs being taken, the city could not long hold out: for the vndertaking of which enterprise, Russworm was both by the captiue Turks & country people there dwelling, much discouraged, they al with one consent affirming, That albeit he should finde no other difficulties in the C attempting therof, yet the lake it selfe was not possible to be passed: who neuertheles not altogether trusting them, sent certain of his men secretly to trie the matter: who hauing so done, brought him word, That the lake was vndoubtedly (though with much difficulty) to be passed.
Whereupon he with 1000 select souldiers with euery one of them a good faggot on his backe beside his armes, to fil vp the deepest of the marish, by night entred the same; wherein he had not gon far, but that he almost with the danger of his life found it much deeper & more troublesome than the spies had vnto him before reported: but carried with an inuincible courage himselfe, & his souldiers moued by his example, he still went on, they also following of him. It is almost a thing incredible, to tell what these aduenturous men indured, plunged in the deepe mud among the flags and bulrushes, going still vp in water and mud vnto the waste euen where the marish was the shalloweſt; where also if one missed but a step, hee was by and by ouer head & eares, and in danger to be drowned, if he were not by his fellows presently holden: yet D at length by Gods help hauing with the losse but of 6 or 7 men a little before day gotten ouer, the duke by an appointed signe aduertised therof, with greater stir and tumult than at any time before assailed that side of the city where he lay, as if euen then & there he had onely meant to haue ingaged his whole forces for the winning therof. When in the mean time the Lord Russ-worm on the other side with his resolute souldiers, with ladders prouided for the purpose scaled the wals of the suburbs, and almost vnperceiued, recouered the top therof (the Turks being at the same time wholly bent for the defence of the other side of the city, where most stir & apparent danger was) and so being got into the suburbs, with a great and terrible crie assailed the Turks, who surprised with an exceeding feare, and not wel knowing which way to turn themselues, without any great resistance fled into the city, the Christians following them at the E heels, & making of them a great slaughter. In which so great a confusion, euen where was least feared, the Duke by other his souldiers tooke the rest of the suburbs as he had before determined, the Turks there also for feare forsaking them, & retiring with all the hast they could vnto their fellows in the citie, there to liue or die together. The Christians in these suburbs, beside much other rich prey, tooke also 14 great pieces of artillerie, with good store of shot & powder. The suburbs (the greatest strength of the city) thus happily taken, the Duke againe summoned the citie, requiring to haue it deliuered vnto him: whereunto the Turks gaue no other answer but by their pieces, which they discharged vpon the Christians so persuading them to yeeld. Wherwith the Duke much displeased, sent them word, That he would send them other manner of messengers to morrow, and by Gods help sup with them in the citie, although hee were not vnto him welcome. Neither failed he of that his promise: for the next day hauing F out of the suburbs by the fury of his artillerie made two faire breaches in the city, he by the ruines thereof with great slaughter of the enemie entred the citie, albeit that the Turkes did what they might to haue defended the same, by casting down vpon the Christians as they entered; darts, wild-fire, & such like things, vsually prouided for such purpose. But seeing now no remedy, but that they must needs giue place to the fortune of their enemies, they fled amaine into their houſes, there to defend themſelues, or els to die: many of which houſes they had before of purpoſe ſo vndermined, as that they could eaſily ouerthrow them, & ſo ouerwhelm as many as ſhould come within the danger of them: which ſo ſtrange a reſolution was by many of them as deſperately performed, inſomuch that the goodly church, the palace, with many other ſumpuous buildings, were left vnto the Chriſtians all rent & torn, not much better than rude heaps of rubbidge and ſtones. Howbeit the Baſſa vpon promiſe of life, yeelded himſelfe, and was by the Duke preſently ſent vnto the camp; the reſt of the ſoldiers being (as in ſuch caſe it commonly hapneth) all or moſt of them put to the ſword. The greateſt part of the prey fell vnto the Wallons; who by heaps breaking into the richeſt houſes, not only tooke what themſelues light vpon, but ſtript the Germans alſo of ſuch things as they had by chance gotten, to their great heart-burning & griefe: yea theſe rauenous and irreligious men not ſo contented, opened the tombs of the Hungarian kings, there long before buried, to ſpoile euen the dead of ſuch things, as had for honors ſake bin long before interred with them (if haply any ſuch thing were there to be found) ſhewing themſelues therein more barbarous than the Turkes, who by the ſpace of 60 yeres hauing had the city in their poſſeſſion, had yet ſpared thoſe reuerent monuments, and ſuffered the reliques of thoſe worthy Princes to reſt in peace. Of this taking of Alba-Regalis, the Baſſa of Buda long before taken priſoner, and then lying at Vienna, hearing, abſtained from meat with his two ſeruants a whole day, proſtrate vpon his face, praying vnto his Prophet Mahomet, who had (as he ſaid) all this yere been angry with the Turks. Which had the ſiege of Caniſia taken the like effect, had then vndoubtedly been vnto them moſt vnfortunat: but God in his wiſedome ſtill tempereth the ſweet with the ſoure.

Aſſan Baſſa commeth out of ſeaſon to haue relieued Alba Regalis.

Now in the meane while was Aſſan the Viſier Baſſa and Generall of the Turks army, with ſuch ſouldiers as were already aſſembled at Belgrade, comming to haue relieued Alba-Regalis: and albeit that he vnderſtood by the way as hee marched, that the citie was by the Chriſtians won, yet held he on his intended iourny: and ſo taking with him the Baſſa of Buda with the other Sanzacks and Commanders of the townes and caſtles thereabout, had formed an army of about threeſcore thouſand ſtrong, but for moſt part raw and vnexpert ſouldiers: with which power hee ſtill held on his way towards Alba-Regalis, as well thereby to giue ſome contentment vnto the angry Sultan his Maſter, as in hope alſo to ouerthrow the Chriſtian army, or at leaſtwiſe to find the city as yet vnrepaired, and ſo to regain it. But vain was that his deſignement, eſpecially for the recouerie of the city: for that the Duke had no ſooner taken it, but that he forthwith cauſed the breaches to be repaired, and for the more aſſurance of it, put into it a ſtrong garriſon of old expert ſouldiers: and being himſelfe about twentie thouſand ſtrong, and hearing of the Baſſaes comming, ſet forward to meet him, & being come neere vnto him, began an hot and bloudie skirmiſh with him. Yet the Baſſa to proſecute his intended purpoſe for the recouerie of Alba-Regalis, the next day ſent away part of his armie, to make proofe if happily the city might yet be againe recouered; and himſelfe in the mean time with the reſt of his army offered battell vnto the Chriſtians, ſo to buſie them, that they ſhould not be able to trouble them whom he had ſent to Alba-Regalis, or to relieue the city, if it ſhould chance to be by them diſtreſſed. When as the Duke, before enformed of the baſeneſſe of the ſouldiers in the Baſſaes armie, and that although he were for number of men far aboue him, yet that for old, hardy, and expert ſouldiers he was ſtrong enough for him, valiantly went out and encountered him: and ſo euen at the firſt onſet by plaine valor diſordering the formoſt ſquadrons of the Turks battell, enforced them to retire with the loſſe of ſix thouſand men; among whom were the Baſſa of Buda, ſix Sanzacks, with diuers other Captains and Commanders of good place and marke. At which time he alſo tooke from them diuers pieces of great artillerie, and had vndoubtedly with a notable ſlaughter ouerthrowne all the reſt of the Baſſaes army had not a great ſquadron of the Tartars euen at that inſtant ſhewed themſelues at the backs of the Chriſtians, and ſo ſtaying them, giuen leiſure vnto the Baſſa again to reſtore his diſordered battell. Whereupon the Duke contenting himſelfe with the victorie he had already gotten, in good order retired again into his trenches, hauing in this conflict not loſt aboue three hundred of his people. But whileſt both armies thus lay, and new ſupplies ſtill repairing vnto them, expecting but when they ſhould come to a generall day of battell; the Ianizaries ſtill murmuring, that it was now no time of the yeare longer to keepe the field, by their importunitie enforced the Baſſa to retire to Buda, and there to diſband his armie. In which his retreat

The victorie of the Chriſtians ouer the Turkes.

The Baſſa of Buda ſlaine.

A retreat many were by the Chriſtians cut off in the taile of his armie, and a number of priſoners taken, and amongſt the reſt fiftie of the French mutiners of Pappa; whom the Archduke Mathias at the inſtance of duke Mercurie afterwards pardoned. Neither ſped they much better, that were ſent by the Baſſa to haue attempted the taking of Alba-Regalis; for being come neere thereunto, they were ſo welcommed with great ſhot out of the citie, and charged with often ſallies by the ſtrong garriſon, that ſeeing no hope to preuaile, they were glad to riſe and to returne againe vnto the Baſſa that ſent them.

About the ſame time that the duke began to beſiege Alba-Regalis, Ferdinand the Archduke hauing receiued great aid from the Pope with the other Princes of Italy and the King of Spain, and ſo now 30000 ſtrong, by the aduice of the duke of Mantua his lieutenant General, reſolued to beſiege Caniſia; which to haue again recouered out of the hands of the Turks concerned much, not them of Stiria & Auſtria only, but the other prouinces ajoining, yea and Italie it ſelfe alſo: whereupon he with his armie in good order came the tenth of September and encamped before it; the Duke of Mantua and Don Iohn de Medices with 2000 harquebuſiers and two cornets of horſe being come the day before to take view of the town, at whom the Turks made diuers ſhot, but without any harme doing. And albeit that the Turks there in garriſon (in number not paſt a thouſand, accounting amongſt them 300 of the Wallons ſomtime of the garriſon of Pappa) with their often & gallant ſallies greatly troubled the Chriſtians, and that great bands of other Turkes came many times out of the ſtrong townes and fortreſſes thereby, to skirmiſh with them, and to ſee if they could put any moe ſoldiers into the towne for the more aſſurance thereof; yet ſuch was the carefulneſſe of the Chriſtian Commanders, and valour of their ſoldiers, that the Turks both in the one place and in the other were ſtill repulſed and put to flight, with the loſſe alſo of ſome of their ſmall caſtles and forts thereabout. To approch this ſtrong towne, and to plant a batterie againſt it, ſeemed to be a matter of great difficultie, for that it was (as we haue elſwhere ſaid) enuironed round with a mariſh: yet means was found to drie it a little, and to fill it vp on the one ſide, and to come ſo neere the towne, that hauing planted three tyre of artillerie againſt it, the Chriſtians began furiouſly to batter it, beating downe both the walls, the houſes and other buildings therein. Yea at length they had brought their approches ſo neere, that they were come with their trenches euen cloſe vnto the towne ditch, perſuading the Turkes, now whileſt they might vpon good conditions, to ſurrender the towne, and ſo to ſaue their liues. Whereunto their fierce and enraged mindes were ſo farre from hearkening, that brauing the Chriſtians they ſaid, That they would in deſpight of all their forces keepe the place for their Sultan, do what they could. Whereupon the Archduke and the Duke of Mantua, by the aduice of Medices and the reſt of the principal captaines and commanders in the armie, reſolued to giue a general aſſault vnto the towne. In the mean time newes was brought into the campe of the winning of Alba-Regalis, which there made great reioycing; in ſigne whereof the Chriſtians (as their manner is) in triumph many times diſcharged their great ordnance; and by fit men perſuaded the garriſon ſouldiers in Caniſia to yeeld, and not to caſt themſelues into ſuch danger as had their fellowes at Alba-Regalis; for that in ſo doing they ſhould not onely ſaue their liues, but eaſily alſo obtaine ſuch other conditions as they could reaſonably deſire; whereas otherwiſe they ſhould to their coſt finde the Chriſtians ſtrong enough to conſtraine them, which muſt needs bring with it their vtter ruine and deſtruction. Whereunto the Garriſon ſouldiours (amongſt whome the renegare Wallons were the chiefe) contemptuouſly anſwered, That they little feared ſuch weake aſſailants: and with great crie and ſcorne commaunding the meſſengers to depart, in token of their confidence, as alſo not to ſeeme inferiour vnto the Chriſtians, oftentimes to ſmall purpoſe diſcharged their great ordnance, as had the Chriſtians the day before. Now though the walls of the towne were with continual batterie ſore ſhaken, and the breaches almoſt laid open; yet was the intended aſſault for a while delaied, vntill the bridges might be made that were to be layd ouer the towne ditch for the Chriſtians to paſſe ouer vpon. But all things (as was thought) now in a readineſſe, and the Florentines with ſome other of the Italians (whoſe lot it was to giue the firſt aſſault) being come forward, the bridge whereby they were to paſſe the towne ditch, was found both too ſhort and too weake for them to get ouer vnto the other ſide by: ſo that ſinking vnder them, not the ſouldiers only, but euen the Commaunders themſelues (and namely Herberſteine) were in great danger to haue been loſt. By which

which means they hindered, & the enemies murthering pieces continually flanking them, and C their musketiers stil playing vpon the afront, they were enforced to retire, leauing behind them 300 of their men s[illegible]. Yet were not the Christian commanders any thing therewith discouraged, but being generally resolued not to giue ouer that they had taken in hand, vntil they had brought it to effect, began to make such prouision as they knew to be needfull to preserue their army vnder, against the violence of the winter weather, as also to hinder that no victual might be brought vnto the towne, so by famin at length to enforce the Turks and Wallons to yeeld:
who although they were alreadie pinched with wants, insomuch that horse-flesh was daintie cheere with them; yet for all that they nothing abated of their woonted fiercenesse, but being againe required to yeeld, vouchsafed not to answer them one word, but in stead thereof shooke H their naked swords afar off at them, in token of their vndanted courage. But yet for all this resolution of the commanders for the continuance of the siege, Aldobrandino General of the Italians being now a little before dead of an old infirmitie that he had, the Italians began at the first some few of them secretly to withdraw themselues out of their quarter: but afterward by greater numbers to depart, and so to returne againe into their country; alledging for their excuse want both of pay and victuals. But the rest better minded, vnderstanding that the Turkes were risen from before Alba-Regalis, and the rest of their armie disbanded, began to enter into new hope by some deuice or other to passe the ditch, and so by force to take the towne: and the rather, for that they were by a French fugitiue enformed both of the weakenesse & wants of the besieged. Whereupon they began afresh to make new engines for the approching of the I walls, without danger of the enemies ordnance any more to flanke them. At which time also, viz. the fourth of Nouember the Lord Russworm came vnto the campe, sent thither from duke Mercury with 8000 soldiers, after that Hassan Bassa had broke vp his army: by whose comming they were also the more encouraged to prosecute that they had taken in hand. Neither failed the Turks in the meane time with often sallies to trouble the Christians; attempting aboue all things to haue fired their tents, for that so lying open [illegible]hat so cold a season of the yeare they must thereby of necessity be enforced to raise their siege and be gon. But the successe of these their so great designes was not answerable to their hopes, being still to their losse beaten backe into the towne by the Christians: whom it behooued to looke well about them, for that the besieged desperatly set, and all resolued rather to die than to yeeld, aduentured themselues to all dangers, neuer ceasing to do what they might to put the Christians out of hope for winning K the towne. But whilest the Turks with d[illegible]btfull and as it were desperat hope so defend the place, and the Christians growne stronger i[illegible]e comming of their friends, lay in hope to win the same; lo, in the later end of Nouember, the North winde accompanied with a deep snow so furiously raged, that it ouerthrew the greatest part of the tents and pauilions of the Christians, and as it were buried their whole armie in the snow and yce, in such wise, as that in Ferdi- nand the Archdukes campe (being reasonably well prouided for) were 1500 men with 300 horses starued and frozen to death. At which time the state of them that came with the Lord Russworm was most miserable; who wearied with the siege of Alba-Regalis, and as it were spent with the dirtie trauell of the deepe way, had not brought with them their tents or other prouision, and were therefore enforced to lie abroad in so cold and vnseasonable a time: with L whose miseries although their good General was much grieued, yet to do the Christian commonweale seruice, he with them right patiently endured. In which so great an extremitie, the Archduke with the rest of the commanders vpon view taken, wel considering what smal hope there was in good time to take the towne, the vnreasonablenesse of the Winter weather still more and more encreasing; thought it better betime to rise, than longer to expose their army vnto most certaine destruction, either of the enemie or the cold. Which was done with such haste and confused tumult, as that their rising seemed rather an hastie flight, than honourable departure; leauing behinde them for haste their great ordnance, with their tents and baggages; a common voice still running, That they were well if they might but saue themselues: so that the soldiers euery man mindfull but of himselfe, and in feare to be pursued by the enemie, no M man chasing them, fled, but stil accompanied with such f[illegible]rious winds, snow, and extreme cold, that with all the labor they could take they could get the[illegible] no heat, but fell downe to the earth many of them frozen, and so once falling, neuer rose more, being vnable for want of heate to helpe themselues: in which case they were not to expect for helpe from others, euery man ha-

The Christians by tempest and extreamitie of weather enforced to giue ouer the siege of Canisia.

A uing enough to doe to looke vnto himselfe: so that vpon the way whereby the armie went thus dispersed with the weather, lay aboue fiue hundred dead of cold, beside foure hundred others left sicke in the forsaken trenches, who forthwith after the departure of the armie were thought to haue beene all put to the sword by them of the garrison of Camsia.

But hauing thus passed through these troubles of Hungarie, it is time now also to looke backe againe into the frontier countries of Transyluania and Valachia; which to haue kept in the Emperors obeisance, and so preserued as a liuely member of the Christian commonweale no lesse concerned him, than the keeping of any other his frontier territories, which are many. Michael the Vayuod of Valachia, the last yeare for his crueltie first driuen out of Transyl-B uania by Basta, and afterwards out of Valachia by the great Chancellor of Polonia (as is aforesaid) and another placed in his stead; as a man forsaken euen of his owne better fortunes, and not well knowing which way to turn himselfe, thought it best now at last to submit himselfe vnto the Emperor, if so happily by his meanes he might in some sort repaire his broken estate, and so at leastwise recouer his gouernment in Valachia. So resolued, he set forward, and in the beginning of this yeare, viz. the three and twentieth of Ianuarie, with fiue and thirtie of his followers and six coaches arriued at Prague, where he was by the Emperors appointment honourably receiued, and his cost at the Emperors charge defraied. Vnto whom he excused himselfe of the seueritie by him vsed in Transyluania (the cause of those late troubles in that country) as enforced therunto by the stubbornesse of the Transyluanians themselues, whom C he found still enclined to rebellion, & vnwilling to be commanded by any but by themselues.
Which his excuse (as true) was wel admitted, and he with all kindnesse vsed. Now at this same time Basta lying also in Transyluania, as Gouernor for the Emperor, right slenderly accompanied (as is before also declared) the parliament at Clausenburg beeing ended, and all controuersies (as was thought) well composed, now without feare one night, the watch beeing set, went to bed to take his rest, where he had not long lien, but that certaine of the Transyluanian Lords, among whom the Chiaki was chiefe, came with their followers, and surprising the watch, and entering the Pallace, brake into the chamber where he lay, took him out of his bed, and so kept him prisoner all that night. And the next morning going forth, about twelue miles off met with Sigismund Bathor their late Prince, before secretly by them called in, whom they D honourably conducted to Clausenburg, and there deliuered vnto him Basta, the late Gouernor for the Emperor, whom he commanded to be cast into yrons: and so going to the palace, gaue like order for the apprehending and safe keeping of the rest of the nobilitie also, such as had taken part with Basta in the behalfe of the Emperour. For now the Transyluanians were diuided into three parts: whereof the one stood for the Emperor; the second for Istuan Bathor (pretending, that vnto him belonged the soueraignetie of that Prouince) but the third and farre the greatest, for Sigismund their antient Lord and leader, who now by meanes of the King of Po-lonia reconciled vnto the great Turke, and in this troublesome time by his fauourits called againe into his countrey, was by them ioyfully receiued at Alba-Iulia, Clausenburg, and the rest of the chiefe cities of Transyluania. Who now thereof againe possessed, for the better E assuring of his estate forthwith writ vnto the Emperor what had happened, requesting him to content himselfe, that hee was desirous of his loue and fauour, promising to bee alwayes his good friend and neighbour, and for euer to keepe good amitie with him: giuing Basta also (whom he had now at the intercession of certaine great friends againe enlarged) to vnderstand, That he was forthwith to depart from all the places belonging vnto his principality, as also to cease from further molesting of his people that were now voluntarily againe returned vnto his obedience: which his request was neither of the one, nor of the other much regarded or hearkened vnto: For the Emperour vpon the first aduertisement of this so great an alteration in Transyluania, calling vnto him Michael the Vayuod (not so much troubled with the strangenesse of the matter, as for that his wife and sonne, whome hee had left as hostages with Basta, were now come into the hands of the Transyluanians his mortall enemies) and satisfy-F ing him in many things that hee had before requested, tooke order with him, That with all conuenient speed returning home againe into Valachia, where hee was now much longed for (the people generally disliking of the simple Vayuod, by the great Chancellor set ouer them) and gathering together such power as he could, he should ioyne himselfe with Basta his Lieutenant Generall, vnto whom he had alreadie sent great companies both of horse and foot the Imperials, if they should in any thing shew themselues obstinate against them; submitted themselues wholly to the courtesie of Basta, so that the places were but few that yet held out for the Prince Sigismund: who in the meane time was doing what he might for the raising of a new army (hauing not altogether with this late ouerthrow forthwith also lost his hope) by the help of the Turks, Tartars,and Polonians,to recouer again the possession of his state, and by force of armes to chase out the Imperials. But he being brought to so low an ebbe,and almost all the country of Transyluania possessed by Basta,who would not haue thought but that now after so long trauels it would haue remained wholly at the Emperors deuotion? and so many, that thought themselues to see much,said assuredly it would. But see the change, and what E themselues,than in disliking to morrow what they best liked to day,foolish,senceleſſe,impro-uident,rash,headstrong,violent,and aboue all things mutable, and vnconstant. So now for all that Basta had done for the assurance of this countrie vnto the Emperor (being so much as most men thought to haue bin sufficient,and indeed as much as was possible for him to do) euen in the winding vp of this yeare 1601, the Transyluanians vnderstanding that Sigismund with a great army of Polonians,Turks,& Tartars,was now comming against the Imperials,most part of them presently tooke vp armes in his fauour; saying, That their first oath voluntarily giuen vnder his obeisance. Whereupon the Vayuod forthwith returning into Valachia, and assembling about ten thousand of his friends, all good and expert souldiers, went to seeke for Basta as he had with the Emperour agreed; whom he found ready in the field with about twentie thousand horse, but newly departed from Veradinum: where mustering their army, they with their vnited forces entred into Transyluania, there to put in execution what the Emperor had commanded. Where the Vayuod in disdaine of the people which loued him not, with fire and sword wasted all the country before him as he went: not without the great discontentment of Basta, to whom it seemed not good to make desolat that country which he was in good hope should in short time be his Lord and Masters the Emperours. But Sigismund vnderstanding both of the comming of his enemies, and of the harme they did in his countrey, rise from Solnock, where he lay encamped with his army, and so to hinder their further proceeding went to meet them: howbeit being come so neere vnto them as that hee might well discouer them, he would not come to the triall of a battell with them, which was by them offered; but fortified himselfe in his trenches, so seeking but to delay the time vntill the comming of the Tartars, which were to haue come vnto him from the Chancellor of Polonia, as also of six thousand Turks to haue been sent him from the Bassa of Belgrade. Where hauing afterward vnderstood that the passage of the Tartars to haue bin sent him, was stayed by Don Ferrant Gonzaga the Emperors Lieutenant in the vpper Hungarie; & that the Turkes staying at Giula, would come no farther except they had their pay before hand: finding him- I selfe too weake with his owne power to encounter with his enemies, he rise with his armie, with purpose to haue retired a little backe, and to haue taken certaine strait passages whereby the enemy must needs passe, so by the aduantage of the place to haue holpen his owne weake strength. But Basta and the Vayuod perceiuing his rising (whereunto they were still attentiue) followed him with such speed, that they ouertooke him before hee could get thither, and so hardly pressed him, that needs he must turn his face and ioyne battell, or els suffer his people altogether like beasts to be slaine. In which doing, albeit that neither he nor his failed to doe what was by men to be done for the obtaining of a notable victorie, yet such was the valour of the souldiers of Basta and the Vayuod, that in a great fight hauing disordered his footmen, they put them to flight, and so cut them all in pieces. Which the Prince beholding, and not able to K remedy the matter, betime fled with his horsmen from the fury of his enemies, and so retired to the vttermost confines of Transyluania, hauing in this battell lost ten thousand of his faithful souldiers. Whereupon Claudiopolis and diuers other cities and townes of that countrey, returned againe vnto the Emperors obeisance.

Sigismund ouerthrown by Basta & the Vayuod, flieth out of Transyluania

In the prosecuting of this victory, the Vayuod to satisfie the hatred he had of long borne against the Transyluanians, did what spoile he could, vtterly wasting all the places whereby he passed: which Basta not liking, requested him to vse his victory with more modestie, and to haue more respect to what he did, especially vnto such places or persons as of themselues returned vnto the Emperours obeisance. Whereunto he proudly answered, That he would doe what he thought good, without his appointment or the Emperours either, especially in that L country which he had now with his own sword twice conquered: & that therfore Basta might command them that were by him to be commanded, as for himselfe he acknowledged no soueraigntie that either Basta or the Emperor had ouer him. Vnto which his so presumptuous a speech Basta replied not, but yet much therewith discontented, began to enter into a great suspition from what ground those his hautie conceits (easily by his words to be gathered) might grow. And so from that time better obseruing his proceedings, perceiued him to haue intelligence with the Turkes, with purpose to ioyne hands with them, that so by their help chasing the Imperials out of Transyluania, he might hold it to himselfe as tributarie to the Othoman Emperour, of all others best able to defend him. Which to bee true (beside diuers other strong presumptions) he certainly vnderstood by certain letters of his written to that purpose, M intercepted by his souldiers and brought vnto him: whereupon he became verie pensiue and heauy, for the great power the Vayuod was of in those countries, as also for the great strength he had euen then present about him, and wherewith he was as it were then guarded. So consulting with certaine of his Colonels and chiefe Commanders of his armie, what were best to be done in that dangerous a case, whereof so much depended: A Wallon captaine offered himselfe

A himselfe to go into the Vayuod his campe, and there in his owne tent to kill him as a traitour. Which his offer well liked off, and he as ready to performe as he was to promise, going into the Vayuods camp accompanied with some threescore men, and finding him in his tent, boldly stepping to him, willed him to yeeld himselfe the Emperours prisoner: whereat he beeing about to lay his hand vpon his scimitar, the Wallon captaine with an halbard thrust him into the breast, at which very instant another with a sword at one blow claue his head down to the shoulders. An vnworthy death for so worthy a captain, had not ambition (the torment of great spirits) carried him too high with the wings of immoderat desire, beyond the bounds of loyalty and reason. But there he lieth now dead among his friends, whom the great Turke somtime more feared euen in his palace at Constantinople, than he did al the rest of the Emperors com-B manders. Presently vpon his death a great tumult and hurly burly was raised by the souldiers in his camp: but Basta forthwith shewing himselfe with all his souldiers in armes, and withall producing the letters declaring the treason by the Vayuod contriued with the Bassa of Temeswar against the Emperor, all was againe appeased: but especially for that his souldiers now saw themselues without an head, and too weake also for the Imperials there present and already in armes. In the Vayuods tent were also other letters found, so plainly declaring his secret colluson with the Turke, and treason against the Emperor, that the Valachians who at the first were wonderfully moued with his death, and hearing the same read, rested not now only contented, but said moreouer, that he was worthily slaine, and that if they had knowne him to haue had any such traiterous purpose, they would themselus long before haue taken of C him deserued punishment. Now vnto his souldiers Basta offered, at their choice, either to depart whither they would without danger; or els taking the oath of obedience vnto the Emperour, to enter into his; pay which most part of them did. The tumult appeased, the dead body of the Vayuod was layed out a whole day for the souldiers to gaze vpon, and so afterward buried. So lieth he, that but of late, and many times before, had so fortunatly ouerthrown his enemies; vnhappie man himselfe now ouerthrowne by his owne ambition and vncon-stancie.

Michael the Vayuod slaine.

Basta now deliuered of the great feare he had before of the Vayuod, what by force, what by agreement, in short time took in most part of the country: for that the Transyluanians seeing the small power of Sigismund, & well comforted with the death of Michael the Vayuod so much of them hated; as also to auoid the dangers euen presently hanging ouer their heads from the Imperials, if they should in any thing shew themselues obstinate against them; submitted themselues wholly to the courtesie of Basta, so that the places were but few that yet held out for the Prince Sigismund: who in the meane time was doing what he might for the raising of a new army (hauing not altogether with this late ouerthrow forthwith also lost his hope) by the help of the Turks, Tartars, and Polonians, to recouer again the possession of his state, and by force of armes to chase out the Imperials. E themselues, than in disliking to morrow what they best liked to day, foolish, senceless, improuident, rash, headstrong, violent, and aboue all things mutable, and vnconstant. So now for all that Basta had done for the assurance of this countrie vnto the Emperor (being so much as most men thought to haue bin sufficient, and indeed as much as was possible for him to do) euen in the winding vp of this yeare 1601, the Transyluanians vnderstanding that Sigismund with a great army of Polonians, Turks, & Tartars, was now comming against the Imperials, most part of them presently tooke vp armes in his fauour; saying, That their first oath voluntarily giuen vnto him as their naturall Prince & Gouernor, was more to be respected than any other afterwards by force extorted from them by a forrein Prince. The Bassa of Agria ouerthrown by Ferrans Gonzaga.

But whilest his state thus turneth vpside downe in Transyluania, the Bassa of Agria going out with ten thousand Turkes in hope to haue surprised Toccaie (a strong hold of the Christians in the vpper Hungarie) was encountered by Ferrant Gonzaga the Emperours Lieutenant there, and by him ouerthrowne, and with great slaughter of his Turks chased to the gates of Agria. H

Now was Mahomet the Turkish Emperor this yeare also no lesse troubled with the proceedings of the Scriuano in Caramania and Natolia, than with the euill successe of his affaires in Transyluania and Hungarie. For the Scriuano by his last yeares victorie growne into great credit with the common people, and still by them more and more followed; to maintain the reputation of his credit, came now again this yere with a great power into the field, to meet with Mahomet the great Bassa and Generall of the Turks armie; who with fiftie thousand good soldiers (a power thought sufficient to haue represt him) was ready to encounter him. With whom the Scriuano ioyning battel, in a great fight cut in sunder a great part of the Bassa's army, and so became master of the field, forraged all the countries adioining almost as far as Aleppo;
still calling the people vnto libertie, and causing himselfe to be proclaimed the true defender of the Mahometane Faith, and of the libertie of those countries with him combined: in such I sort, as that it now stood the great Turke vpon to send another great armie to the aid of Ma- homet the discomfited Bassa. With whom also the Scriuano (presuming of his former fortune) comming to a day of battell, and ouercharged with the multitude of his enemies, was at the first encounter with his people put to the worse: but forthwith by his good direction hauing repaired his disordered battell, and thereby giuen as it were new courage to his fainting soul-diers, he with a great slaughter disordered also the Bassaes armie. Yet hauing not any other firme state or stay to rest vpon, more than the fauour and reputation he held with these his rebellious followers, of whom he had now lost a great many, he thought it not best to aduen-

The Ianizaries in mutinie at Constantinople.

Beside all which former troubles, the plague also this yeare sore raged both in Constantinople and many other places of the Turkish empire. At which time also the Ianizaries at Constantinople hauing receiued some disgrace by some of the great Sultans fauorits, & with great insolencie requiring to haue their heads, caused their Aga well accompanied presumptuously to enter into the Seraglio to preferre this their request: whom Mahomet to the terror of the rest, caused for his presumption to be taken into the midst of the Spahi, and so by them to be cut in pieces; which was not done without the great slaughter of the Spahi themselues also, slaine by the Ianizaries. Whereupon the other Ianizaries arising vp in arms also, and euen now ready to haue reuenged the death of their captaine, were yet by the wisedome of Cicala Bassa, bestowing amongst them a great summe of money, againe appeased, without further harm doing. Which their so great insolencie Mahomet imputing vnto their excessiue drinking of wine, contrary to their law of the great Prophet; by the persuasion of the Mufti, commanded al such as had any Wine in their houses in the citie of Constantinople and Pera, vpon paine of death to bring it out and to staue it, except the Embassadours of the Queenes Maiestie of England, the French king, and of the State of Venice: so that as some report, wine for a space ran downe the channels of the streets in Constantinople, as if it had beene water after a great shower of raine.

1602 Sigismund the Transyluanian prince now of late againe possessed of Transyluania (as is before declared) could not yet well assure himselfe of the keeping thereof: for that he with the Transyluanians of his faction alone, was not able to withstand the force of Bassa; who still strengthened with new supplies both of men and all things else necessarie for the wars from the

A the Emperor, was now with a great power alreadie entred into Transyluania: the Polonians busied in the warres of Sueuia, and the Turks with their other greater affaires, neither of them sending him their promised aid, the greatest hope and stay of himselfe in that newnesse of his estate. Wherefore seeing himselfe euery day to lose one place or other, and fearing also lest his souldiers for want of pay should in short time quite forsake him and goe ouer to Bassa; he thought it best betimes and whilest he had yet something left, and was not yet altogether become desperat, otherwise to prouide for his estate, especially hauing small trust in the Turks, to whom he had been before so great an enemie. Wherefore he dealt with Bassa for a truce or B for some good attonement. Wherewith Bassa beeing content, and the Embassadors sent, the matter was so handled with the Emperor, that Sigismund to make an end of all these troubles, was contented to the behoofe of his Imperiall Maiestie, to resigne vnto Bassa his Lieutenant all such places as he yet held in Transyluania, vpon much like conditions he had about three yeares before made with him: and so in all, and for all, to submit himselfe vnto his Maiestie.
Which intended surrender of the Princes being bruted in Transyluania, Zachel Moises his Lieutenant (& now in field with the Princes forces) not able to endure or to heare that that noble Prouince should again fall into the hands of the Germans; encouraging his souldiers, went vpon the sudden to assaile Bassa, in hope to haue found him vnprouided, & so discomfiting his C armie, to haue driuen the Imperials quite out of Transyluania: but he an old and expert Commander, perceiuing euen the first mouing of the Transyluanians, with great celeritie put his armie in good order, and so ioyned battell with them: wherein he with the losse of some fiue Zachell Moises ouerthrown by Bassa.
hundred men ouerthrew Moyses, with his armie of Transyluanians, Turks, and Tartars hauing slaine aboue three thousand of them, and put the rest to flight: Moyses himselfe with some few others being now glad to take their refuge into the frontiers of the Turks territories towards Temeswar. But when Sigismund vnderstood what his Lieutenant had without his knowledge done, he in token of his owne innocencie went himselfe vnto the Imperial camp, accompanied only with certain of his gentlemen, and there vnto Bassa excused himselfe of that which was by his Lieutenant against his will, and without his priuitie done; frankly offering to performe whatsoeuer was on his part to be performed, according to the agreement made betwixt the D Emperor and him. And so presently calling his garrisons out of all such strong places as were yet for him holden, he surrendred them to Bassa; & so forthwith honorably accompanied, put himselfe vpon his way towards the Emperor. After whose departure out of Transyluania, all that Prouince voluntarily and without more adoe yeelded to Bassa as to the Emperors Lieutenant: who presently called an assemblie of all the Nobilitie of the countrie, taking of them an oath for their obedience and loyaltie vnto the Emperor. Thus by the wisedome and prow-esse of this worthy commander, is the country of Transyluania once againe brought vnder the Emperors obeisance; a matter of far greater importance, than to haue woon the strongest citie the Turke holdeth in Hungarie.

Great troubles in Valachia.

But whilest these things thus passed in Transyluania, great troubles arise in Valachia (the E countrie next adioyning) for that the people of that Prouince not able longer to endure the great insolencie of the Turks (who after the death of Michael had by their power made one Jeremias Vayuod there) by a generall consent tooke vp armes, and proclaiming one Radoll (a fauorit of the Emperors) Vayuod, chased Jeremias (before placed by the Turks) quite out of the country: who flying vnto Simon Palatine of Moldauia, his friend, by his means and the helpe of the Turkes, returning vnto Valachia, draue out thence Radoll againe: who beeing now at this present with Bassa, with about ten thousand Valachians his followers, earnestly requested of him (now that hee was so quietly possessed of Transyluania) to helpe him with his forces for the recouerie of Valachia. And Bassa well considering how much it concerned the quiet and sure keeping of the possession of Transyluania for the Emperour, to haue that so neere a Prouince to friend, easily yeelded to his request; and gaue him a great F Reglment of his old approoued souldiers, and so sent him away to recouer his estate: with whome (at his enterance into Valachia) the Moldauian meeting with a great power both of his owne and of the Turks, come thither in the fauour of Hieremias, there was fought betwixt them a most terrible and bloudie battell, the glorie whereof fell vnto Radoll, hee carrying whose departure Sigismund without resistance entring the country, was of the people in gene- G rall ioyfully receiued as their most lawfull Prince and soueraigne, and all the honor done vnto him that was by them possible: in which his so princely, but dangerous estate, now twice in lesse than the space of one yeare by him regained, and yet thereof no whit assured, we will for a while leaue him, to ioy therein with his subiects.

The Bassa of Agria ouerthrown by Ferrant Gonzaga.

But whilest his state thus turneth vpside downe in Transyluania, the Bassa of Agria going out with ten thousand Turkes in hope to haue surprised Toccaie (a strong hold of the Christians in the vpper Hungarie) was encountered by Ferrant Gonzaga the Emperours Lieutenant there, and by him ouerthrowne, and with great slaughter of his Turks chased to the gates
of Agria. H

Now was Mahomet the Turkish Emperor this yeare also no lesse troubled with the proceedings of the Scriuano in Caramania and Natolia, than with the euill successe of his affaires in Transyluania and Hungarie. For the Scriuano by his last yeares victorie growne into great credit with the common people, and still by them more and more followed, to maintain the reputation of his credit, came now again this yere with a great power into the field, to meet with Mahomet the great Bassa and Generall of the Turks armie; who with fiftie thousand good soldiers (a power thought sufficient to haue represt him) was ready to encounter him. With whom the Scriuano ioyning battel, in a great fight cut in sunder a great part of the Bassa's army, and so became master of the field, forraged all the countries adioining almost as far as Aleppo;
still calling the people vnto libertie, and causing himselfe to be proclaimed the true defender of the Mahometane Faith, and of the libertie of those countries with him combined: in such I sort, as that it now stood the great Turke vpon to send another great armie to the aid of Ma- homet the discomfited Bassa. With whom also the Scriuano (presuming of his former fortune) comming to a day of battell, and ouercharged with the multitude of his enemies, was at the first encounter with his people put to the worse: but forthwith by his good direction hauing repaired his disordered battell, and thereby giuen as it were new courage to his fainting soul-diers, he with a great slaughter disordered also the Bassaes armie. Yet hauing not any other firme state or stay to rest vpon, more than the fauour and reputation he held with these his rebellious followers, of whom he had now lost a great many, he thought it not best to aduenture too farre (not knowing how presently to repaire his losses) but contenting himselfe with

After which victorie Radell recouered againe the soueraignetie of Valachia, for which he was beholding to Basta: and shortly after with the same aid cut in pieces a great power of the Tartars, that were comming to haue aided the Moldauian.

Troubles in Hungarie.

Now in the meane time in Hungarie also passed many an hot skirmish betwixt the Christians and the Turks, whose garrisons at Buda and in other places in the lower Hungarie, attempting to haue surprised Alba-Regalis, & discouered by the Christians, were with great slaughter enforced to retire. At which time also, Countie Serinus vnderstanding by his espials, that the Turks with two hundred waggons with munition and victuals were going to Cantsia, vpon the sudden set vpon them, and hauing slaine and put to flight the conuoy that guarded them, carried the waggons with all that was in them away with him. And shortly after, the free Haiducks of Comara in a great party going out towards Buda to seek after booty, & hauing taken threescore Turkes prisoners, and so with them about to haue returned home; vnderstanding by the way, that Ali sometime the Bassa of Buda, and now Gouernour of Pesth, was with a small retinue about to come downe the riuer Danubius from Buda towards Belgrade, there to meet the Visier Bassa, but then comming into Hungarie; they slew all the prisoners, and hauing got two small boats, about fifteene miles beneath Buda lay in wait for the Bassa: who according to their expectation comming downe the riuer, was by these aduenturers fiercely assailed, and of his thirty followers hauing foureteene slaine, being himselfe also shot in two places of his bodie, was there with a great bootie taken, and so brought to Comara, and shortly after presented vnto Matthias the Archduke at Vienna: who amongst other things, certainly enformed, that Hassan Bassa was with a great armie by the commandement of the great Sultan Mahomet comming to besiege Alba-Regalis, and that hee was now vpon his way as farre as Belgrade; presently sent thither the Countie Ysolan Gouernour thereof, who with much adoe got into the citie, the Turks hauing already taken all the passages, to haue hindered the Christians from putting in either men or munition, more than was therein alreadie. Howbeit the Countie now got in there, and being no lesse good engineer than a valiant Commander, caused all them in the citie to labor vpon the rampiers: so that beside the naturall situation thereof, which was very strong, he had in short time so fortified it, as that in most mens iudgement it seemed a place almost impregnable. This Ali Bassa was sometime the great Turks butler, but after the taking of Agria, made Bassa of Buda; which great place hee held but three moneths, being by the enuie and ambition of some, but especially of Amurath Bassa, remooued thence, and made Gouernour of Pesth: from whence now going downe the Riuer to Belgrade, it was his fortune to be thus taken by the Haiducks, vnto whom he offered for his ransome three hundred thousand Sultanines; and had with him when he was taken seuentie thousand Duckats.

Ali Bassa taken prisoner.

A great ransome offered by Ali Bassa.

Mahomet the great Sultan not a little troubled with the losse of Alba-Regalis (taken from him by the Christians the last yeare) and now resolued for the recouerie of the same, to ingage if need should be a great part of his forces; had caused an armie of an hundred and fiftie thousand strong, to meet at Hadrianople for that purpose, vnder the leading of Hassan Bassa one of the chiefe Visiers, to be sent into Hungarie. Who by the way of Belgrade comming to Buda, and from thence to Alba-Regalis, there the twelfth of August incamped (as he had oftentimes before threatned) with the multitude of his tents couering all the countrie round about, as if it had bin a white snow: where hauing well entrenched himselfe, & planted his artillerie, hee began a most terrible & furious battery, in such sort as if he had not meant to haue made a breach only, but to haue beaten the citie euen from the face of the earth, which seemed now to tremble vnder his feet, and the clouds to rend with the thundring of his great ordnance: & for that the marish and deep ditches were a great let vnto his men for to come vnto the assault, he caused them with the number of his pioners to be filled vp (a worke thought almost impossible) & so brought on his men to assault the counterscarf, which the gouernor had caused to be made before the city for better defence therof: which assault cost him much bloud, by reason of the wonderful valor of the defendãts: yet in the end the great number of the Turks preuailing, the Christians were inforced to forsake it & retire into the city: but shortly after sallying out again, they Alba-Regalis besieged by the Turkes.

they with such force assailed the Turkes now got within the counterscarse, that hauing slaine most part of them that were entred, they forced the other out againe: at the brute wherof, an alarm being raised throughout the camp, infinit numbers of the barbarous enemies came running thither with such sauage fury, that without regard of their liues they as desperate men pressing still on, fell twice as many as before: insomuch that the Christians weary of that long and bloudy fight, & on euery side charged or rather ouerwhelmed with the enemies shot, were glad againe, but not without great losse to abandon the place. With which skirmishes and diuers others that they had, the number of the defendants was greatly diminished, to keepe a weake citie, shewing as yet the ruins of the late siege, when it was by the Christians woon; the breaches therof being but euil repaired, & the mines yet gaping, requiring great & strong fortifications to hold out and endure any long siege against so puissant an enemie. Yet was not the courage of the valiant County Ysolan the Italian Gouernor, any whit therwith abated, but by his letters gaue the Archduke Matthias to vnderstand in what case things stood with them in the city; requesting him with al speed to send him relefe, for that otherwise the city, so weakely both manned & fortified, would be in danger to be lost; many of the garrison soldiers being already slain in the defence thereof, and diuers of the Hungarians forsaking the wals, daily flying vnto the Turks campe; promising yet neuertheless himselfe to do the vttermost of his deuoir. Vpon the receit of which letters, the Archduke gaue order vnto the lord Russworm (master of the campe) to go forthwith to Comara, & there with such forces as were from diuers places come thither, to goe forth and to prooue if by any meanes the weake garrison of Alba-Regalis might so be relieued, by putting in some good supply of fresh soldiers. According to which command, Russworm comming thither, without delay tooke the field with 12000 men which he found there, to see if he might with them, put into the city the desired relefe. But whilest the matter was in the performance therof too long delaid, by discord arising betwixt him and the other colonels, about the maner of relieuing the town, the Bassa had time to effect his purpose; who the 28 of the same moneth of August, after a long and terrible batterie, caused a generall assault to be giuen vnto the citie: which the Turkes from time to time renuing, continued all that day and the next night, with some part of the day following also, without ceasing: so that the defendants now much weakned, and they also that were left, so wearied or wounded, as that they were not well able to make any longer resistance (and the countie himselfe, who gaue as it were life vnto them all, being now also carried away dangerously hurt in the thigh with a musket shot) there was a signe of parly giuen vnto the enemy: which the Bassa granting, and the fury of the assault staid, certaine of the chiefe captains and commanders in the citie, going vnto the Gouernor, put him in mind of the weakenesse of the place, of the force of the enemie, of the number of his most valiant men slain, of the want of the defendants. They had (as they said) done enough for their honor, hauing endured so many and so great assaults, in a place not defencible: & enough to discharge their fidelitie, hauing holden it out to the vttermost of their power. That they could do no more than they had done, being not relieued; and that the same bond which bound them to defend the place, bound the Emperor also to relieue them, seeing that otherwise it was not in their power to maintain it. That they had, with the losse of their liues and bloud, shewed their fidelitie vnto the Emperor, no sufficient armie appearing from him (according to his promise) for their succor. That to fight any longer was but to encrease the glory of their enemies, and their owne losses: seeing that after they had don what they possibly could, exposed to a thousand dangers, they should neuertheles be vanquished, and the citie taken. That the same consideration which carried valiant minds vnto the effects of honour when they are relieued with hope, dissuaded them being out of all hope of any happy end of their troubles: & to lose themselus to no purpose, was as great a signe of folly, as to let slip a faire opportunity, was a signe of cowardise. That they were to expect nothing but extreame miserie, if the enemy should againe force them; the breaches being so broad, as whereby they might easily enter: and their own best men slain, that should keep them out. And that therefore he should do well, to come to some good composition with the enemy, whilest they had yet something to yeeld vp vnto him, and that he stood in some feare of them; & not to expect, whilst they were spoiled of al means, either to resist him by force, or to bind him by courtesie: nothing remaining for them in the place, but death, if they should obstinatly stand to-

A long and terrible assault.

Reasons whereby the besieged captains perswaded the Gouernor to yeeld the citie.

to the defence thereof; nor no way left to saue their liues, but by yeelding.

With these persuasions the Gouernour moued, came to a parley with the Bassa, being right glad thereof; as well knowing that a towne besieged comming to a parley, is commonly more than halfe woon: and glad by any means to gain it, for that therof depended the assurance both of his head and honour: where after some short talke it was agreed, That the County should yeeld the towne into the hands of the Bassa, with all the great ordnance, and other warlike munition therein: and that the countie with his garrison, should with bag & baggage in safety depart with their armes, by the suburbs leading toward Rab; and with a good conuoy in safety to be brought halfe way thither: This capitulation agreed vpon, and by the Bassa and the county signed, euery man assured himselfe of the Bassaes faith, and thereon rested. But what faith is to be expected from a faithlesse man? Vpon the first brute of this composition, yea and before it was altogether well concluded; whilest the merchants in the towne were seeking for waggons to carry their merchandise, and the souldiers for horses to carrie their baggage, the scarcenesse thereof bred a great confusion and stir among the people; as commonly it falleth out in things done in haste, but especially where men for safegard of their liues, in their flight for haste fall into a thousand errors: so whilest some in this hurly burly were quarrelling about their horses and carriages, and other some were opening the gates to be gone; others were as busie in robbing and pilfering the baggages of their captaines and companions; miserable men, who all appointed for a prey vnto the greedy and mercilesse Turks, yet fel to preying one vpon another. Which disorders encouraged the rest of the souldiers to fall to pillage all also, some loading themselues with such goods as the merchants had for lacke of carriages left behind them; and other some euen with the goods of their owne captaines: which the souldiers appointed for defence of the breaches seeing, left their charge, and came thronging into the towne, & thrust themselues in amongst the pilferers, as if the pillage of the towne had bin vnto them by triumphant victory assured, and that they themselues had bin victors, and not men vanquished. The Tartars lodged at the foot of the breach, seeing it forlaken, and without any great strength to defend it, let not this opportunitie slip, but pressing on without any great resistance, entred the same; and so in a trice full thirtie thousand of them [illegible]st into the towne, and there surprised the vanquished Christians, at once loaded with prey, feare, and despaire. After whome, euen by the same breach, the Turks entered also, to be partakers of the spoile: so that in a moment the town was full of enemies both Turks and Tartars. The Turks beside the bootie they took themselues, fell to quarrelling with the Tartars, for some part of theirs; and so long as there was any thing that might please their eies, or fill their hands, they abstained from slaughter & bloudshed, busying themselues with that which for the present was more for their profit: but the pillaging ceasing, by reason there was [illegible]more to be had, then the perfidious wretches fell to massacring of the miserable Christians, the sword deuouring al that they could light vpon, so that all the citie flowed with bloud. Neither was there any end thereof, vntill that by the comming in of the Bassa the slaughter was stayed; by which meanes Countie Ysolan the late Gouernour with some other captaines and souldiers were saued, hauing escaped the enemies fury.

In this massacre were slaine 3000 Christian souldiers, beside others of the citisens, in number not few. The captaines that were spared, were led prisoners to Constantinople, there to be fed with the bread of tribulation: and with them the Countie Ysolan, for his valor and noble courage vnworthy of so hard a fortune. Howbeit, that he by liuely and pregnant reasons shewed, both himselfe & the rest to be vniustly detained, as taken prisoners contrary to the publicke faith vnto them before giuen; within the assurance of the capitulation agreed vpon with the Bassa, and out of the actions of war. Whereunto it was againe answered him, That the towne when it was taken, was yet still in his power, and he at choice whether he would deliuer it or no. That if he would by the yeelding vp of the town challenge his liberty, according to the articles of the capitulation, he ought then to haue deliuered it as was agreed, & not to haue suffred it to haue bin taken by force, according to the ordinary proceeding of war: the laws whereof do iustly condemne to death, or to captiuity, such as are by force of arms vanquished. That euery town which during the treaty of capitulation is by force taken, followeth the course of the latter condition and state, & not of the former, seeing that it is conquered and not deliuered

The capitulation betwixt the Bassa and the countie, for the yeelding vp of the city of Alba Regalis.

Great disorder and confusion among the besieged.

red. That this is the reason that they are punished by the rigor of armes, which haue not bin carefull to preserue themselues by the sweetnesse of peace: for that a man is not to expect of his mortall enemie any other curtesie, than that which necessity caused him to promise, which he may for his owne good againe violate, as he for the good of his enemie against his wil hath granted. With which quirkes and quillets the Countie deluded, say what he could, was carried away prisoner to Constantinople, where wee must for a while leaue him. And so the Bassa hauing in eighteene dayes taken Alba-Regalis, (now being eleuen moneths possessed by the Christians) caused the breaches he had made, to be againe repaired, and the citie well prouided for both of victuals and munition, leauing therein a strong garrison of 6000 souldiers; and with his people hauing ouerrun all the countrey as far as Strigonium, rose with his armie and retyred againe to Buda: where as he was making a bridge of boats ouer the Danubius betwixt Buda and Pesth, for the more easie transporting of victual, and better relieuing of the one the other as need should require; and hauing brought that worke to passe, and about to haue gone to the siege of Strigonium; commaundement came from the Great Sultan, That hee should with all speed returne to Constantinople, for that Mahomet accounting of him as of a most valiant man, was now minded to employ him in his warres against his Rebels in Natolia, where things now went not well, as shall be hereafter declared. Vpon which commaundement, the Bassa gaue leaue to all such in his armie as had charge of any place, forthwith to return to their seuerall places of gouernment: appointing some others with thirtie thousand souldiors, in the companie of Bashel Moyses (but of late Prince Sigismund his Lieutenant) to go with him into Transyluania: who after the ouerthrowe he had there receiued by Basta, was come vnto this great Bassa, offering vnto him, with such an aid as was now appointed for him, and the helpe of such other his friends as he had in Transyluania, to chase Basta with his Germanes from out thence, and to reduce that Prouince againe vnto the deuotion of the Othoman Emperours, as it had in former time beene. And so by the way of Belgrade Hassan Bassa himselfe with the rest of his Armie hasted towards Constantinople. Which hee was thought the more willingly to do, for that the Great Sultan before his setting forth had put him in good hope to marrie one of his Aunts (a woman of great wealth and honour) if by the winning againe of Alba-Regalis he should make himselfe worthie so honourable a match, after which he now longed.

But long it was not after his departure, but that the Imperials now at last assembled together at Comara, to the number of about 30000 men, with twelue * Nassadies and two gallies, some by water, some by land, marched downe alongst the riuer to Strigonium; where were also 20 other ships readie to receiue them, and so all embarked, were by the Lord Russworm and other the Imperial Captaines conducted to Buda, there with some notable enterprise to redeeme the disgrace by them before receiued in not relieuing of Alba-Regalis. Whose comming was so sudden and so vnlooked for of the Turks there, as that they had not any time to take in any greater helpe or prouision than was alreadie in the citie. And for as much as the Christians knew the good successe of this their enterprise taken in hand, not so much to depend of their strength, as of their politique proceeding and speedie dispatch of the matter begun, they thought it not good to vse any long delay, or to spare for any labor, but so soon as they might, by taking of the Water-city (or as some call it, the Iewes suburbes) so to cut off the passage of them of Buda to Pesth, as also from thence to trouble them in the castle and the vpper city of Buda. Which their intended exploit they happily attempted and brought to passe in this sort: The citie of Pesth standing right ouer against Buda, is (as we haue oftentimes before said) diuided from the same with the great and swift riuer of Danubius; ouer which the Turkes vpon boats had with great labor and cost of late built a most easie and commodious bridge for passage or carriage of things from the one citie to the other. This bridge the Imperials thought necessarie first to breake, the more easie to besiege either the one or other city; and for that purpose had by a strange deuice built a ship, which by the force of the streame carried downe the riuer, and resting vpon the bridge, should by a wonderfull power breake the same. Which ship the Turkes seeing comming downe the riuer with the rest of the Fleet after her, they ran by heapes, especially out of the Water-Citie, to the bridge for the defence thereof: where whilst they were thus busied, Countie Saltze on the other side by land with a petard blew vp one one of the gates of the city, and so entering and killing all such as he light vpon, came vnlooked for vpon the backs of the Turks at the bridge, of whom some he slew, some he draue into the riuer, who there perished; the rest in number not many, by speedie flight retiring themselues into the citie: whereupon he had now brought such a generall feare, that they all as well the souldiers as the citizens, with the Christians at their heeles, with as much haste as they could tooke their refuge into the vpper citie of Buda, much stronger and better fortified than was the lower citie. At which time the bridge was by them vpon the riuer broken also, so that now the one citie could no more thereby relieue the other as before.

The Water-citie thus woon, and the bridge broken, the next was for the Imperials to besiege either the one or the other city. But for that they of Pesth might with their great Ordnance much anoy them in the besieging of the castle and the vpper city of Buda, they thought best to begin with it first: which they did in much like sort as they had before done at the lower citie of Buda, the same deuice againe wel prospering in their hand. For the Lord Russworm with the fleet vpon the riuer making a great shew as if he would euen presently on that side haue entered, had with the stirre by him raised, drawne downe most part of the garrison souldiors vnto that side of the towne, where most shew of danger was: whilest in the meane time Countie Sultze with the gouernor of Althem (before vndiscouered) vpon the sudden by land scaled the other side of the citie, and gained the walls, the Turks yet dreaming of no such matter. But hereupon began a terrible outcry, the Turkes standing as men astonied, especially now feeling the Christians weapons in their bodies, before they knew they were got into the citie. In this so great an amazement such of them as could fled into the strongest towers, the rest hid themselues in cellars and other the most secret corners they could finde, out of which they were afterwards by the Christians drawne and slaine. They which were retired also into the towers and other stronger places of the city, seeing the great ordnance bent vpon them, and now out of all hope of relicfe, offered to yeeld; requesting only, that they might with their wiues and children with life depart; promising for that fauour so shewed them, to persuade them of Buda also in like manner to yeeld. Vpon which promise, that their poore request was granted, and the Lord Nadasti with certaine other Captaines sent with some of these citizens of Pesth, with their wiues and children to Buda: who comming thither, according to their promise most earnestly requested them of Buda to yeeld, for that they were not now to expect any further helpe, and that by their tooliish obstinacie they should be the cause of the death of them, their friends, their wiues, and children. Vnto whom also, to mooue them the more, the Lord Nadasti promised in the name of General, That they should all excepting some of their chiefe Commanders in safetie depart. Howbeit they of Buda would not hearken thereunto, but stood still vpon their gard. In this city of Pesth, well inhabited with Turkish Merchants, the Christians found great store of wealth, which all became a prey vnto the souldiers, with a thousand horses for seruice, many great pieces of artillerie and much other warlike prouision.

The citie of Pesth taken by the Christians.

Pesth thus woon, and a strong garrison left therein, they returned againe ouer the riuer to besiege the castle and vpper citie of Buda, which they attempted by vndermining the same, as also by batterie, hauing placed some of their great ordnance so high, that they could at their pleasure shoote into the middest of the streets of the Citie; wherewith they much troubled the Turks, not a little before discouraged with the losse of Pesth; thundering also at the same time with their other batteries in diuers places of the walls both of the castle and of the citie. Where vnderstanding that the Turkes garrisons of the frontier Townes and Castles thereabouts (hearing of the siege) were comming to the relicfe of their distressed friends, they sent out their horsemen with some part of their footmen against them: who meeting with them, gaue them a great ouerthrow, and so with victorie returned againe vnto the rest of the Armie lying at the siege, being still in hope either by force or composition to become Masters of the citie.

The vpper citie and castle of Buda besieged by the Christians.

But whilest they lay in this hope, and hauing the twelfth of October brought their approches neerer vnto the walls had there planted certaine notable pieces of batterie, with purpose the next day with all their power to haue assaulted the Citie; behold, the Visier Bassa hearing (by the way as he was going to Belgrad, & so to Constantinople) that the city of Pesth was was woon, and Buda besieged; changing his mind, returned in haste with such forces as he had yet left; and so vnlooked for, came and sat downe before Pesth, being not then aboue fiue and twentie thousand strong, but those all for the most part old and expert souldiers. But whilest the Bassa thus lay at the siege of Pesth on the one side of the riuer, and the Imperials at the siege of Buda on the other, diuers braue attempts were in both places giuen both on the one side and the other. The Christians in Pesth besieged by the Turks, hauing amongst them diuers braue captains, and desirous of honor, one day vnder their conduct sallied out of the citie to skirmish with the Turks; and comming with them to the sword, by plaine valor disordered them; and enforced them to flie, & so allured with the sweetnesse of the victory, pursued them euen to the trenches: from whence a great squadron of the Turks horsemen and harquebusiers at the same instant issuing out, and with their multitude ouercharging the Imperials, constrained them of force to retire: in which retreat, Countie Maximilian Martinengo (one of these aduenturers) doing what hee might both with his valour and direction to haue stayed the disordered retreat of the Christians, was with many others slaine: wherewith the rest discouraged, tooke their refuge towards the citie. Which they of the garrison beholding, sent out certaine companies to relieue them; by whose comming out, the furie of the Turkes was not onely represt, but they also euen vnto their trenches again repulsed. Shortly after which hot skirmishes, the Lord Russworm with the other Christian Captains on the other side of the riuer, hauing with continuall batterie made such a breach into the castle, as that the same seemed to be now faultable, in good order came on with certaine companies of their footmen appointed for that seruice (and so couragiously assailed the breach: where the Turks, who before had expected this assault, hauing in best sort they could repaired the breach, and on both sides thereof placed diuers murthering pieces, with great store of dangerous fire-workes, at such time as the first companies of the Christians fought couragiously to haue entred the breach, ouerwhelmed them with that deadly fire, and so rent them with their murthering shot, that they no faster entered, but that they were forthwith cut off and slaine: with the sight whereof, they which were appointed to second them, nothing discouraged, but seeking desperately to haue entered, and with the taking of the castle, and slaughter of the Turks, to haue requited the death of their fellowes, were themselues in like sort welcommed. So that now a thousand of them being lost, the captaines considering how much the losse of so many braue souldiers concerned the whole enterprise taken in hand, and that the breach could not be gained without the losse of the greatest part of them, they caused a retreat to be sounded, and so the assault for that time to be giuen ouer.

A notable skirmish betwixt the Christians and the Turks.

But long it was not that the Visier Bassa (thus retired as aforesaid) had lien before Pesth, but that by reason of his sudden returne, great wants began to arise in his camp; his souldiers for want of food beeing glad to eat their dead horses, a pound of bread being sold for two Hungarian Duckats, and a bushell of oates for fiue, and yet hardly so to be gotten: which wants in that so wasted a country still more and more encreasing, & many of his souldiers secretly stealing away from him, he had much adoe by al the means he could vse, to persuade them there to stay eight daies longer. Which time expired, and nothing more done, than some few weake attempts giuen, and some light skirmishes made, rather for fashions sake than for any hope of preuailing, and the want of all things still encreasing; hee with the rest of the Commanders fearing some sudden mischiefe to bee done them by the hungrie and discontented souldiers, the second of Nouember, causing his baggage to bee trussed vp in the dead-time of the darke and silent night, rise with his armie, and so in haste retired directly to Belgrade, leauing behind him in his campe three hundred dead horses, not yet eaten by his hunger-starued souldiers. Immediatly after whose departure, the Lord Nadasti and some other of the commanders in the armie, with fiue thousand souldiers and certaine great pieces of artillerie, some by land, some by water, went downe alongst the riuer to Adom, a faire well built towne vpon the banke of Danubius, about foure Hungarian miles from Buda, and seruing as it were for a storehouse for the garrison there: Which towne Nadasti summoned by his Hussars sent before, requiring to haue it deliuered vnto him. Which they of the towne at the first refused to doe: but afterwards seeing a far greater power come, prouided of great ordnance and all things else requisit for a siege, they with the sight therof discouraged, without more ado offered red to yeeld the towne, so that they might with bag and baggage in safety depart: which they did, the Christians conducting them as far as Feldwar, which castle was also at the first summons, by the perswasion of them of Adom deliuered vnto them: for they of the castle, by them enformed of the great strength of the Christians, and of the store of great ordnance they had brought with them, and that they staid therewith but fast by, were easily perswaded to hearken to their friendly, and so yeelded. Which done, the free Haiducks the same night surprised also the castle of Pax: from whence the Christians still marching on alongst the riuer, tooke in also the citie of Tolna.

But whilest Nadasti with the rest were thus busied in taking these castles and towns alongst the South side of Danubius, they in the camp at Buda were aduertised of the new designes of the Turkes Lieutenants and Captaines thereabout, for the reliefe of the besieged: as that the Bassa of Bosna, with the Gouernors of Canisia, Sigeth, and others, had assembled an army of thirtie thousand for the raising of the siege. Wherefore the Christians doubting as they lay at the siege dispersed, to be by them oppressed, leauing their tents in their trenches, gathered themselues together into the Water-citie: which the Turks out of the vpper citie quickly perceiuing, as feeling themselues now at some more liberte, presently sallying out, took both the trenches and the tents so left, with no small slaughter of such as were left for the keeping of them: and so possessed of the trenches and the tents, held them by the space of two houres, vntill they were by strong hand by the Christians beaten out, and so with some losse inforced againe to retire into the citie. The Lord Nadasti also, with the rest that had taken the aforesaid castles and towns vpon the side of Danubius, making a rode towards Alba Regalis, in their returne within a mile of Buda light vpon a thousand Turks there gathered together, most part of whom they slew, and hauing put the rest to flight, took some fifty of them prisoners. At which time also another of the Imperiall Colonels meeting with certaine other companies of the Turks comming to the reliefe of the besieged, not far from Buda, slew most part of them, took an hundred and threescore of them prisoners, with a number of horses and much other rich bootie, all which he brought into the campe. Neither were they at the siege in the mean time idle, their great artillerie still thundering against the wals both of the castle and the citie: so that by the fury of the cannon hauing beaten downe a strong tower next vnto the Danubius, not far from the kings stable, they were a little before night about to haue there entered, when suddenly such a tempest of winde and raine arise, as that they could not possibly vse their pieces, or well any other weapon: so that the heauens as it were then fighting for the enemy, they were enforced for that time to giue ouer the assault begun. Which storme was no sooner ended, but that two thousand of the Turkes both horse and foot, to keepe the Christians otherwise busied, suddenly issuing out of the citie, charged vpon the Stirian horsemen; who presently relieued by the men at armes, so welcommed them, that hauing lost an hundred and threescore of their men, they were glad with more speed to retire, than they came out. But seeing some of the Christians that so hardly pursued them, some slaine, and some hurt from the wals; taking heart againe, the next day (being the eleuenth of Nouember) they sallied out againe; where albeit that a great number of them were slaine, yet fell they out againe the third day also, and were againe by the Countie Thurne with great losse of their men beaten backe into the citie: where in pursuing of them, the Christians were by certaine Ianizaries (laid close for that purpose) suddenly assailed and dangerously gauled, the Countie himselfe being hurt in his left arme, and some other captaines slaine. In all which sallies, although the Turks were still put to the worse, yet thereby they gained time in some good sort to repaire againe their breaches.

Shortly after, the Imperials thus lying at the siege, certainely enformed that a world of the fierce and rude Tartars by the incitement of the Turke (hauing made themselues way through Valachia) where comming as farre as Temeswar to relieue Buda; thought it not best (especially now that Winter was come) to abide the comming of that so great a Northern tempest, but betimes whilest they had yet space, to raise their siege and be gone: Which they did the sixteenth of Nouember, leauing the Water-citie, with all that they had got about Buda, againe vnto the enemie: onely Pesth they furnished with victuals and all things else necessarie, leauing therin almost ten thousand soldiers in garrison, for the defence therof against the barbarous enemy. As for Adom it was strengthened with a garrison of Hungarians only, with their wages offred to be paid before hand; which for all that, they refused to accept; alledging that for the great danger this place was exposed to aboue others, they could not safely take their oath for the defence thereof: yet offering withall to vndertake the charge, and to do what beseemed valiant soldiers, in such sort as that all men should well vnderstand, that nothing euill should happen thereunto through their default or negligence.

The siege of Buda for feare of the Tartars thus giuen ouer, and the Imperials departed and gon, the Turks forthwith came downe out of the higher citie into the lower, declaring their ioy for the recouerie thereof, by the often thundring of their great ordnance, with diuers other signes of triumph. But whilest in their iolitie they spared not by the mouth of the cannon to send commendation to them of Pesth, they from them againe receiued the like; but in such rude manner, that the Turks wearied with such greetings, requested them to spare their shot and pouder, and quietly to liue by them as became neighbours for that Winter vntill the next Spring, at which time it was to be thought that this strife should be ended by their Emperors, the weaker yeelding vnto the stronger either the one or the other citie. Yet for all this their great ioy, their cheere in Buda was not great, victuals by this siege being become so scarce, that it was by the Turks feared, That if the Christians had there longer lien, they should for verie want haue been enforced to haue yeelded the city. Of which their need their friends not ignorant, and hauing made what prouision they were able for their relieue, were with a great conuoy bringing the same towards Buda: whereof the garrisons of Comara and Strigonium hauing intelligence, went presently out, and meeting with the Turks in the mid way betwixt Alba-Regalis and Buda, ouerthrew the conuoy, and carried away all that prouision of victuals; like vnbidden guests making themselues merrie with that which was neuer prouided for them.

Mahomet much troubled with the Scriuano.

These doubtfull wars of Hungarie, with the general reuolt of Transyluania much troubled Mahomet the great Sultan; but nothing like vnto the warres he had in Asia against the Scriuano and the rebels his followers; the euill successe whereof (as most dangerous to his State) so much tormented his haughtie minde, as that it would scarce suffer him to thinke of any thing els. For the Rebel encouraged with the successe of the last yeares wars, and stil growing stronger and stronger, (by reason of the great number which, allured with the sweet name of liberty, hope of prey, or the good entertainment by him giuen, dayly more and more reforted vnto his campe) had this yeare ouerrun a great part of the Turks dominions in Asia, putting all to fire and sword that stood in his way, ransacking also diuers walled and fenced cities by the way as he went. Which he might the more easily do, for that the Ianizaries of Aleppo and Damasco, with many other their partakers and fauourits, which might greatly haue hindered his proceedings, were at the same time also vp in arms, and together by the eares amongst themselues, to the great benefit of the Scriuano: who in the midst of the course of these his desired fortunes, fell sicke of a natural disease, and so died. By whose death the rebellion was no whit appeased, (as commonly in like case it falleth out, and as was then of many expected) but in short time grew to be both far greater and more dangerous than before: for the Scriuano was no sooner dead, but that a yonger brother of his no lesse warlike & couragious than himselfe (to the great contentment of the rebellious) stept vp in his place, fiercely prosecuting the wars his brother had before him taken in hand. Against whom Hassan Bassa by commandement from the grand Seignior with a great armie setting forward, with hope in that newnesse of his command to haue oppressed him, and so to haue quenched that so spreading a fire; at length met with him, that was easie enough to be found, and joyning battell with him, was by him in a great and bloudie fight ouerthrowne and slaine together with his whole army, except such as by speedy flight saued themselues from the furie of their fierce enemies. So that Mahomet the great Sultan now enforced to employ his best commanders and soldiers into those parts for the subduing of him, for that cause called Mahomet the Visier Bassa out of Hungarie to serue against this new Rebel: who in the meane time following the course of his victorie, made hauock of all as he went, taking vnto his owne vse all such tribute as was in those Countries and others also farther off, due vnto the great Sultan; hauing of late exacted onely of the citie of Ancyra and

Which he might the more easily do, for that the Ianizaries of Aleppo and Damasco, with many other their partakers and fauourits, which might greatly haue hindered his proceedings, were at the same time also vp in arms, and together by the eares amongst themselues, to the great benefit of the Scriuano: who in the midst of the course of these his defired fortunes, fell sicke of a natural disease, and so died. By whose death the rebellion was no whit appeased, (as commonly in like case it falleth out, and as was then of many expected) but in short time grew to be both far greater and more dangerous than before: for the Scriuano was no sooner E dead, but that a yonger brother of his no lesse warlike & couragious than himselfe (to the great contentment of the rebellious) stept vp in his place, fiercely prosecuting the wars his brother had before him taken in hand. Against whom Hassan Bassa by commandement from the grand Seignior with a great armie setting forward, with hope in that newnesse of his command to haue oppressed him, and so to haue quenched that so spreading a fire; at length met with him, that was easie enough to be found, and joyning battell with him, was by him in a great and bloudie fight ouerthrowne and slaine together with his whole army, except such as by speedy F flight saued themselues from the furie of their fierce enemies. So that Mahomet the great Sultan now enforced to employ his best commanders and soldiers into those parts for the subduing of him, for that cause called Mahomet the Visier Bassa out of Hungarie to serue against this new Rebel: who in the meane time following the course of his victorie, made hauock of all as he went, taking vnto his owne vse all such tribute as was in those Countries and others also farther off, due vnto the great Sultan; hauing of late exacted onely of the citie of Ancyra Diuers incursions of the Tartars into the frontiers of the Emperours territories, and much harme by them there done.

Now though Mahomet the Turkish Emperor had called home Mahomet the Visier Bassa out of Hungarie, against the rebels in Asia, (as is aforesaid) yet had he before prouided, that for the better assurance of his townes and territories in Hungarie, the Tartar Han with a great power of his Crim Tartars should euen against that time come downe into that countrey. Which rough and needie people dwelling neere vnto the fennes of Meotis, for pay or prey always readie to do the Othoman Emperors seruice, setting forward vnder the leading of their great Han himselfe, and of his two sonnes, and by plaine force breaking through Valachia, H though not without great losse of their men (being fought with by the Valachians and free Haiducks a whole day) were now in the later end of December with their huge companies come into Hungarie; the Han himselfe with fortie thousand to Quinque Ecclesiæ, and his sons with twentie thousand moe into Possega (a fertile countrey lying betweene the great riuers Sauus and Drauus) where they spoiled all as well the Turks as the other poore Christians, pretending all that frontier countrey with the whole command thereof to be giuen vnto them by Mahomet the Turkish Emperor in reward of their good seruice. But long they lay not there quiet, but that to shew for what they came, they enforced the Christians thereabout to victual Canisia for the Turks: and so breaking into Stiria, not far from Caramant (the neerest Fortresse of the Christians towards Canisia) carried away aboue two thousand Christians captiues: and shortly after surprising Keschemet a great and populous towne, slew most part of I the inhabitants, and carried away the rest prisoners. Other some of them also at the same time making an inrode to Sharuar, and hauing burnt twentie villages downe to the ground, carried away thence about a thousand soules into most miserable captiuitie and thraldome. They also at their first comming relieued them of Buda the Lord Nadasti with his Hussars, who before kept them from victuals, not being able for the great number of them, now longer so to do. By them also the Turks encouraged, tooke and burnt certaine places possessed by the Christians neere vnto Buda, putting them all to the sword that they found therin. So that the poore countrey of Hungarie (neuer to be sufficiently pitied) with the rest of the countries and prouinces belonging vnto the house of Austria, and confining vpon the Turke, were not so much eased by the calling home of the Visier Bassa with his army, as they were now annoyed by the comming of these roguish Tartars, a people wholly euen from their infancie giuen to the spoyle. Against whom for all that, the Christians hauing their ordinarie garrisons, began now euen in the depth of Winter to oppose some other of their forces also: the Palatine of Rhine sending ten companies of horsemen to Possonium, from thence to be sent to Sharuar for the defence of Stiria: and Collonitz (but lately knighted by the Emperour) for his part raising foure hundred horse, a thousand Hussars, and three thousand of the free Haiducks for the repressing of those Tartars: the Duke of Brunswick also at that time for the same seruice sending thither a thousand horse with two thousand foot, against those sworne Enemies of the Christian Religion.

A THE troubles of this yere thus ouerpast, Alba-Regalis being by the Christians lost, Pesth with some other places woon, Tranſyluania recouered, Buda besieged, the Visier Bassa returned, and the Tartars come into Hungarie, Ianuarie with a sharpe frost began to open the next yere, by force whereof the riuers in many places, but especially in those more Easterly countries, were not onely frozen ouer, but seemed rather euen wholly turned into yce: Danubius that great riuer (for all his swift course) beeing then also (as it is often) so hard frosen, that men and carts might safely passe too and fro thereupon. Which so hard a season for all that did no whit freese but rather encrease the hot desires of the greedie Turks, still breathing after the vtter spoile and ruine of the Christians dwelling neere vnto them. For which B purpose, they euen in this dead time of the yeare, and extremitie of nature (which commonly affoordeth vnto most mortall enemies a cessation from armes) out of their garrisons of Sigeth, Buda, Canisia, Alba-Regalis, Baborz, and such other places, raised an armie of eighteene thousand strong, to haue forraged and ouerrunne the Christians, with their territories confining vpon them; Quermanie with the countrey thereabout beeing the places by them assigned to haue felt the first force of their sudden rage and furie. Of which their designes Collonitz, Gouernour for the Emperour in those parts, vnderstanding, to preuent the same, and to meet with their forces, with all speed put into the suburbes of Quermanie a thousand Reisters, and two thousand Lansquenets; and in the Burroughes thereabours laded the regiment of the C Countie Reingraue, with six companies of the Cossackes, foure thousand Haiducks, foure hundred Carabins, French, and Wallons, two hundred horse of the Regiment of Collonitz; with whome was Collonitz himselfe, commanding ouer all these troupes: a man for his worth euery way answerable vnto his charge. Who for the more assurance of this Countrey, ouer which the enemie now houered, commaunded all the inhabitants thereabout to take vp armes; and withall, with good and strong barricadoes to strengthen the wayes, and stop vp the passages into their countrey: which they right cheerefully performed, with their weapons in the one hand, and their spades and shouels in the other. Of which their so great resolution the Turkes vnderstanding, changed their purpose. For they considering the assured danger they were to vndergoe, in forcing of these troupes, standing vpon the wals of their de- D fence, & strong in their resolution, changed their former designe, for the inuading of Quermanie (where they for the space of fiue weekes together had by the Christians been expected) and vpon a new resolution marched along by Roquesbourg, with purpose to haue loaded themselues with the spoyle of the countrey thereabout. Which their new designe caused Collonitz to gather together his forces to crosse and frustrate them therein: which hee did by fauour of the riuer, which both strengthened him against their incursions, and was well to be defended. But the Turkes, whose purpose was not to fight, but to haue robbed and spoiled the countrey at their pleasure, finding now contrarie to their expectation, such strong re- The Turkes for feare of the Christians cowardly retires. sistance, and their designes disturbed, in fine, gaue ouer their enterprise, and so againe retired; contenting themselues to gather a conuoy of victuals to put into Canisia, which then lay in E great extremitie for want thereof. Which victuals they drew out of the villages thereabout, and so came to Babotz, to march to Canisia, a towne most commodious for such an assemblie, and for the relieuing of Canisia. Of this their purpose Collonitz (who spared for no cost) by his espials aduertised, euen hee which before was appointed as a prey vnto his enemies, began now to plot with himselfe, that they should become a prey vnto him: their cowardise, by so many precedent effects declared, had giuen him the meanto aduenture vpon them, and the hope to ouerthrow them. A necessarie consideration in martiall affaires, for Commanders to put in execution their designes, at what price soeuer: for that it is better to lose in the performance of them, with the preseruation of their reputation, than otherwise to gaine with the losse thereof: for that it preserued, still striketh a feare of their valor into the mindes of their enemies, oftentimes ouercome euen with this their apprehension thereof: Whereas F otherwise they might happily ouercome, in the assurance by them conceiued of their enemies cowardise.

Collonitz lieth in ambush for the Turkes.

Vpon which resolution this brane Colonell the foure and twentieth of March with his troupes marched towards little Comara, about two leagues from Canisia, and lay with them them close in ambush in the woods neere vnto two marishes, ouer which the Turks had made two bridges to passe the great artillerie and wagons vpon: the Turks being well neere 20000 strong, and our men but 8200, whereof there were 2200 horsemen, and 6000 foot, a small number in comparison of their enemies. But whilest that those men lie thus close in ambush, with a purpose to doe some notable exploit, let vs in the meane time run to Pesth, to see what there in the meane time passed.

The Turkes after the losse of Pesth much grieued to haue this impostume so neere their hearts, sought to breake it to our hurt, employing all their treacherie to gaine our garrison souldiers, and with their forces to distresse them of victuals. And the Christian armie was no sooner risen from before Buda, but that the Turks came downe againe into their base towne, which they found much ruinated and in euill estate. But the ioy of their conquest buried in it all the obiect of their sorrow, and the feeling of their griefe; the lesser passions alwaies giuing place vnto the greater, and sorrow finding no place at all in the middest of their immoderate ioy. Whereof they gaue a number of testimonies, by the thundring of their great ordnance, by fires of ioy, and vollies of smal shot: all which their fury they discharged vpon them of Pesth; who with the like courtesie requited them, sending them backe againe bullets for bullets. Which now became a common exercise among the canoniers, passing the time in these actions, more vpon a brauerie than to any purpose, small harme being done thereby either on the one side or on the other: in such sort, that in the end the Turks better aduised, requested our men to cease from such shooting, as they on their part would doe likewise, and to expect the end of the negotiation of peace, of a certaine begun (as they said) betwixt their Princes; but meaning indeed by this meanes to spare their pouder, shot, and paines, and to reserue them to their better vses.

Buda distressed for want of victuals.

And yet for all this triumphant ioy, the Turks in Buda were in great want of victuals, the late siege hauing deuoured all their prouisions, and no new supplie thereof as yet come vnto them: insomuch, that their greatest care was now how to come by victuals, without which they must needs forsake their city. Of which the great necessity the other garrisons in the places thereabout aduertised, assembled themselues to take order therefore; and hauing prouided 200 wagons, loded with all manner of necessary prouisions at Alba-Regalis, with a conuoy of 6000 souldiers put themselues vpon the way toward Buda. Of all which their proceedings the garrison of Strigonium hauing got vnderstanding, and ioyning vnto them the garrison of Comara, met with them vpon the way betwixt Alba-Regalis and Buda, and charged them; and so with great confidence on both sides came to handie blowes, the Turks being in number stronger, and our men in valour and resolution; the waggons in the meane time standing still, as the motiue of the charge, and appointed for a prey vnto the victors. But our horsmen beeing for the most part Hussars, well acquainted with such charge, with their diuers courses greatly troubled the enemies, our footmen in the meane time charging them also with a number of harquebusiers: against whom the Turkes with the same armes and like courage defending themselues, and many of them being slaine, and the waggons gained from them, gaue place vnto their valour, and so were almost all cut in pieces. The waggons thus surprised, were diuided as a rich bootie among the victors: fortie whereof were sent vnto the garrison at Pesth; who were well content that the enemies trauell and wealth had been gathered for their good, and without their owne paines to solace themselues with the fruit of their enemies labours.

The Turkes in carrying a conuoy of victuals to Buda ouerthrowne by the Christians.

But what should we say? The most sure resolutions are sometimes by chances crossed, and tempests otherwhiles ouertake vs, euen in the enterance of the desired port. The Turkes of Buda vnderstanding of the bruit of this medley, and that it was for their bread, posted in hast to haue succoured their troupes, and arriued at the same time that our men victoriously led alongst by the Riuer of Danubius the waggons they had before gained. At the sight of which obiect, they animated with hunger after the victuals, and with desire to bee reuenged vpon the men, charged them. But our men, who thought of nothing more, but that they were victorious, and possessors of their enemies bootie, seeing these new come enemies so furiously to charge them, daunted with the present perill, and with the consideration thereof onely possessed, bethought themselues of nothing else, but how to saue themselues, and

A and to leaue their honour, bootie, and the field, all as spoiles vnto their enemies. The furious countenance of the Turkes, and their number surmounting ours by 1500, so bereft them of their resolution for to fight for their liues and waggons, as that they without more adoe quite forsooke them, accounting themselues happie enough if they might but saue themselues. And the Turkes without farther pursuing of them, contented to haue recouered their victuals, left them, and so returned homeward, driuing their waggons along the banke of Danubius. But see the wind which by and by changed, and hauing as it were with a sudden tempest vndertaken euen at the enterance of the port to swallow vp both the one and the other, sent the garrison of Pesth vpon them of Buda to stay them. Great changes of fortune in one moment of time, which mocketh men with shewes, bringing forth effects quite contrarie to their expe-

B ctation. These Turkes stayed vpon their retreat by the comming of these new come aduersaries, did euen as ours had done before. For not willing to prefer their good before their life, and more greedie of victuall than of battell, they quitted their prize, and retired. For our men in number two thousand, were seized of a forrest about the middest of the way whereby the Turks were to passe, & which they could by no means shun; and diuided into two companies, kept themselues close there in ambush, resolutely attending for the comming of their enemies. Of which their purpose the Turks not aware, and still pressing on forward, found themselues hardly charged, before they could see them by whom they were so charged; one of our companies charging them afront, and the other behind. So that the Turks inclosed betwixt them, and in so great and sudden a feare not knowing against whom to defend themselues, without

C any great resistance betooke themselues to flight, leauing their waggons, and casting away their armes: yet so, that a number of them were left dead vpon the place, some others of them taken prisoners, and the rest chased euen vnto the gates of their citie. But our men beeing victors, with the waggons, and a number of prisoners returned home, and by the mouth of their great artillerie gaue a thousand testimonies of their victory vnto the sorrowfull cowards; who themselues also carried the heauie newes thereof vnto the rest of their fellowes shut vp within the citie of Buda.

The connoy of victuals again recouered from the Christians by the garrison of Buda.

The same connoy of victuals recouered from the Turkes by the garrison of Pesth.

But see againe the change of Fortune, constant only in vnconstancie, as the sequell shortly after shewed. Danubius that great riuer was then also (as it is often) so hard frozen, that men and carts might now safely passe too and fro thereupon. In which so hard season, the Turkes

D in garrison at Buda hauing once vpon the frozen Riuer braued the Christians in Pesth, and the two and twentieth of Ianuarie in like brauerie comming out the second time, were by the garrison souldiers of Pesth put to flight, and by two hundred of the most forward and valiant souldiers hardly pursued; vpon whome, not onely they which fled, but other of the Turkes also out of Buda in greater number returning, chased them likewise backe againe euen to the bridge, whereby they were to haue passed into the Citie: which now drawne vp for feare of greater harme from such a number of Turkes as were now come out, and were readie to haue entered at the heeles of the flying souldiers; the poore soules so shut out, and too weake for such a multitude as then had them in chase, were there euen in their friends sight euerie man slaine, the Turkes themselues with little harme returning to

The garrison souldiers of Pesth ouerthrowne by the Turks of Buda.

Neither long lasted the ioy of this victorie: for within a few dayes after, one Leibner a Captaine of the Christian garrison in Pesth, more grieued than the rest with the losse of so many valiant men, and some of them his frends and companions also; certainely vnderstanding that certaine of the chiefe of the Turkes of Buda, with two of their greatest Commanders, and a great traine of gallant Gentlewomen, were for their pleasure the next day about to goe vnto the hoat Bathes neere vnto Buda; and taking with him threescore musketiers, the night before secretly vpon the yce passed ouer the Riuer, and so not farre from the Bathes lay close in ambush, expecting the comming of their desired prey. In which expectance they lay not long, but that these Turkes casting no perill, came accordingly as they

F could haue wished, and in those pleasant Bathes merrily bathed and solaced themselues: Fooles to seeke after the pleasures of peace amidst the gulfe of the miseries of warres, and euill aduised to assure themselues of faire weather in a storme so neere at hand. For in the middest of all their delights these resolute men came suddenly vpon them, not fearing any such such danger, and slew all the men, sparing none but one boy and the Gentlewomen: who in the time of the conflict, naked as they were, ran as fast as they could into the Citie, feare hauing in them ouercome the modestie of their sexe. Which exploit done, the Captaine leauing the Turkes slaine in the Bath (now become red with their bloud) returned with his souldiers, laded with the rich bootie, and merrily sporting at the naked gentlewomen: with whose fearefull crie the Bassy of Buda stirred vp, sent out certaine of their garrison after them, but to no purpose; for why, they were in safety before got home. By continuance of this frost, by reason whereof victuals could not be sent down the riuer, the souldiers in garrison at Pesth were driuen to such wants, as that dogs and cats were accounted good meat among them; the Turkes their enemies still roaming about in the fields, to keepe them from victuals, and to encrease their necessitie.

Great want of victuals in Pesth.

Of these necessities the Turkes of Buda were partakers also, hunger-starued as were the other, but yet euerie day in the field to seeke reliefe. They knew right well, that hunger was hard to bee deceiued, beeing still in action and vigilant: and therefore they sought some meanes how to deceiue our men, still attending vpon them, and so to assure themselues of victuals. To which end they gaue it out, and made shew as if they would haue besieged the fort of Adom, distant about two leagues from Buda: Vnder the colour whereof, they receiued into their citie a conuoy of fiftie waggons laded with victuals and munition: which our men hindered not, for that they had no suspition of any such purpose of theirs. With which relicfe the Turkes encouraged, gaue knowledge thereof vnto their ouerthwart neighbours in Pesth by a thousand great shot, which they in thundering manner sent ouer the Riuer vnto them, as from men of courage, and deuoid of feare. Howbeit, that this action was more vaine than profitable vnto the Turkes, who for the dispence of their shot and powder gained not so much as the life of one souldier, nor one stone out of the walls of Pesth. Vpon this jolitie these same garrison souldiers of Buda shortly after thought to haue vpon the sudden surprised Palotta, a small Castle of the Christians, by night: but beeing in good time discouered, were deceiued of their hope, and with the losse of an hundred and twentie of their men enforced to retire: vnto whome Gaspar Horwad Captaine of the Castle, by a countrey peasant before sworne to doe the errand, sent a little pot full of salt, and a bottle of wine, willing them (in derision) with that salt to season the Venison they had taken in their late hunting, and to emptie that bottle to quench their thirst, and to cheere them vp after their late conquest.

Buda victualled.

The Turkes seeking to surprise Palotta, themselues ouerthrowne.

This jeast more prouoked these enemies, galled so to heare of their shame and losse; in such sort, that in reuenge thereof they discharged a shower of thundering great shot and small bullets vpon the garrison of Pesth, which in great abundance fell out of the cloud of their rage. But all to small purpose: for that their cannons beeing euill leuelled, ouershot the towne, carrying with their thundering bullets more feare than they did hurt: yea that worse was, the ruine made by their great batterie fell vpon their owne citie. For while they were thus thundering, fire by negligence of the cannoniers fell into one of their barrels of powder, which taking hold of another, and so running along, as if it had been by a traine of purpose layed, burst out with such force, that it ouerthrew a long peece of the wall of Buda, which in the fall thereof ouerwhelmed a great number of the souldiers neere vnto it. The noise of this thunderclap was great, and the force thereof terrible, so that it reuiued them of Pesth with some good hope, by this breach to force the place, the Turkes beeing from thence retired. Vpon which occasion the Gouernour of Pesth resolued to giue an assault vnto the place, and to make vse of the meane that Fortune, without his paine or trauell, had put into his hand. Whereupon taking with him a thousand Almaines, and three hundred Hungarians, he foorth with (in hope of good successe) marched toward the breach; and happily had preuailed, but that by the way they by chance met with a companie of Turkes, who gaue an alarme vnto them of the vpper towne, who vpon that brute of their approch manned their wals, and with great speed repaired the breach. Now all that they of Pesth could doe, was to reuenge themselues vpon these Turks whom they had met withall, who were there all slaine, except some few, whom they saued, and carried prisoners vnto Pesth, to be by them instructed of the enemies affairs.

Abou

Silistria spoiled by the Vayuod of Valachia.

A About this time Radul Vayuod of Valachia aduertised, that the Turkes in garrison at Silistria were gone abroad into the countrey to seeke after bootie and victuals, with his souldiers passed forthwith ouer the Riuer Danubius vpon the yce, to surprise the towne, now bared of the garrison: whose men for the desire of the riches of the place, and for feare lest the garrison souldiers should returne before they had gained the place, with redoubled force and courage so assailed the towne, that the Turkes dismayed, and deeming the number of the Christians that so furiously assayled them to bee greater than indeed it was, by reason of the greatnesse of the enterprise by them taken in hand; after some small resistance, left the way open for them to enter: who forthwith ouer the dead bodies of their B enemies thrust into the town, took the whole spoyle thereof (which was both great and rich, as being a towne well peopled) & so set fire vpon it, to the intent that it should no more serue for a place for the enemie to retire vnto. The Vayuod thus victorious and rich, returned with his souldiers laded with spoyles of their enemies, before that the Turkes could gather themselues together to hinder their retreat. And vnto George Basta, who was then in Transyluania in armes against the Turks, for his part of the bootie he sent him thirteene of the enemies Ensignes.

But our troups are now too long in their ambush, where the valiant Collonitz holdeth them close, attending the comming of the Turkes, and of their conuoy to Canisia; now wee must draw them out of their Sentinels and see what effects their designes shall bring forth. These C braue souldiers had now lyen three dayes in their ambushes without discouering of any enemie, vntill that the sixth of March three espies fell into their hands, whome the Turkes had sent forth before, to discouer what enemies were then abroad in the field. But these faithfull Infidels so taken, would not by any meanes discouer any thing hurtfull vnto their friends, or profitable for ours: So that in fine the Generall mooued with their obstinacie, commanded one of their heads to be strucke off, to terrifie the other two, and by force to draw from them that which faire entreatie and persuasion could not. The other two that were yet aliue dismayed with this spectacle, and well beaten to tell the truth, were at last constrained to confesse, That they were the enemies spies, sent forth to view the country, to see if the Christians had any forces there, able to let their cannons and waggons to enter into Canisia: which not D appearing, and they reporting vnto their companies, that the countrey was cleare, that then within two dayes after the conuoy was to passe euen by the same place where they then lay, to be put into Canisia, setting forth from Babotz two houres before day. Our men thus informed of the enemies designes, forced their hope to defeat them, and againe retired themselues into their ambuscado's, attending for their hoped prey, in such sort, that our men in their conceits held the victorie now as good as gained; howbeit, that it was yet but in hope and expectation. And that which more confirmed the matter, was, that within two houres after the taking of these spies, the Haiduckes, layed without the principall ambuscado, and hidden in the thickets and bushes, discouered a cornet of horsemen, with fiue ensignes of the Turks, come out of Canisia, marching to meet with the conuoy, in safetie to conduct the same in- E to the towne. At which ouerture the Hungarians awaked, gaue knowledge vnto the Generall of the arriuall of the enemie, to the end he might resolue what was best in that case to be done. Which opportunitie Collonitz embracing, and making much of time, put his horsemen in good order, to enclose the Turkes betwixt the marish and the wood, and to cut them so enclosed in pieces. The Turks hauing discouered nothing but the marishes and the woods, held on their way, and so as men hauing their hands and feet bound, fell into the power of their enemies. For beeing come into the danger, the Christian Carabins charged them in the head of their companies as they marched, and disordered them; The Hungarians fell vpon their flankes, which they opened; and the horsemen pressed them at their backes. These poore miserable men so enclosed, not knowing against whome first to defend themselues, and seeing death vpon euerie side of them, became as beasts to bee sacrificed vnto the furie of the Christians. The small resistance that they made deserued not the name of a fight, F beeing all slaine, and hauing themselues not slaine one man; layed by heapes one vpon other, not hauing ouerthrowne so much as one of their enemies: In such sort, that of six hundred men that were there together, there were not foure of them saued. Hauing in this manner ouercome the hardnesse of their enterprise, they spoyle the Campe, and vnderstanding that the Turkes were become lords of the towne, they presently returned with the spoyle, and ioyning at the ſame gate ſword in hand with the Turkes, they made way through the middest of them, and ſo escaped. Which exploit done, the Captaine commanded that the towne ſhould be ſet on fire in ſundry places, and ſo burnt vp. Which being done, they returned with the ſpoyle vnto their Campe, and ſo vnto their Prince. By reaſon of the greatneſſe of the enterprise, and the ſpeedy execution thereof, they were accounted good men at armes among them. Buda ſpoiled by the Turkes.

Bonfinius Rer. Hung. dec. 4. lib. 8.

The Turkes beſiege the caſtle of Peſth, and are beaten from it.

The Turkes of Buda were perſuaded alſo, vnder hand, by the Hungarians, that the Prince of Tranſyluania was their friend, hoping that he would ſhortly ſend them ſuccour. They knew right well, that Vngnad was hardly beſieged, being but a ſmall and weake: and therefore they sought time, meaning to entertaine our men, till ſuccour came vpon them, and ſo to affaile them on both ſides. To which end they gaue out, and made bruit among the Hungarians, that they would haue reſigned the Port of Buda, vnder the colour whereof, they receiued into the towne a number of little waggons laden with victuals and munition, which ſhould ſerue them for that time: and for the ſuſpition of any ſuch purpoſe of theirs. With which reliefe the Turkes encouraged, gaue knowledge thereof vnto their ouerthwart neighbours in Peſth by a thouſand great ſhot, which they in thundering manner ſent ouer the Riuer vnto them, as from men of courage, and deuoid of feare. Howbeit, that this action was more vaine than profitable vnto the Turkes, who for the diſpence of their ſhot and powder gained not ſo much as the life of one ſouldier, nor one ſtone out of the walls of Peſth. Vpon this the ſame garriſon ſouldiers of Buda ſhortly after thought to haue vpon the ſudden ſurpriſed Palotta, a ſmall Caſtle of the Chriſtians, by night: but beeing in good time diſcouered, were deceiued of their hope, and with the loſſe of an hundred and twentie of their men enforced to retire: vnto whome Gaſpar Horuad Captaine of the Caſtle, by a countrey peaſant before ſworne to doe the errand, ſent a little pot full of ſalt, and a bottle of wine, willing them in deriſion, with that ſalt to ſeaſon the Veniſon they had taken in their late hunting, and to empty that bottle to quench their thirſt, and to cheere them vp after their late conqueſt.

This jeaſt more prouoked theſe enemies, galled ſo to heare of their ſhame and loſſe; in ſuch ſort, that in reuenge thereof they diſcharged a ſhower of thundering great ſhot and ſmall bullets vpon the garriſon of Peſth, which in great abundance fell out of the cloud of their rage. But all to ſmall purpoſe: for that their cannons beeing euill leuelled, ouerſhot the towne, carrying with their thundering bullets more feare than they did hurt: yea that worſe was, the ruine made by their great batterie fell vpon their owne citie. For while they were thus thundering, fire by negligence of the cannoniers fell into one of their barrels of powder, which taking hold of another, and ſo running along, as if it had been by a traine of purpoſe layed, burſt out with ſuch force, that it ouerthrew a long peece of the wall of Buda, which in the fall thereof ouerwhelmed a great number of the ſouldiers neere vnto it. The noiſe of this thunderclap was great, and the force thereof terrible, ſo that it reuiued them of Peſth with ſome good hope, by this breach to force the place, the Turkes beeing from thence retired. Vpon which occaſion the Gouernour of Peſth reſolued to giue an aſſault vnto the place, and to make vſe of the meane that Fortune, without his paine or trauell, had put into his hand. Whereupon taking with him a thouſand Almaines, and three hundred Hungarians, he foorthwith (in hope of good ſucceſſe) marched toward the breach; and happily had preuailed, but that by the way they by chance met with a companie of Turkes, who gaue an alarme vnto them of the vpper towne, who vpon that brute of their approch manned their wals, and with great ſpeed repaired the breach. Now all that they of Peſth could doe, was to reuenge themſelues vpon theſe Turkes whom they had met withall, who were there all ſlaine, except ſome few, whom they ſaued, and carried priſoners vnto Peſth, to be by them inſtructed of the enemies affaires.

Aboue

Siliſtria ſpoiled by the Vayuod of Valachia.

A About this time Radul Vayuod of Valachia aduertiſed, that the Turkes in garriſon at Siliſtria were gone abroad into the countrey to ſeeke after bootie and victuals, with his ſouldiers paſſed forthwith ouer the Riuer Danubius vpon the yce, to ſurpriſe the towne, now bared of the garriſon: whoſe men for the deſire of the riches of the place, and for feare leſt the garriſon ſouldiers ſhould returne before they had gained the place, with redoubled force and courage ſo aſſailed the towne, that the Turkes diſmayed, and deeming the number of the Chriſtians that ſo furiouſly aſſayled them to bee greater than indeed it was, by reaſon of the greatneſſe of the enterpriſe by them taken in hand; after ſome ſmall reſiſtance, left the way open for them to enter: who forthwith ouer the dead bodies of their B enemies thruſt into the town, took the whole ſpoyle thereof (which was both great and rich, as being a towne well peopled) & ſo ſet fire vpon it, to the intent that it ſhould no more ſerue for a place for the enemie to retire vnto. The Vayuod thus victorious and rich, returned with his ſouldiers laded with ſpoyles of their enemies, before that the Turkes could gather themſelues together to hinder their retreat. And vnto George Baſta, who was then in Tranſyluania in armes againſt the Turks, for his part of the bootie he ſent him thirteene of the enemies Enſignes.

But our troups are now too long in their ambuſh, where the valiant Collonitz holdeth them cloſe, attending the comming of the Turkes, and of their conuoy to Caniſia; now wee muſt draw them out of their Sentinels and ſee what effects their deſignes ſhall bring forth. Theſe C braue ſouldiers had now lyen three dayes in their ambuſhes without diſcouering of any enemie, vntill that the ſixth of March three eſpies fell into their hands, whome the Turkes had ſent forth before, to diſcouer what enemies were then abroad in the field. But theſe faithfull Infidels ſo taken, would not by any meanes diſcouer any thing hurtfull vnto their friends, or profitable for ours: So that in fine the Generall mooued with their obſtinacie, commanded one of their heads to be ſtrucke off, to terrifie the other two, and by force to draw from them that which faire entreatie and perſuaſion could not. The other two that were yet aliue diſmayed with this ſpectacle, and well beaten to tell the truth, were at laſt conſtrained to confeſſe, That they were the enemies ſpies, ſent forth to view the country, to ſee if the Chriſtians had any forces there, able to let their cannons and waggons to enter into Caniſia: which not D appearing, and they reporting vnto their companies, that the countrey was cleare, that then within two dayes after the conuoy was to paſſe euen by the ſame place where they then lay, to be put into Caniſia, ſetting forth from Babotz two houres before day. Our men thus informed of the enemies deſignes, forced their hope to defeat them, and againe retired themſelues into their ambuſcado's, attending for their hoped prey, in ſuch ſort, that our men in their conceits held the victorie now as good as gained; howbeit, that it was yet but in hope and expectation. And that which more confirmed the matter, was, that within two houres after the taking of theſe ſpies, the Haiduckes, layed without the principall ambuſcado, and hidden in the thickets and buſhes, diſcouered a cornet of horſemen, with fiue enſignes of the Turks, come out of Caniſia, marching to meet with the conuoy, in ſafetie to conduct the ſame in- E to the towne. At which ouerture the Hungarians awaked, gaue knowledge vnto the Generall of the arriuall of the enemie, to the end he might reſolue what was beſt in that caſe to be done. Which opportunitie Collonitz embracing, and making much of time, put his horſemen in good order, to encloſe the Turkes betwixt the mariſh and the wood, and to cut them ſo encloſed in pieces. The Turks hauing diſcouered nothing but the mariſhes and the woods, held on their way, and ſo as men hauing their hands and feet bound, fell into the power of their enemies. For beeing come into the danger, the Chriſtian Carabins charged them in the head of their companies as they marched, and diſordered them; The Hungarians fell vpon their flankes, which they opened; and the horſemen preſſed them at their backes. Theſe poore miſerable men ſo encloſed, not knowing againſt whome firſt to defend themſelues, and ſeeing death vpon euerie ſide of them, became as beaſts to bee ſacrificed vnto the furie F of the Chriſtians. The ſmall reſiſtance that they made deſerued not the name of a fight, beeing all ſlaine, and hauing themſelues not ſlaine one man; layed by heapes one vpon other, not hauing ouerthrowne ſo much as one of their enemies: In ſuch ſort, that of ſix hundred men that were there together, there were not foure of them ſaued. Their horſemen which which followeth them, seeing them surprised, in stead of relieuing them, shamefully fled, and thinking by flight to saue themselues, whilest their companions were in manifest G perrel, their liues before their honour: For if it been a shame for souldiers in fight to flie with the safetie of their friends, it must needs be an irreparable dishonour to flie and leaue them to the slaught[illegible] Honour Carabins taking the occasion for their aduantage, no more spared their horses in [illegible] suit of these Infidels, than they had done their hands in the defeating of their fellowes: but pursuing amaine after these fugitiues, slew a number of such of them as were worst mounted, and pursued the rest euen to the gates of Canisia. Those of the towne at this tumult raised an alarme, shot off their great artillerie, and discharged many vollies of smal shot against our men, as well to stay the pursuit of our men, and to saue their owne, as to giue warning vnto them that were to bring the conuoy, that our men were in the field, ready to surprise H them. But during this fight, three of the Turks horsemen passing well mounted, and exceeding hardie, aduentured to passe by our troups, and vpon the spurre to meet with them which were bringing of the conuoy, and to giue them warning of the ouerthrow, and that they should again returne to Babotz. Which their so braue an attempt Fortune fauoured, as not willing to frustrat the desert of so well deseruing valour. And the Turks vpon the way with the conuoy, now vpon this aduertisement returned, and retired themselues againe into the Castle from whence they came.

But our men aduertised of this their retreat, & as it were deceiued of the hope by them conceiued for the intercepting of the conuoy, vndertooke an exploit much more hautie, braue, & dangerous: for forthwith they made head toward Babotz, with a resolution to carry the place; I and though they were almost sixteene miles from it, yet they resolued to goe thither, and to make themselues masters therof. And so marching cheerfully on, therein vsed such diligence, that about nine of the clocke at night they arriued at the place: whither they were no sooner come, but that they did what they might to daunt their enemies, to make their conquest the more easie. The greatnesse of the attempt it selfe serued well to that purpose, but yet the beleefe more, if they could driue into their enemies [illegible] the sufficiencie of their forces, for the performance of so great an exploit. Which caused them to sound their trumpets, to strike vp their drums, to remooue their artillerie, to ruffle with their armes, to keepe a stirre with their souldiers, and to make the noise not of a small, but of a puissant and great armie. But the Turks in number twice so many as were our men, and within a good and strong place, were not with K such a bruit to be carried away, but standing fast vpon their guard and resolution, prepared themselues for fight, and how to receiue our men, if they should attempt to assaile them. Now whilest the alarme thus sounded, our companies aduanced themselues, repeating oftentimes the name of Iesus, and making themselues ready for to fight. This skirmish began with a thousand cannon shot which the Turks out of their Castle deliuered vpon the troups of the Christians, and their muskets still playing from the curtaine of their wals, so that the castle seemed as if it had been a mountaine of fire. All which terrors no whit staied the hope of our resolute footmen, who passing thwart these flaming showers, marched along the counterscarp of the ditch toward the gate of the towne, to haue broken open and forced the same. The Turkes at L the same time were come forth out of the towne, making shew as if they would haue sallied forth vpon our men, and haue fought with them. But at the same instant that they charged the front of our footmen, they were by them so encountered and beaten backe, that hauing lost some of their men, they were glad againe to retire into the towne: where they did there endeuor to defend themselues, not daring afterward to fight without the fauor of their wals: within which it stood them vpon to haue both courage and power, being still furiously assailed by our men, who planted vpon the towne ditch, with their muskets and harquebuses so plied the Turks vpon their wals and in their holds, as that they durst not shew themselues or looke out for the showers of lead which they thundered vpon them. And assuredly, if our men had then had instruments wherwith to haue opned the gates or the wals, as wel as their muskets & harquebuses had made a breach into the resolution of the Turks, the town had vndoubtedly bin M ours: but this designe being not before foreseene, neither intended, wanted the meanes to put it in execution; so that, for want of Petards and of scaling ladders, the place remained still the Turkes, and saued it selfe out of our hands. In fine, our men hauing beene foure houres in fight before

A before it, both doing and receiuing harme, and finding no meanto enter the place, were enforced to found a retreat, and to leaue it.

In which retreat the Christians burnt certaine villages of the enemies, rather to shew that they had beene there, than for any their valour therein: seeing that things insensible, which follow the order of their nature, are without offence, and they which hurt them without reason. This done, they of purpose retired to little Comara: for the long time that they had kept the field, the diuers exploits by them done against the enemies, and the common report of the vanquished, had stirred vp the enemies, so that they began now on euery side by heapes to flocke together, to swallow them vp, and euen now pressed vpon their retreat. So Collonitz in B despight of the enemie, in safetie brought backe his souldiers: and being entered into Comara, caused the heads of the principall of the slain enemies to be set vpon the pikes of the palisadoes, & vpon a great pine tree standing before the gate, which for this purpose had almost all the branches lopped off. An action learned from the cruelty of the Turks, and now done by the Christians, more to astonish and deterre them from this their cruell custome, than for any glorie or profit ensuing thereby: seeing that to tyrannize vpon a dead body, is but a signe of cowardise, and an action altogether vnprofitable.

This done, our men departed from this castle, as men worne, and almost spent with trauell and wearinesse, but yet more with famine. For why, they thinking to haue executed but that designe which had put them in armes, and that in so short a time also, had taken no prouision of C victuals with them: so that they were all pined with hunger, ouercome with watching, and halfe dead with labour. Their horses also in like sort languished, the countrey being alike cruell both to the one and to the other. For beside that it was vnfruitfull for such as held the field (all the fruits thereof beeing gathered together and carried into the towns by the men of warre) it was not possible for our men to forrage, or to seeke for victuall there, and to come to an happie end of their designe, for that they had raised an alarme abroad in the countrey, and so perhaps might themselues haue become a prey vnto them, whome they ought to prey vpon. Which was the cause that our souldiers had for the space of three daies eaten nothing but crabbes and acorns which they found in the woods which couered their ambushes: so that beeing now come vnto this Castle, they deuoured a world of victuals, and requested D euerie one of them to returne againe vnto their garrisons; their bodies weakened with hunger, beeing scarce able to beare their armes. But that was not all; for departing from little Comara, they were aduertised, that the Turkes shut vp the wayes whereby they were to make their retreat home; in hope easily to ouercome men alreadie with hunger brought low, and to kill the bodies which trauell alreadie had spent. Howbeit, the great courage of our men frustrated this the enemies designe, and saued themselues. But so farre off was it that this aduertisement dismaid Collonitz, that euen to the contrarie it the more encreased his cou- The notable resolution of Collonitz.
rage, as appointed for his glory: being glad to haue such an occasion offered him for the shewing of his valor, although it were through the middest of danger, death, and slaughter. So that in stead of shunning the combat, whereas it was reported, that the Turks with great assurance E marched neere vnto a Castle of the Christians, to make head vpon a passage whereby our men were to retire; hee turned head toward the same place, with a firme resolution, with true valour vpon the sudden to encounter the enemie, which had thought to haue surprised him by cowardise. And the souldiers, weakened with hunger, although they well apprehended the danger of this designe; yet resting vpon the great resolution of their Generall, and considering the necessitie they had to goe farther for their safetie, vpon a good courage were content to follow whither soeuer their Generall would: who led them directly vnto the aforesaid Castle, where it was expected that the Turkes should haue charged them. But being come thither, there was no bodie to be seene: and yet our men, as hungrie as they were, stayed there one day in ambush, expecting the comming of their enemies; who for all that, hauing no minde to meet them, appeared not, but gaue them time and libertie in safetie to F retire themselues euery man vnto his own garrison, to refresh themselues, and to recouer their strength.

But now whilest our men of Warre, after these troubles in Transyluania and Hungarie, repose themselues; let vs in the meane time take our journey to Constantinople, and goe vnto the marriage of Hassan Bassa one of the Visiers of the Graund Seignior, and last yeare yeare Generall of the Turks armie in Hungarie.

At such time as he departed from this great Citie, to goe vnto the conquest of Alba-Regalis, Mahomet the Turkish Emperour, resolued to set all vpon the regaining of this citie, caused to be presented vnto him a Crowne and a Sword, the one in reward of his valour, if hee returned with victorie from this exploit, and the other in reuenge of his cowardise, if he failed in the performance thereof: promising him indeed his sister in marriage, amongst other the glorious rewards and trophies of his victorie: and threatning him with death, as a punishment amongst the griefes of his dishonour. But it came to passe, that by the cowardise of our men, he came vnto the effect of his desire (as is aforesaid) and tooke the citie, which promised vnto him the glorious triumph in Constantinople. And vnder the sweet influence of this Planet he returned to Constantinople, where he found all things in readinesse for the satisfying of his expectation, and the aduancement of his glory. He is magnificently receiued of his Prince, courteously saluted by all the nobilitie, and with greatest reuerence possible honoured of the people. And as he had happily discharged his charge, he found in like manner all things prepared and in readinesse for the performance of the promise of the grand Scignior his Lord and Master: who had caused them to be in most sumptuous manner prouided for the solemnizing of the marriage, and the contentment of the Bassa. But nothing now wanting that hee could haue desired or wished, more than the very solemnizing of the marriage it selfe, and that also euerie day of all men expected; the Ianizaries and Spahi, with the other souldiers of the Court, to the number of fiue and twentie thousand, euen vpon the sudden, when as no such thing was feared, came and in armes presented themselues before the Diuano, or Tribunall, holden for the chiefe administration of Iustice in the Turkes Palace, the first foure dayes in euerie weeke: and hauing set guards at the Court gates, the more safely to execute what they were before resolued vpon, proudly demanded to haue audience for certaine of the Spahi and Ianizaries, of whom they had made choice, in the names of them all to deliuer vnto the great Bassaes their grieuances, and the causes of their assemblie. Who as soone as they were entered into the Diuano before the Bassaes (of whom the most couragious of them was not without feare, as looking for nothing but for present death) they at the first demanded to haue Hassan Bassa deliuered vnto them: Who thinking that his head should haue serued for a sacrifice to pacifie this their furie; as a man altogether dismayed, wan and pale, passed through this mutinous multitude, to haue gone vnto the great Sultan, protesting of his owne innocencie, and calling vpon his Prophet Mahomet, to discouer vnto them the truth of all things. But they, after a thousand iniuries and reproaches by them heaped vpon him, rudely demanded of him, whence it proceeded that whilest hee with a great part of the forces of the Empire was busied in Hungarie, for the recouering of Alba-Regalis, there was in the meane time no good order taken for the repressing of the Rebell in Asia; who by sufferance was (as they said) now growne so proud, as with Ensignes displayed to come within three or foure dayes iourney of Constantinople, the Imperiall seat of the Othoman Emperors. Whereunto hee in no small feare answered, That he for his part had done his duetie, as well while hee had the charge of the armie in Asia, as now of late whilest hee had the like charge against the Christians in Hungarie, as euen the enemies themselues could witnesse. But seeing himselfe euen readie to die, hee yet requested them, That his guiltlesse death might bee vnto the State in general profitable: and in discharging of his conscience, to declare vnto them the causes of this contempt and neglect, for the suppressing of the Asian Rebell, which they were so desirous to know. It proceedeth (said hee) onely from the euill gouernement of the Grand Sultans mother (who then all commanded) and from the negligent carelesnesse of the Capi-Aga. Which his speech although they with much impatience and storming gaue eare vnto, yet hearing him so well to excuse himselfe, and to lay the blame there where they were well content it should rest; they gaue him leaue to goe to the great Sultan, to request him that they might speake with him; and further to deale with him, that they might haue the head of them who had beene the cause of this dishonorable seruice, or otherwise cowardly behaued themselues in the managing of the warres against the rebels in Asia: Threatning him withall, That if hee failed to performe this his charge, hee should not faile to feele the heauie effects of their iust furie. An heauie charge, yet glad was the Bassa to vndergoe the same, to rid himselfe out of their hands, where hee saw himselfe in greater danger, amongst them, them, most of whom had sometimes serued vnder him, than amongst so many his most mortall enemies: but what remedie? he must now so do or die therefore; for which he was the more to be excused. So in great feare comming vnto the great Sultan, almost as fearefull as himselfe, he shewed vnto him the great danger like euen presently to ensue, by the mutinie of his best souldiours, and guarders of his person: persuading him, betime to appease their fury, before they had embrued themselues with bloud; for feare of further danger like enough to ensue, as well vnto his owne person, as vnto the rest of his most faithfull and trustie Counsellors, from such furious headstrong men, vp in tumult with their armes in their hands. And although that a Prince ought not for the greatnesse of his Estate to do any thing as thereunto forced by his subiects, lest in so doing he might breed in them a contempt of himselfe, and increase their insolencie; that yet neuertheless in this action, being altogether extraordinarie, he was not to rest vpon that point: for that these mutinous souldiers turned not their weapons (as they pretended) against his Imperial power and soueraigntie, but rather to the contrarie, against the contemners thereof, seeking to be reuenged vpon them that had done him such euill seruice for the maintenance of his Honour and Majestie, and for the punishment of the insolent and disloyall. And that therefore the justice of the cause requiting and couering the malice of the fact, he was of opinion, That it were best for him to yeeld a little vnto the zeale of these his best souldiers, and to satisfie their just desire, although they had by verie euill and vnlawfull meanes sought for the same. And therefore aduised his Majestie, in some sort to satisfie the just complaints of these men, armed for the reuenge of his honour: and to chastise the chiefe Commanders of his Asian Forces, such as by whose treacherie or cowardise his seruice being neglected, had armed these men against them: with the same hand punishing such as had wronged his Majestie in honour, and appeasing the discontented for the good of his seruice. Mahomet thus by the Bassa persuaded, as also to shew himselfe in his Majestie vnto these his discontented Subiects, one part of their desire; the necessitie of the cause so requiring, in his Imperial seat presented himselfe vnto them, accompanied with the Mufti (the great Mahometan Priest) and some few others of the reuerend Doctors of their Law: who by the Sultan commanded to sit downe, and the Bassa's standing vp (so great the respect is to men of that sort, euen in a barbarous Nation of so small respect) the chiefe of the seditious stepping forth, demanded leaue to speake both for himselfe and the rest. Which being granted, he boldly thus began;

Hassan Bassa perswadeth the Great Sultan to giue way vnto the Ianizaries, and to grant their request.

Most happie and mightie Emperour, we the Spahies and Ianizaries thy obedient Slaues, full of griefe and discontentment to see a great part of thine Empire in danger to be lost; desire to know of thee the cause why thy Greatnesse doth not remedie it, and employ the meanes which God hath giuen thee. They suppose that the Rebels courses in Asia are vnto thee vnknowne, seeing they haue beene so hardie as to come in Armes so neere vnto thy Imperial Citie, the place of thine abode, and that without any let or resistance. They desire to know if all this haue beene made knowne vnto thee, and whether thou wilt take vpon thy selfe the care of the gouernment of thy great Monarchie, or no; which through the negligent carelesnesse and euill gouernment of some by thee put in trust, is like vnto a bodie with great and well proportioned members, but of little or no strength or power. Or else, that thou void of care, canst be content that all should be dismembred, and so euery man to take vnto himselfe what he can lay hand of, as the rebels do in Asia.

Now let no man maruell at this presumptuous rude speech of a proud Ianizarie vnto his soueraigne: for why, they are the men which may most boldly speake in Turky, they are the stay of the Turks Empire, the great Sultans children acknowledging no other father but them: nay rather the Great Turke himselfe is their creature, for they raile him vp and confirme him in the Empire: they are his greatest strength, and vnto them he is most beholden. If Mahomet were with so insolent a speech much moued, he was not iustly to be therefore blamed: howbeit being beset with such a furious multitude with weapons in their hands, and hauing no means to withstand their fury, he wisely dissembled his inward choler, and with a faire countenance and a majestie full of mildenesse, with the best and calmest words he could deuise, sought to appease them: imputing the disorder and euill successe of his affaires vnto the vnfaithfulnesse of his ministers, and the concealing of the truth thereof from him. Saying moreouerouer, That before this their complaint he had resolued to reforme these matters, and to take from them all occasions of discontentment, or for them to vse any such speech as was not beseeming them; whose obedience and respect of loyal dutie vnto him their Soueraigne, should haue beene an example vnto the rest of his subiects. Vpon which speech, they fiercely demanded of [illegible] Bassa, Why he had not giuen an account vnto his Majestie, of the Rebels proceedi[illegible] Who answered, That he had neuer failed of his dutie therein, but that he had beene alwayes hindered so to do by the Capi-Aga; saying, That it was not needfull to trouble him their Soueraigne therewith, (hauing committed these matters to others) but to reforme and amend them as well as they might otherwise, without giuing of him any such distaste concerning these matters. And further, That the cause of all these disorders proceeded from the Empresse his mother, the Capi-Aga, and some few others, vnto whom he had commended the mannaging of those his affaires. With which his answer the Mutiners more mooued, furiously said, That they were thither assembled to demand the heads of such offendors; being resolued to take another course, if he should refuse to grant it them: [meaning thereby to make a new Emperour.] Whereunto for all that, the great Sultan answered, That it was no reason, neither that hee would for their humours put such as they demaunded innocently to death; but willed them to rest themselues contented, vntill it might by order of justice be tried whether they had deserued death or no, and that then he would giue them euen his owne sonne, if he were found culpable. But the mutiners constant in their resolution, againe replied, That he had not by justice put his brethren to death, but for the preseruation of the State: and that those whom they so demanded were so guilty of that wherewith they were charged, as that they deserued not to haue an orderly trial: That the lawes, how just soeuer, should be vnprofitable, and justice iniurie, if they were not by them to be punished; and that therefore it must needs be so, or els that they would take therein a course themselues. As for the Empresse his mother, they were contented that she should be confined vnto some place farther off, and no more to meddle in matters of State. A strange thing it was, to see so great a Prince so to be forced by the sedition and mutinie of his [illegible], to deliuer so great an officer of his Court as was the Capi-Aga, with such others as they required, to be vsed at their discretion. But the violent resolution of these most insolent men so vp in mutinie, made the Sultan Mahomet wisely to yeeld to what they demanded, causing the Capi-Aga and the others to be brought forth; who presented themselues vnto their furie as men alreadie halfe dead. Mahomet did what he might to haue saued them, but the mutiners with a great and dreadfull clamour still cried out to haue them dispatched: neither could they be appeased vntil they saw their heads strucke from their bodies. For [illegible] losse of whom so deere vnto him, Mahomet inwardly grieued; to be in some part reuenged commanded the executioner to proceed, and to do vnto some other of the chiefe Bassa's (whom he knew to be much beloued and respected of the Ianizaries, and whom he could haue been content to haue been rid of) as hee had done vnto the Capi-Aga and the rest: but then the murmuring and mutinie of the Ianizaries was in such sort increased, and as it were redoubled, as that Mahomet was for feare forced with patience to temper his choler, and by giuing way so to appease them. The Empresse the Sultans mother for all that was not then confined, but reserued to the further troubling of the State.

Mahomet glad to giue way vnto his mutinous souldiors.

Other cruelties of Sultan Mahomet.

With like tyrannie, and no lesse injustice, Mahomet but a few dayes before had caused Capin one of his great Bassa's to be beheaded; but whether it were for the desire he had of his wealth and riches, or for the enuy of his honor and valor, was vncertaine: howbeit the former cause seemed vnto many to be the more probable, for that Mahomet immediatly after his death tooke the whole spoile of his wealth, and seised vpon all his goods except 400000 duckets, which Caly Bassa father of the dead Bassa had detained for himselfe. Which his purloyning Mahomet hauing discouered (as the eye of the couetous man is alwayes fixed vpon his prey) demanded one day of the Bassa, If it were true that he had retained vnto himself those 400000 duckets. Which fact the Bassa, partly for feare, and partly for couetousnesse constantly denied, and swore himself to be guiltlesse from any such crime. Whereupon he was forthwith taken, and thinking by lying to haue saued his life, was for [illegible]th put to death, without any further examination of the matter, hauing his head strucke off. Such is the small assurance euen of the greatest that liue in tyrants courts. Neither rested his greedie minde so contented with the

the Bassaes bloud, for why, that serued but for a shew; it was his wealth must worke that cure, which was all forthwith seised vpon, rifled, and carried away to satisfie in effect the greedy appetite of the hungrie tyrant, who changed the dowrie and succession of the wife and children of the dead Bassa, into bonds, chaines, prisons, and slaueries.

Mahomet another Bassa with these cruelties dismaied, and perceiuing the like euill hap and danger to hang ouer his owne head, that had ouerwhelmed Calil and his sonne; resolued to haue prouided for himselfe against this mischiefe, by flying vnto the rebels in Asia. But this his purpose discouered by certaine spies (which serue as means to open a way vnto the Turks crueltie) and he with one of the chiefe followers of Capin Bassa taken by the Ianizaries, were both by them cut in pieces.

Mahomet Bassa by the Ianizaries slaine.

But whilest these things thus passed at Constantinople, the rebels with all diligence prosecuted their rebellion in Asia, and bent their forces against the great townes there. Their army was exceeding great, euery man ioyning himselfe vnto the first forces which were in good estate, being not as yet by any greater power represt, and rich with the spoiles that they had taken. These men had besieged Angore a great and strong towne in Asia, and seemed resolutely set downe for the carrying thereof. Whereof the citizens being afraid, and out of hope of relieue, came to parly, offering vnto them a sum of money to redeeme themselues and their citie: and so in fine agreed to giue them 200000 Duckats; vpon the readie payment whereof, the rebels without more adoe presently departed.

The successe of the rebels in Asia.

Shortly after, the new Captaines of Sultan Mahomet arriued there also, whom he had placed in the places of them whom he had before executed for the appeasing of the souldiers of the court, who would needs make it treason, and put to death the citizens, for hauing giuen such money as is aforesaid, vnto the rebels, though it were done for the preseruation of their liues: as if the lawes were to be respected in the horrours of necessitie, or that life were to become a slaue vnto riches, and riches not made for the vse of mans life. Well, needs they would for this supposed treason (as they pretended) haue put them to death, and sacked their citie; but indeed all was in their greedie furie to haue carried away that which the rebels had in their mercie left them. These poore citizens with this so cruell a resolution dismayed, and out of all hope of finding fauour at such mercilesse mens hands, resolued now to hazard all, and so vpon the sudden taking vp armes, stood vpon their owne defence. Hereupon arose a great and cruell fight betwixt these souldiers and the citizens, both the subiects of one Prince, and all of them of one and the selfesame superstition: but the one side armed with pride and couetousnesse, and the other with necessitie and despaire: howbeit at last the iuster cause preuailing, the citizens ouercame these new come souldiers, and hauing slaine a great number of them, chased the rest out of the citie. This euill encounter of these new Captaines euen at the first enterance into their charges, giuen them by the subiects themselues, encreased the rebels courage, so that they being in number fortie thousand, vnder the leading of one of the Tartar Han his brethren, besieged Burze a great and rich Citie, being the store-house for the warlike prouisions of Asia, and the place whereunto the Turkes customes, taxes, and subsidies of Asia were brought, and there kept. These men after certaine dayes bestowed in the siege, and great resistance made by the besieged, at length by force carried the place, slew the inhabitants, and sacked the citie. Which exploit gracing their fortune with honour and booty, increased also their power and reputation, so that redoubled on all sides, and increased with courage and spoyles, Mahomet dismaied, resolued by faire meanes to appease them, and to entreat with them of peace. This good fortune had drawne vnto their part the Gouernor of Babylon, either wearie of the seruice of the Turke, or desirous by the ruine of the State in generall, to increase his owne power: whose reuolt greatly increased the rebels power, and diminished the grand Seigniors. Beside these mishaps also, the great Shaugh of Persia (commonly called the Sophi) thrusting himselfe into these disorders, to make his gaine, and to fish (as they say) in a troubled water, had now taken Gorbery, a strong town vpon the borders of the Turks empire, and was making himselfe ready for new conquests. All which tempests arising as it were in one together, caused Mahomet to strike saile, and maugre his Imperiall dignity and honor, to seek for peace; which indeed could not be great in such weakenesse of his nature, neither braue in such his great want of courage. For great dignities and honors without valor to maintaine them, are but like rich garments which couer bodies almost rotten, but heale them not.

The Turkes together by the eares among themselues.

Mahomet

Mahomet desirous to come to some good agreement with his rebellious subiects, at length (but not without his great dishonour) obtained the same; granting to them all their demands, disarming them by yeelding vnto them, and not by valour: and giuing vnto Zellalie one of their chiefetaines, the honourable place of the Bassa of Bosna, to content his ambition, and to binde him therewith to doe his seruice. The readie way by sufferance to encrease the disloyall subiects courage, instead of stopping their furie by the seueritie of Iustice: for to grace a rebell with offices of authoritie, is but to arme him with lawfull power, for him the better to vndertake whatsoeuer shall best fit his appetite and desire, vpon the hope of his owne priuat and certaine profit or aduancement.

The captaines and souldiers murmure against their Sultan Mahomet.

Mahomet his other captains and men of war, seeing this dishonorable peace of their Prince, and preferment of the rebels, honored with honors and dignities, in stead of paines and punishments which they should of right haue for their rebellion indured; began to enter into great murmuring and discontentment against their great Sultan. They considered his vniust dealing and bate feare, in aduancing the rebels vnto such honors and dignities, as of right belonged vnto his most faithful and loyall officers and seruants, by such their vnworthie preferments making them slaues vnto his enemies, and vassals vnto the rebels: they, to their dishonour and losse, by their insolencie and treacherie, inioying the honours and preferments of right due vnto their faithfull and loyall seruices. Which dangerous persuasions transported them so far from their allegeance and dutie, as to vndertake a greater and more perillous matter against his crowne and dignitie, than had the rebels before by taking vp of armes in the field against him, whereunto the assured knowledge they had of his cowardise encouraged them also: so that their resolution was to thrust him out of his Imperiall State, and to set vp his eldest son called also Mahomet in his place. These are the ordinarie effects of iniustice and cowardise, the ouerthrow of Princes; their iniustice through crueltie arming all creatures against them; and their cowardise through contempt disperseth with euery man for his dutie: so that hee must bee iust, that will keepe his subiects in order; and valiant, that must hold them in awe.

Mahomet in danger to haue beene deposed from his empire and his eldest son set vp in his place.

Vnto these discontentments these mutiners ioyned also (as I said) the slothfulnesse, effeminatnesse, and insufficiency of Mahomet, vnfit to deale in matters of estate, and altogether vnable to manage armes. He was too cowardly, as they thought, to represse their valor by force, and too weake to crosse their designes by wisedome: which not a little encouraged them in that their so desperat and dangerous a resolution. They drew also into this their plot the Sultanesse Mahomets his chiefe wife, and mother to the yong Prince: who blinded with ambition (the bane of great spirits) had not the hap to reiect their persuasions, as dangerous vnto her and her son, but shutting her eies against the due consideration of loyaltie and duty, cast both her selfe and her sonne headlong into the midst of most desperat dangers.

This proiect (of no lesse importance, than of the deposing of one of the greatest Monarchs of the World) resolued vpon, some of these men, according to the manner of the Turkes, ioyning superstition vnto their designes, consulted with an Astrologer, concerning the successe of the actions of the young Prince, whome they were about to enstall in his fathers Imperiall throne. This man to be excused in his trumperies, seeing that to deceiue is the chiefe point of his art, erected the figure of the Princes natiuitie, consulted with his spirits, considered the celestial bodies, and in fine arriued at the point of his iudgement, for the good and welfare of the Prince: and thereupon dispatched an Eunuch towards the Sultanesse, with these pleasing speeches, That she should be of good courage, and in assured hope that the young Prince her sonne within a few daies should haue the Imperiall crowne set vpon his head, and the royall scepter put into his hand: his art (as he said) promising vnto him these honours, by the fauor of the cœlestiall bodies, of whome he had learned these newes; and by the conference with spirits, from whom hee had this assurance. But ô the vaine and foolish knowledge of man against God! attributing vnto the second causes, that which altogether belongeth vnto his owne power; robbing him of his owne prouidence, which extendeth ouer all, to giue the same vnto creatures, which neither haue their owne being, neither are able of themselues to bring forth, or to worke any effects at all without it! and that more is, to giue certaine credit vnto the enemie of all faith and beliefe, euen to the Father of leasing, who taketh as much glorie in falshood, as God himselfe doth in truth; as being the proper marke of his power. For it chanced ced that these letters sent by the Eunuch to the Sultanesse, were intercepted & brought vnto Mahomet the great Sultan, whom they most concerned: whereupon it so fel out, that he which tooke vpon him to foretell the long life and empire to befall to another man, could not foresee the end of his own life, which followed him fast, euen at the heeles, being himselfe by the commaundement of the great Sultan, with the young prince, the Eunuch, and fiftie others of the conspirators, & such as were consenting vnto the conspiracie, most cruelly strangled, and the Sultanesse her selfe drowned. Howbeit some report this yong Prince to haue bin strangled vpon suspicion of conspiring against his father, with the rebels of ASIA: which after his death being found not to be so, the Bassa which put that suspicion into Mahomets head, to haue bin therefore worthily hanged. But with these contentments taken from the crosses of our enemies, let vs againe returne vnto HVNGARIE.

Mahomet causeth his eldest sonne, with diuers others to be strangled.

The last yeare ended with the great bruit of the comming of the Tartar Han, with a great army into HVNGARIE, and now he had dispatched his Embassadors towards the king of POLONIA, to demand of him tribute, and passage through his countrie. Great and proud demands to be both at once required. But the King of POLONIA requited him againe with the like, denying him both the one and the other, roughly answering of his threats. Which so resolute and blunt a refusall, caused the proud tyrant to change his intended course, & for feare of being defeated by the Polonians in passing through their countrie, (as the Tartars had often beene) before he could come into HVNGARIE, tooke another way, and turned with his Armie toward VALACHIA. Of whose comming Radul the Vayuod vnderstanding, and that beside the forraging of his countrie, they had a purpose to displace him, & to set vp another Vayuod in his stead; with great diligence gathered together the greatest power that he could, and so marched vnto the borders of his country, there to attend the comming of these Tartars, and to stay them from entring. Which in effect fell out according to his desire, for the barbarous people beeing arriued, and attempting with all their force to haue entred, were by this little armie encountred; which commanding the countrey, tooke all the aduantages of the strait passages, and there notably repulsed the fierce enemie. Two of the first encounters fel out fortunately vnto the Valachians, who therein slew about 3000 of the Tartars; whose auantgard for all that still came on, and at the third encounter so long maintained the fight, that their whole Armie was now come in, and hardly charged the Valachians; whose fortune surcharged, began then to change, the hardie beeing constrained to bow vnder the multitude, & valor forced to yeeld vnto number. Which was not done without a long and cruel fight, both armies encountring with great courage and furie, the one for the defence of their countrie, and the other for an entrance vnto their conquests. Howbeit the strong enemie at length preuailed, and entring into VALACHIA, brought in with it ruine, death, and destruction.

The Polonian denieth the Tartars passage through his countrie, vnto Hungarie.

Diuers hard cõflicts betwixt the Tartars & the Valachies in their passage through Valachia.

The Tartars hauing by force thus opened themselues a way through VALACHIA, and grieuously spoyled the countrie, were come with their armie to QVINQVE ECCLESIÆ, a towne in HVNGARIE, to ioyne their forces with Hassan Bassa, now after his marriage returned into this countrey with a great armie to continue his charge: who caused the Tartars to bee mustred in his presence, and found them to be fortie thousand strong. Men of great courage against the weake, but meere cowards before the couragious: who in stead of assaulting the walls of any strong towne, fell vpon the cottages of poore countrey villages, ransacking and pilling the poore inhabitants, as well in the villages of the territories subiect vnto the Turks, as in the territories of the Christians; constraining the poore people, contrarie to their conscience, and to the preiudice of their faith, to sweare to serue the Turke: Besides that, they enforced them to furnish them with all warlike prouision and munition, which they put into CANISIA, but a while after that our men had defeated the Garrison there. Neither were they so contented, all the neighbours beeing thereabouts subiect to this tempest: for they passed into STIRIA with their families, and ouerran a part of that Prouince, spoyling it of men, cattell, & goods; leauing in stead of them, destruction, miserie, and death; and carried away with them two thousand poore Christians for slaues, whom they sold vnto the Turks, and made great profit of them. From thence they went into the Countrey of SHAVARIE, and embruing themselues with the bloud of the Christians, rifling their Villages, and after that burning them; carrying away with them a thousand Christian captiues into most miserable bon-bondage and ſlauerie. Which cruell outrages afterward thruſt the valiant Colonell Collonitz into the field, againſt theſe barbarous people, to ſtay their incurſions, and to defeat them if he could. G

This worthie Commander had but a few dayes before been much troubled in appeaſing the Frenchmen and Wallons in garriſon in the villages about ROQVESBVRG, riſen vp in mutinie for their pay: whoſe hot and moued ſpirits he by his wiſedome ſo calmed, as that they were content againe to be ſworne to the Emperor, and ſo idyned themſelues vnto the armie of Collonitz, which was then 10000 good men ſtrong.

In the meane time, the Tartars greedie of prey, and ſtill ſeeking after bootie, ranſacke and ſpoyled fiue and twentie country villages about VERADEN; all which they afterward burned alſo, carrying away with them a great bootie both of men and cattell, no man reſiſting them: At which time other companies of them alſo inuading the Countie Serin his Iſland as farre as RACKENSPVRG, made in it great ſpoyle, as had their fellowes elſewhere, and beſide other bootie, carried away with them two thouſand Chriſtian Captiues. Theſe outrages of the Tartars armed the Countie on the one ſide, and Collonitz on the other; who couragiouſly oppoſing themſelues againſt theſe Barbarians, for a time ſtayed their incurſions, they not daring to abide the force of this little Armie, ſufficient enough for the valour thereof, to haue ouerthrowne that of their enemies, for number dreadfull. This made them to turne their courſe another way into SCLAVONIA, being in number fiue and thirtie thouſand men, leauing nothing behind them there but death and deſolation, for the number of priſoners and great booties which they carried from thence. Amongſt other their ſpoyles, it was their fortune by the way to meet with ſixe hundred of the Chriſtian ſouldiers, of whome not one eſcaped their hands, but were ſlaine euery mothers ſonne. At length it ſo fortuned, that certaine of their Troupes in roaming abroad, fell into the danger of the Countie Serin, who with his Followers ſtill houered aloofe off for feare to bee of their great multitude ouerwhelmed: a part whereof now falling into his hands, were by his ſoldiers ouerthrowne and all cut in pieces, and a number of Chriſtian Captiues by them taken, deliuered out of chaines, and ſet at libertie. Which exployt was greater for the feare it brought vpon the Enemie, than for the ſlaughter there made. For the Tartars, ſtill in doubt to meet againe with the Chriſtian Troupes (who left not one of them aliue that they could light on) were glad now to keepe themſelues cloſer together, and ſo did a great deale the leſſe harme than when they without feare roamed vp and downe at their pleaſure: ſo that euen by this little victorie the Countrey receiued ſome comfort, and the Earle greater honour; Small helpes beeing infinite Treaſures in time of neceſſitie, which out of it would not bee to bee reckoned of. H I K

The Tartars repreſſed by countie Serin.

The Garriſon Souldiers of CANISIA, of late defeated by Collonitz in going to meet the Conuoy comming toward them with victuals (as is before declared) the reſt of the Garriſon deſirous to be reuenged, were conſulting of the meanes how to bring the ſame to paſſe. It fortuned that at the ſame time there was a fugitiue Chriſtian Soldier in the towne, who made ſhew of a man male-content, deſirous to turne Turke: of whom the Turks made much reckoning, for that he ſeemed to know much of the deſignes of the Chriſtians, and the meanes how to croſſe them: Whereof hee ſo aſſured them, as if the matter had been now alreadie done; promiſing to bring them euen into the middeſt of the Chriſtian Campe, and to deliuer it into their hands and power. Howbeit his meaning was nothing leſſe; for ſeeing the Turkes much buſied with carrying in of victualls into the Caſtle, brought into the Towne after the ouerthrow of their Fellowes before ſent forth for the bringing in thereof, and wholly intentiue to that buſineſſe; knowing the place in the Caſtle where the powder and munition lay, hee at the ſame time by a traine layd fire thereunto, and afterward, amiddeſt the tumult and the ſturre, by a loope hole in the wall, got himſelfe out of the Towne, and came to Collonitz, who with his Troupes lay neere there by in ambuſh, expecting the opportunitie to performe ſome notable exployt vpon the ſucceſſe of ſo dangerous an aduenture, whereunto hee had before been made priuie. Neither fayled the fire any thing of the accuſtomed violence thereof, but ſeemed rather to redouble the ſame, it had ſo ſuddenly conſumed the Buildings, Munitions, and perſons. All the place felt the furie thereof; the Cannons, Cannoniers, Souldiers, and whatſoeuer elſe, was ſubiect vnto L M

A notable exployt done by a fugitiue Chriſtian.

A vnto this dreadfull blaſt: all was ſhaken and turned vpſide downe, yea the fire burſt out of the caſtle, and burnt the greateſt part of the towne alſo. There was a confuſion of feare, miſhap, and miſerie together, the terror whereof cauſed many of the Turkes to caſt themſelues ouer the walls, in hope ſo to haue ſaued their liues: but whileſt they thought ſo to haue eſcaped the danger of the fire, they preſently fell vpon the edge of the ſword: for meeting with the ſouldiers of Collonitz (who lying in ambuſh neere thereby, awaited the opportunitie in that ſo confuſed a tumult, to haue ſeiſed vpon the place) they were all either taken priſoners, or ſlaine. But ſee the hap, how one croſſe chance of fortune ouerthrew this ſo notable a deſigne, as had it beene well followed, might in one moment haue recouered that ſtrong place, which had before for the ſpace of many dayes endured the greateſt forces of the Othoman Emperour; neither yet was then ſo loſt, but through the infamous treacherie of our owne men. B

You haue heard before, how that Collonitz had by faire perſuaſions, rather than by true effects, appeaſed the French men and Wallons, vp in mutinie for their pay; ſo that by him perſuaded, they had againe giuen their oath of fidelitie vnto the Emperour, and to follow his Armie. But now when Occaſion ſerued, and held out as it were both her armes vnto the Chriſtians, for the regaining and conqueſt of CANISIA, theſe French men and Wallons, the greateſt part of Collonitz his ſtrength, iniuriouſly refuſed her ſo faire an offer; and at ſuch time as they ſhould rather haue fought naked, than haue failed in their dutie, (it beeing to haue gained a moſt great and rich conqueſt) for want of pay (as they pretended) turned their backes, and being by no intreatie or perſuaſions to bee mooued, to the diſcouragement of the reſt, who were better minded, and their owne eternall infamie, withdrew themſelues from the Armie. So that Collonitz rather by the wicked vnfaithfulneſſe of his owne diſloyall ſouldiers, than by the valour of his enemies, diſappoynted of his purpoſe, was to his great diſcontentment, contrarie to that he hoped, enforced to retyre without any thing more doing. C

A faire opportunitie for the recouerie of Canſia, ouerſlipped through the diſloyalty of the French & Wallons.

While this exployt, ſo well begun, but euill performed, was in hand, the Turkes and Tartars aſſembled together, made a cruell ſpoyle in the country about RAB, euen almoſt vnto the Gates of the Towne, carrying away with them a great number both of men and beaſts. In fine, it chanced that the Huſſars of the Lord Nadaſti came that way, who vnderſtanding what had happened, with all ſpeed made after theſe Robbers, ouertooke them in their retreat neere vnto ALBA REGALIS, ſlew a great number of them, and inforced the reſt to leaue a great part of their prey behind them. With which bootie recouered euen out of the Lyons mouth, they returned to RAB; of whom the poore inhabitants and country people, with teares ſtanding in their eyes, requeſted to haue againe their own goods. But War, the enemie of Charitie, and nurſe of barbarous Crueltie, had ſo hardned the hearts of theſe men of Warre, as that they were not to bee mooued to reſtore them their Cattell againe, but that they muſt redeeme them for preſent money, which they did, and ſo receiued them. D

Now the noble Collonitz ſeeing himſelfe ſo ſhamefully forſaken of his owne Souldiers, and diſappointed of his purpoſe, and the Turkes and Tartars in great numbers comming to the reliefe and repairing of this ſo ſore ſhaken towne; and out of hope to do any good thereon, full of griefe and indignation returned towards COMORA. And howbeit that euill happe had cruelly fruſtrated the glorie of his enterpriſe, yet the Heauens, in deſpight of Fortunes frowne, left not this noble and valiant Captaine altogether without honour, but as amorous of his vertues and valour, preſented vnto him in this Winter of Fortunes diſpleaſure, ſome trophies of glorie. For vpon the way as he was returning home he met with 2000 Turkes, whom after ſome ſmall reſiſtance he cut all in pieces; miſerable ſacrifices, appointed vnto the furie of his wrath. In this fight their enſignes were all taken, and a number of priſoners, the chief of whom, together with the Enſignes, he ſent to PRAGVE, as a Preſent for the Emperour, and a token of his good ſeruice. E F 2000 Turks defeated by Collonitz.

The report then was, That the Turkes and Tartars with their vnited forces had forraged SCLAVONIA, taken diuers ſtrong holds, burnt a number of villages, and carried away eight thouſand Chriſtians priſoners, beſide a great number moe ſlaine with the ſword, or conſumed med with fire, and all the Cattell of the Country driuen away: and that being with this booty come to QVINQVE ECCLESIÆ, they had there receiued command with Mahomet Bassa, to besiege COMORA, and that all the Commanders of the Turkes Armie were thereupon resolued. All which reports no whit dismayed the valiant Collonitz, or any thing altred his designes; but hauing fortified COMORA against the intended siege of the Turkes, and taken from thence foure culuerins, according to a former purpose by himselfe intended, resolued now to take from the Turkes the castles of LOQVA and BOVLONNEVAR, the garrisons wherof greatly annoyed the territories of the Christians, and hindred the designes of this great Captaine. These two Castles are scituate vpon a great marish which seperateth HVNGARIE from RASCIA, and are therefore as bounders of Hungarie, and strong enough to be defended against a small armie.

Vpon which resolution he set forward with his small and valiant power, and the fourth day arriued within the sight of LOQVA, a Castle well manned, and furnished with all things necessarie for the defence thereof. The army lodged, Collonitz with a drum summoned the besieged to yeeld vp the place, with promises of curtesie if they should now accept of the same whilest it was offred them: Which they stoutly refused to doe, swearing to the contrary, That they would die and liue within those their walls. Collonitz seeing them so resolued, first caused a Mill to be assaulted, which placed ouer against the castle, and well fortified, serued it in stead of a bulwarke, and seemed hard to be taken: howbeit his men, loath to haue their good fortune euen in the beginning checked, gaue thereunto so braue an assault, that after the enemie had done what he could for the defence thereof, they became masters of the place, carried it, and therein lodged: but finding it dangerous to bee kept, and to stand them in small stead, they set it on fire, and afterward planted foure Culuerins in batterie before the Castle. But as they were thus busied, the Turkes couragiously sallied out vpon them, not doubting to aduenture themselues, for the hope they had to bee in short time by their great Armie relieued. In this sallie they met afront with the Haiduckes, whom they fiercely charged, and so gauled them, that hauing slaine thirtie of them, they retyred without any losse; forthwith discharging so many thundring shot and arrowes vpon our men, as that they well knew not how to saue themselues from the danger of them, in such sort, that all the ways to approch the place being stopped, they began to deuise how to set the castle on fire: Which they by certaine fire-works attempted, but to final purpose, the fire being no sooner kindled, but that it was forthwith by the Turkes quenched. This done, and our men disappointed of their hope, they deuised to set fire vpon the timber which ioyned the palisado to the Castle stretching toward the port. Which their attempt sorted but to small effect also, the fire burning but slowly to do the enemies any great harme. All which deuices failing, they resolued by plaine force to assault the Castle, and to scale the same: which enterprise resolued vpon, the Haiduckes carrying before them certaine strong and thicke plankes of wood, in stead of targuets, to defend them from the small shot and arrowes of their enemies; by this deuice gained the palisado placed vpon the ditch: and being there in some safetie, with their muskets and harquebusies so applied the besieged, that they draue them from their curtaines, and made that they durst no more shew themselues vpon the walls. And immediately after, two companies of the Haiduckes placed ten ladders against one of the towers of the Castle, and so with their Ensignes in their hands couragiously mounted the ladders, in hope to haue gained the place: but the Turkes as men resolued to liue and die in their castle, valiantly repulsed those Haiduckes, and by force drew in vnto them from off the ladders, the two Ensigne-bearers of the Haiduckes, whose heads they cut off, and cast them downe vnto their fellows, which were yet comming vp the ladders; and the two Ensignes so gained vpon the wals, they placed in the middest of their owne, as the trophies of the spoyles of them who would haue spoyled them. With which so great courage of the enemies, and death of their fellowes, our men not a little dismayed, kept themselues close at the foot of the wall; as afraid any further to force the place, which to their losse they saw stored with such valiant men to defend it.

Notable resistance made by the besieged Turkes.

Collonitz perceiuing this discomfiture of these men, and well assured that the castle was not but by valor to be woon, immediatly drew out of euerie companie of the County Ringrane, cer-

A certaine of the best and most resolute Souldiours to renew the assault: Which so honourable a charge they cheerefully vndertooke, and as men of courage, began forthwith to mount the ladders. Which the Haiduckes beholding, againe tooke courage, and partly ashamed of themselues; and partly to be partakers of the spoyle and prey, if they should preuaile, did what they might for the winning of the place, striuing now who should doe best. Which assault was with such furie and preasse of men maintained, that the Turkes not able longer to withstand so great forces, were constrained to yeeld both themselues and their Castle vnto the furie of their angrie enemies. Which castle indeed cost much Christian blood; but yet more of the Turks: for the Haiduckes armed with rage and reuenge, slew almost all in the castle, as well Rascians as Turks, and tooke the rest prisoners. Among others there was an Hun-

B garian renegate there taken, whom for hast they beheaded, beeing not at leisure to empaile him, the ordinarie punishment for such faithlesse miscreants. But during this spoyle made by men chafed with furie, the wind and fire were on their part exercising of their rage also. For the fire which they had cast vpon the palisado, and which they had before neglected, as of little or no force, now increased with the wind, by little and little getting hold of one thing after another, hauing burnt the palisado, got hold of the castle also; whereunto the Souldiours (loaded with prey and bootie, the things they most desired) had no regard at all: so that the fire vtterly consumed the Castle, with whatsoeuer else had escaped their greedie hands.

The Turkes in garrison at BOVLOVVENAR (a fortresse but a league distant from this burnt C Castle) seeing these flames of fire, and doubting what might betide themselues, began to consult what course were best for them to take, as either to attend the comming of the enemie, and so to abide the chance of warre, or else betimes to prouide for themselues by flight: the consideration of their honour and dutie perswaded them to stay, but the ruine of their neighbours, as strong and valiant as themselues, perswaded them otherwise. In fine, the care of the preseruation of their liues preuailed, and the resolution was, That they should flie. And so putting all their household-stuffe and goods into certaine boats there readie vpon the Lake, they by the middest thereof fled: foolishly perswading themselues, that our men comming thither, and finding nothing there, would not long there stay, but bee gone; after whose departure they might as they thought returne againe vnto their old dwellings, and in

The Turkes for feare forsake the Castle of Boulounenar.

D the meane time hid themselues in the marish, vntill that the enemie were past. But our men comming thither, and finding no man in the Castle, neither yet any thing else that could well be carried away, wondered to see that there were any men so cowardly, as for feare to abandon such a place, as for the strength thereof might haue beene an example to others to stand vpon their guard and defence, they sought out euery corner thereabout, to find out whither the Turkes were fled. At last after much diligent search, they found certaine boats which the Turkes had sunke in the channell neere vnto the castle gate, which caused them to thinke that they were fled by water, and happely were in some place not far off. These boats were forthwith drawne vp out of the water, and found furnished with oares and such other things as belonged vnto them. Which done, Collonitz chose out certaine of the most valiant and re-
